

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. Second Reading—South Island Native Land Purchases—Sheep Bill.

The Hon. the SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

SECOND READING.

SOUTH ISLAND NATIVE LAND PURCHASES.

The Hon. Mr. TAIAROA, in moving the motion standing in his name, said he wished to explain the reasons for moving the motion. In doing so it would be necessary for him to go back as far as 1879. The Council was aware that a Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into the South Island Native land purchases; but the Commissioners appointed did not quite complete their work, because the Government of which Mr. Bryce was at that time Native Minister stopped the work of the Commission. The Commission, however, brought up a report embodying what they thought should be done. After that report was published petitions were addressed to both Houses of Parliament in 1882, and a report was presented on those petitions on the 30th August, 1882. He would not read the whole of the report, but would refer to the last clause, which was as follows:—

"Your Committee therefore consider that the most equitable, just, and practicable solution of the petitioners' grievance would be for the Government to allow the subject of the prayer of the petitioners to be inquired into and decided by a properly-constituted Court, with a clear understanding that whatever decision may eventually be arrived at be considered final, and, in the event of any additional land-reserves being made by the Government to the petitioners, that they be inalienable."

In 1884 a petition was again presented, from Tare te Ihoka and Teone Topi Patuki and other Natives, praying that the report of the Commissioners might be carried out. The Committee then recommended that a Royal Commission should be appointed; and the Government, on the strength of these reports, appointed Mr. Mackay as Commissioner. He was appointed by His Excellency the Governor on the 29th August, 1886, and in April or May last Mr. Mackay sent in his report. It was this report that he wished to have laid upon the table.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That there be laid upon the table of the Council the report of Mr. Commissioner Mackay upon the South Island Native land purchases."—(Hon. Mr. Taiaroa.)

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS said the Government, after very careful consideration, had come to the conclusion that the motion of the honourable gentleman should be acceded to, and if the Council agreed with that view the Government would be happy to place the report of Mr. Mackay on the table.

Motion agreed to.

SHEEP BILL.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—Sir, whilst I propose to ask the Council to pass the second reading of this Bill to-day, I will, at the same time, point out that there will be certain amendments in portions of it which I think it will be necessary to make, and I will indicate in the course of my remarks the direction they will take. The powers which are at present possessed for the repression of the spread of disease in sheep are not considered to be sufficient or thoroughly effective for the purpose, and in that respect we agree with the view that was taken by our predecessors in office. Without going into clause 2—which provides for an alteration in the names given to certain officers of the department—I will proceed to the 3rd clause. There it will be found that it is proposed to get rid, in the present Act, of the word "negligently." The term in the present Act has been found to work in this way: Where convictions have been sought in most serious cases the presence in the Act of the term "negligently" has caused the failure of the proceedings. The 4th clause deals with the power I am about to describe. Up to the present time, where sheep have been destroyed in consequence of scab, it has been made, so far as I understand, the subject of arrangement between the proprietor of the sheep and the Government. It is proposed to take larger powers here, and to empower the Minister in charge to authorise, under certain circumstances, the destruction of the sheep, compensation being given to the owner of the sheep to the extent of one-half of their value, which is to be settled by arbitration. There is no doubt that the power sought is a large one, but it must be remembered that the proposal is not to interfere with the 23rd and 33rd sections of the existing Act, under which the owner will be called upon, in the regular way, to clean sheep as provided by the Act. And I apprehend that the power of killing the sheep will not be exercised until we give all reasonable opportunities that may be given for such an operation. At the same time, there is no doubt that in this clause the power to do so in the first instance is given, and it will be for honourable gentlemen to consider whether the powers we seek, considering the very important nature of the subject, are too large. In the 5th clause there is a point to which I shall have to call the attention of honourable members. The Inspector, on being satisfied that sheep on Crown lands only are infected with scab, is to report the fact to the Minister in charge. It is stated in the clause that he shall report to the Colonial Secretary; but I shall propose in Committee to substitute the words "Minister in charge." In this clause also it is made imperative on the Minister to have the sheep destroyed under these circumstances. The terms are, "He shall take steps to have the said sheep destroyed, compensation being paid in respect of such destruction." The power here is undoubtedly very large, and it is open to question, or, at all events, to consideration, whether that obligation on the Minister is more heavy than is desirable. There are many members in this Council who have had much experience in connection with sheep, and I shall rely very largely on their judgment in respect to the details of this Bill, and shall be glad to ascertain their views particularly on the necessity of the mandatory portion of the clause relating to the powers of the Minister in charge. There is another part of this clause to which I wish to call attention, and to which, it appears to me, I shall have to move an amendment in Committee. I may say at once that a wrong word has crept into the clause. It is proposed there that under the circumstances there shall be a revocation of the license. What I would suggest is that the license should be suspended. The object of the suspension is clear: it is to enable a certain and special time to elapse, in order that the run may become clean, before it is occupied again by sheep. That is the understanding I have. Of course it would be improper that the license should be revoked, because the license would not necessarily be in that case renewed to the actual owner. I shall therefore have to present in Committee an amendment which, I hope, will meet that case, and therefore I hope honourable gentlemen, in considering it, will be good enough to understand that the intention is merely to suspend the license during such time as may be necessary. The other more important part of the Bill will be found in clause 7. There it is intended to give power to relax, under certain circumstances, the provisions as to landing sheep at ports—not sheep from another country, but simply as between ports in New Zealand. I will give an illustration of the present inconvenience in working the Act in this respect. Take the case of sheep brought from Wanganui to Wellington. They can be brought across the country without being subjected to inspection, but they cannot be shipped from Wanganui to Wellington without being liable to inspection. Taking that as an illustration, it would appear that some such power as is proposed in the Bill should be given. It will be seen that in the clause provision is made for this, and for the case of the introduction of sheep from another port where the steamer has also shipped on board sheep introduced from another country. As to the rest of its provisions, the Bill does not propose to disturb the existing Act. I now move the second reading of this Bill.

The Hon. Mr. WALKER.—I do not rise to oppose the second reading of this Bill; but I must express my gratification at hearing the honourable gentleman in charge say that he is going to amend it in Committee, because I should have certainly felt bound to oppose clause 5 in Committee very strongly. I think that clause as it stands at present is one of the most brutally-oppressive clauses I ever heard of in my life. It is bad enough to be the proprietor of sheep that may have been "scabbed" from spite, but this would be the finishing touch to the injury. I am glad he is going to have that amended in Committee.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE.—In our former legislation in reference to scab in sheep we have taken the precaution in each case of referring the Bill to a Select Committee: in fact, in most cases it has been referred to a Joint Committee of both Houses. The subject has always been felt to be one of the utmost importance, bound up as it is with the interests of the colony to an extent which the outside public do not seem to have any idea of. The Bill is intended to modify some of the provisions of the existing Act, and in that respect it goes very far indeed. I think it may be desirable to amend the Bill in other directions than those indicated by the Hon. Mr. Stevens. At any rate, I think it would be a wise course to pursue to refer it to a Select Committee. My honourable friend has not indicated what changes will be effected by the alterations proposed in clause 2. In the Act of 1878 certain extended powers were given to the Chief Inspector, and it is now proposed to extend those powers to all Inspectors. I do not know that it is necessary to maintain these distinctions, but the distinction was not introduced in the first case without very sufficient reason and very much discussion; and I think it is desirable that a Committee should go through the Bill thoroughly, to see that we are not introducing greater changes than are perhaps contemplated by the introducer of this Bill. I suggest that that course should be taken, and that the Committee should consist of gentlemen interested in the question. I think such a step would be regarded with more satisfaction by the public at large, and that the progress of the Bill through Parliament will not be retarded this session. Seeing the importance of the Bill, it would be a great pity if its progress were retarded.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—I should like to say I am quite willing to refer this Bill to a Committee, as suggested, and I think it very desirable that the Bill should pass through their hands. There is no Committee at present set up which could satisfactorily deal with this subject, the nearest one to it being the Joint Rabbit Committee. I believe, under the circumstances, it would be better that I should move for a Select Committee of the Council only to consider the Bill.

Bill read a second time.

On the motion of the Hon. Mr. STEVENS, the Bill was referred to a Select Committee, consisting of the Hon. Mr. Acland, the Hon. Mr. Buckley, the Hon. Mr. Holmes, the Hon. Mr. Johnson, the Hon. Mr. Menzies, the Hon. Mr. Peter, the Hon. Mr. Reeves, and the mover.

The Council adjourned at fifteen minutes past three o'clock p.m.

HENRY PRICE.

Mr. T. THOMPSON brought up the report of the Public Petitions Committee (M to Z) on the petition of Henry Price, of Dunedin, stating that the Committee had no recommendation to make.

Mr. LARNACH wished to make a few remarks on this case. It was a very hard one, and he should like to direct the attention of the Government to it. Here was a man who had been eight years in the Government service in connection with the railways, who had got out of the groove of general labour, and who, no fault having been found with him during his long term of service, had lately received notice of dismissal—no doubt in consequence of the retrenchment measures. It appeared to him (Mr. Larnach) that some provision would have to be made for such cases as that of this man, who was unaccustomed to other work than platelaying, who was a widower with a family of four children, for whose looking-after he had to pay, and who was now thrown out of employment through no fault of his own. Most likely, beyond suffering very great inconvenience, in his case it might lead to, at times, almost starvation; and he asked the Government to seriously consider the matter before the session ended, and try to make some provision for cases of that kind. Otherwise such a state of distress would reign throughout the colony that it would be something more than serious.

Mr. BRUCE said it was possible, as the honourable member for the Peninsula had just remarked, that some provision might have to be made in these cases; but, seeing that no provision had been made, it was impossible for the Committee to recommend this case to the favourable consideration of the Government. In fact, the regulations of the Government service had been strictly complied with in this case, the man being discharged owing to reduction in the number of hands employed. Those discharged were the least efficient, though, other things being equal, married men received the preference in being retained; but in this case those retained were very much more efficient than the petitioner, who was discharged. Under these circumstances it was impossible for the Public Petitions Committee to arrive at any other conclusion, though they very much sympathized with the petitioner and recognised the hardship of the case.

Mr. T. THOMPSON need say very little on the matter, as the honourable member for Rangitikei had very fairly put it to the House. He would only add—as to the clause of the petition which said that single men were kept on, whereas this petitioner, who had a family, was discharged—that it was found that only one single man had been retained, and that was owing to his being an exceptionally good man at the work at which he was employed, while, on the contrary, this petitioner was rather unsuitable.

Mr. BARRON could not help remarking that there seemed to be some little difference between the treatment of persons in the circumstances of this petitioner and those who occupied higher positions in the public service. In these times of retrenchment, no doubt the House ought to do all it could to strengthen the hands of the Government to put an end to all unnecessary extravagance; but of these cases a number had been brought under the notice of many honourable members, in which a man, after many years of faithful public service, but who had occupied only a subordinate position, received a week's or possibly only a day's notice to quit; whereas those in more responsible positions at higher salaries got long notice when their services were to be dispensed with, often receiving long leaves of absence, and then getting retiring-allowances; and, in some few cases, due to the system in the Civil Service of the colony, they got pensions. It had been suggested to the Government the other day—and he was surprised they did not see the desirability of adopting the suggestion—that they should set aside grants of land for labouring-men discharged from the Government service through no fault of their own, to enable them to get some place on which to make their homes and find work to do. There were extensive areas of Crown lands unoccupied, for which no better use could be found than that of putting people in such circumstances on them. He suggested to the Government that they should at once make some provision which would enable these men to be treated with something like fairness, and which would prevent them from thinking that, simply because they occupied only subordinate positions, they could be treated in a manner altogether different from that accorded to heads of departments and other officers. Any one who knew anything of the Government Buildings here could point out, not one, but half a dozen officers in the receipt of high salaries whose services could be dispensed with immediately; but, if they were dispensed with on the ground that their services were not required, they would get leave of absence on full pay, and retiring allowances, and all sorts of other considerate treatment that was not extended to poor men who were in the position, unfortunately for themselves, of receiving only daily or weekly wages.

Mr. TAYLOR was glad the honourable member for Caversham had dealt with this question in the direction he had done. He himself held that it was most improper that these invidious distinctions should be made between one man in the Service and another. Simply because one man happened to occupy a low position and had no friends, he got no consideration; and, in view of the small amount of pay such a person received for his labour, it was a gross injustice to place him on a different level from that occupied by a man who had hundreds a year. The man drawing the lower pay was not in a position to provide for himself, and the others were. It seemed to him that to those who had much much was given, but from those who had little even that little which they had was being taken away; and he hoped the Government would put a stop to that policy. He trusted the Minister for Public Works, who, he believed, sympathized with these men, would deal with them as indicated by the honourable member for Caversham, for they were really the persons who deserved most consideration on the part of the Government.

Major ATKINSON thought the honourable gentleman who had just sat down was rather under a misapprehension as to the treatment which was accorded to different members of the Civil Service. All persons in the Civil Service got retiring allowances and pensions, according to the rank they held and according to the nature of the agreement under which they entered the Service; but most of the persons in the Railway Department were not entitled to the same privileges, because they entered the Service on the condition that their engagements might be terminated on three months' notice, on a fortnight's notice, and some of them on a week's notice. Everything depended upon the manner in which they were engaged. Of course it was for the House to say if it wished everybody to get a retiring allowance; but, so far as he understood, the inclination of the House went in the other direction.

Sir G. GREY did not think that answer quite met the case. What was wanted was some provision under which men who were about to leave the Service might make homes for themselves on the land, and so provide for their families; and the Government might easily meet that need by making regulations this very session. The land was there; these people were in distress; they were liable to be dismissed day by day; and, if the colony could afford millions of acres for a foreign company, or if it could afford land to provide great runs for people of wealth, who had occupied them for years on their own terms, the least the House could do was to provide that the poor of New Zealand should have some refuge left to them on the face of the earth where they might make homes for themselves and bring up their families in comfort. There was power to do this, and, if there was not, everything could be done next week that would be necessary to make provision of that kind.

Mr. TURNBULL said this was only one out of a great many cases which would have to occupy the attention of the House. The Government proposed to reduce the expenditure on working railways by £23,000, and, instead of dealing with these cases in an isolated manner, the House should wait until the Government showed by their estimates how they proposed to make these reductions, and then deal with the whole question as it affected those who would be thrown out of employment.

Mr. LEVESTAM said the Premier had told them that all Civil servants were treated alike; but he was not quite correct in that. There was a District Engineer in Nelson dismissed some time ago. He had occupied the position for fifteen years, and yet there were objections to his getting his compensation. It seemed that, in the first instance, his engagement depended upon his success. As he retained his position for fifteen years, and as he had first-class testimonials from his superior officers, it could hardly be doubted that he was successful; and, furthermore, the letter in which the Government intimated dismissal was framed in such language as to leave no doubt that he had been a successful officer. Yet difficulties were raised to his receiving retiring allowance, and for six months he had received nothing; but he (Mr. Levestam) believed that hopes had now been held out to him that he would get his allowance. But it was a hardship to a man that, on losing his situation, he should be kept waiting about month after month for what he was entitled to. It kept him chained to the place, so that he was unable to look for employment. He hoped that the Government would now make a speedy settlement in this case.

Major ATKINSON said the case to which the honourable gentleman referred was a peculiar one. The Civil servant referred to was under the age at which he would be entitled to a pension, but was not in good health, and the question arose whether he was entitled to a pension. There was a good deal of diversity of opinion on the matter; but it had now been determined that he should get a pension, as provided by law.

Mr. BRUCE would like to ask the honourable gentleman whether the Government would take into consideration the question of providing some fund for the relief of disabled railway employés. Those were principally the men who were appealing to the sympathies of the Committee at the present time.

Major ATKINSON said there was no doubt that proper provision must be made next year to meet these cases, and when introducing the Civil Service Bill he would endeavour to meet the difficulty.

STAMP ACT.

Mr. W. D. STEWART said the Premier had made reference on the previous evening to a mistake in a Stamp Act said to have been caused by him (Mr. Stewart). He should like the honourable gentleman to explain the particular circumstances that occurred.

Major ATKINSON said he had no wish to enter into the matter, and he should be glad to withdraw the remark and apologize to the honourable gentleman, if that would satisfy him.

Mr. W. D. STEWART thought that was scarcely a fair way to meet him. A definite charge had been made against him. The honourable gentleman would scarcely have made it unless he had believed it, and he asked the honourable gentleman, as an honourable man, to state on what he had founded the remark. He emphatically denied any mistake.

Major ATKINSON said he had referred to what occurred when a Bill was going through Committee. He thought that the honourable gentleman had better have left the matter as it was. However, if the honourable gentleman desired he would hunt the matter up and give details.

WAIRARAPA NORTH COUNTY COUNCIL EMPOWERING BILL.

Mr. BEETHAM, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said the Bill was a very simple one. Some years ago the Government of the day proclaimed a road and railway reserve through the Forty-mile Bush district three chains in width. The railway had passed this part where it was proposed to lessen the width of the reserve, so that there was now no longer any reason for such a reservation. The settlers in the small Township of Eketahuna wished to lessen the width of the roadway, and the Bill would enable the County Council to dispose of the land for a width on each side of the roadway of three-quarters of a chain. He would not detain the House, but when the Bill was in Committee he would propose two or three amendments that would give effect to the suggestions of the Committee on Local Bills.

Mr. E. RICHARDSON asked the Government for an expression of opinion on this Bill. It dealt with a very important question, and one which the late Government were advised was subject to serious objection, and might lead to very great trouble. The matter had been under the consideration of the Government for some years past. He thought no such power as was asked for in this Bill should be granted to any local body. He understood that the Bill applied to a portion of the reserve which ran through a township. The township might largely increase in the future, and in that case they would have a wide road on both sides till they came to the township, and then a narrow neck through the township itself. He did not want to raise any particular objection, but thought the question was one that should receive very careful consideration before such a precedent was established.

Mr. BUCHANAN would like to say that what was provided by this Bill was absolutely necessary—that was, that a street which was three chains in width should be narrowed. Imagine a small bush township with a street three chains wide running through it, the land being of the roughest description! How were the settlers on each side of this wide street to make it a practicable street? and what necessity was there for anything like three chains in the width of a street in a small township? If townships, either on Government or private lands, were properly laid out, would they find such a thing as streets three chains in width in them? He was sure they would not. In this particular case it was not proposed to narrow the street to one chain, which was the usual width in such townships, but only to a chain and a half. He could assure the House, knowing the locality and knowing the necessity of narrowing the street, that it would be doing a good work, and doing what would be in the interest of the settlers themselves, by granting the power required. He therefore hoped the second reading of the Bill would be passed.

Mr. FISH thought the Bill was most objectionable, and one that certainly ought not to be allowed to pass. In the first place, it proposed to close a portion of a road, or to narrow a wide street, which, he thought, should not be done; and, secondly, it proposed that the land so taken from the road should be sold only to those persons upon whose land it abutted, and that not at a fair and reasonable price, but at the price at which the land was originally purchased. Now, it might be that the land had been purchased for 10s. an acre originally, and that its present value was £5 an acre; yet the Bill proposed that this land should be given only to the owners of the land fronting the road, and at the price at which their original sections were bought. He thought it must be conceded that this was a most vicious piece of legislation. But it did not stop there. This road belonged to the colony, and yet there was here an audacious attempt—if he might use such a word—on the part of the County Council to appropriate the proceeds of the sale of this land—to apply it to augment the county funds. That was a very peculiar mode of subsidising a local body, and he did not think it should be permitted by the House. If the County Council of Wairarapa was to have a considerable portion of land sold for its especial benefit, then why should not other County Councils have the same? It appeared to him that the Bill would affect the revenue of the country; for, assuming that the land ought to be sold, the money arising from the sale must of necessity be the property of the Crown. Then, the mode in which it was to be disposed of was by private sale; and that was most objectionable. If a portion of the road was to be sold, then it ought to be sold by public auction, and the owners of the adjacent land should compete for it. That was the only way of ascertaining the real value of the land at the present time, and it was the course that ought to be adopted. The honourable member for Wairarapa, if he had understood him aright, said the land here was hilly; but, so far as he had seen by going through the country rather hurriedly, a great portion of it, at any rate, was very level land. But whether it was level or not was beside the question. The principle of the Bill he believed to be vicious, and he thought the Bill should not be allowed to pass its second reading. If it got into Committee he should make the greatest efforts he could to alter the whole character of the Bill, and to endeavour to enforce that the land should be sold by auction, and that the proceeds of the sale should become the property of the Crown. This was another instance of an apparently harmless Bill being pushed through, to the detriment of the country generally, and with great unfairness to other local bodies. It was an insidious attempt to get an improper piece of legislation. In Committee he should oppose the Bill clause by clause.

Mr. HISLOP understood the honourable member for Kaiapoi to say that the late Government objected to the passing of this Bill; but he understood that the objections which had been raised to the Bill had been satisfied or withdrawn. With regard to the remarks made by the honourable gentleman who had last spoken, he might say that the objection to carrying out the suggestion that the land should be sold at auction was, that if that were done the persons who now had land abutting on the street might have the access to their sections taken away from them by persons buying this narrow strip, and they would thereby be placed at a very great disadvantage. As to the Bill itself, there was nothing vicious in the principle of it, unless that was declared to be a vicious principle which was laid down in the Act of 1882, which gave County Councils power to close roads. It had been decided, in a case in which the Selwyn County Council was interested, that the power of closing roads which would be given to the Wairarapa County Council in this case was now vested in other County Councils; so that there was nothing exceptional in this measure. With regard to the appropriation of money, it was specifically appropriated by the Bill, whereas under the law as it now stood, the money could go into the funds generally. The objections the honourable gentleman had raised were really no objections at all. Regarding the Bill itself, he had intended to intimate, when the honourable member for Kaiapoi rose, that the Government did not intend to oppose the Bill, but that they would propose amendments in it. The principal amendment would be as to fixing the price. The price should be subject to its being agreed upon by the Property-tax Commissioner, or some other officer, though the Property-tax Commissioner would probably be the best person; and it should be not less than the price returned for the adjacent property under the property assessment. If that were done, he thought there was nothing wrong in the Bill. The road was unnecessarily wide, and, instead of being a benefit to the public, it was a great tax upon them, and therefore all the parties had agreed to the passing of the Bill.

Mr. W. D. STEWART, as Chairman of the Local Bills Committee, might mention that the various points which had been brought under the consideration of the House had been very carefully considered by the Committee, and the Committee had come to the conclusion that the Bill would result in no injustice whatever to any of the parties interested. The point was simply this—and the honourable member for Dunedin South would no doubt realise its force—that a street three chains wide, in such a place, was found to be inconveniently wide; and if they took the street-frontage from the adjoining proprietors they would do them a very serious injustice, and leave them without access to their properties. Then, the narrowing of the road might be a change which some of the parties did not wish for, and, if their street-frontage was taken away, they were fairly entitled to say that they ought not to suffer, and should have a frontage to the street, and were, at any rate, entitled to have the land as part of their sections, at something like a reasonable figure. He doubted very much whether they should be called upon to pay anything for the land, for the simple reason that it was not right to take away the frontage from any person whose land abutted upon the road without giving compensation. The owners of the land were not the parties moving in this matter; it was the County Council that wished to narrow the road for the purpose of economy, and he did not think they could legally take away the frontage of any person's land without giving him compensation, and it would be a monstrous thing if they were entitled to do so. The simple question was this:

Mr. Fish

What was the best mode of assessing what might be termed the value of the land? It would be unfair to fix the price at a figure which these people were not prepared to give, or to deprive them of their frontages. The remarks of the honourable member were evidently made under the impression that this land was of very considerable value. Supposing a small strip of this country were sold to an outsider at a price which these people could not give, they might thereby be deprived of their frontages, and compelled to sell their sections at a sacrifice. This Bill was not an unfair Bill, and he hoped it would be allowed to pass.

Mr. GUINNESS was sorry to think that the honourable gentleman, as Chairman of the Local Bills Committee, had not gone into the matter as carefully as he ought to have done. He (Mr. Guinness) submitted that it was a question whether this Bill could proceed any further, on the ground that it appropriated part of the colonial funds to the County Council; and he submitted that, before proceeding further, it was necessary to obtain the consent of the Crown to such an appropriation. That had not been done. He thought the Local Bills Committee had failed in their duty in not pointing that out to the House. He would like to hear Mr. Speaker's ruling on the question.

Mr. SPEAKER thought it would be necessary to get the consent of the Crown to the passing of clause 7, but that need not necessarily arrest the progress of the Bill at this stage.

Mr. HISLOP understood that the proceeds of such lands as these were not paid into the general funds of the colony, but into local funds. Although the road might be held by the Crown, it was not to be argued from that that the moneys arising from the sale of this land should be paid into the public fund. The management of the road was vested in the local bodies, which were entitled to the proceeds from it.

Mr. SMITH thought there was some little misunderstanding in reference to this Bill. He thought the honourable member for Dunedin South had not visited the place where it was proposed to alter this road. If he had done so he did not think that the honourable gentleman would have objected to the Bill. This matter had been taken up by the local body, and in consequence of the feeling that existed it was necessary that something should be done. Last winter this township was one of the places he had to canvass, and he found great difficulty in getting about. Only the centre of the road was formed, and the other portion of it was in a very bad state indeed. The township was likely to increase, and therefore it was advisable that this matter should be settled as soon as possible. It was said that the price for those portions of the road which it was proposed to sell should exceed that which was originally given: but that would be a most unfair thing. It would be most unfair to do anything that might deprive those people of their frontages; because they would be put to very great expense in shifting their buildings. This would cost them very much more than the value of the land. The feeling in the locality was that, if a high price were to be placed on the land, it would be better to leave matters as they were. If the original price were charged people might then afford to shift their buildings and have their frontage to the main road. It was a very rough piece of country at present, and it was very difficult to get to the dwellings and business places in the township. It was proposed, therefore, to give the local body power to make the road a chain and a half wide; and he hoped that not only would the Bill be read a second time, but also that no alteration would be made in it in Committee.

Mr. SAMUEL said he had very carefully considered this Bill, and was of opinion that it was one the House ought to pass. There were certain peculiar inconveniences in the procedure under the Act of 1882, which might make it very inconvenient to the local body to proceed under that Act, and the object of this Bill was to get rid of those inconveniences. The proceeds from this land, if closed and sold under the Counties Act in the ordinary course, would go to the local body, and therefore there was no force in the remarks of the honourable member for Dunedin South as to the unfairness of providing by the Bill that the County Council should get the proceeds of sale. The honourable gentleman's remarks were quite beside the question.

Mr. VALENTINE had much pleasure in supporting this Bill. The Committee to whom this Bill was referred inquired very carefully into the various circumstances in connection with the proposed disposal of this land, and were satisfied that the Bill was necessary in the interests of the settlers. It was the intention of the County Council to narrow this road, for the purpose of better securing the maintenance of it and, at the same time, affording better means of communication to the settlers. He understood that there were certain natural features in connection with this land which made the road rather difficult to get at. The roadways into the farms would be improved if the strip of land not required for this road were handed over to the settlers. He was assured by the honourable gentleman in charge of the Bill that there was no intention to charge more than the upset price for the land, which, he believed, was something like £1 an acre. It would be very unjust indeed to the settlers now occupying these farms if they had to pay a "fancy" price for the land; and to take away the present frontages would be even a greater injustice than to raise the price. He hoped the County Council would get the powers they asked for in this Bill, for the better keeping of the road.

Mr. BEETHAM, in reply, believed the honourable gentlemen who were in favour of the Bill appreciated the intentions of the measure; but he was sure the honourable member for Dunedin South had not. That honourable gentleman could not possibly conceive the position of the township, or he would never have made the remarks he did make. If the honourable gentleman would read the Bill he would see that it was simply a Bill to give the settlers what they had a right to demand. What the honourable member for Woodville had said was perfectly true, that only a width of 14ft. in the centre was formed, and the rest of the road, in winter-time, was a mud-hole. He should be glad as far as possible to meet the views of honourable members in Committee; his only wish would be to do justice to the colony, the district, and the Bill he had under his charge.

OTAGO HARBOUR BOARD BILL.

Mr. ROSS, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said he would occupy not more than a few minutes of the time of the House. This Bill, though a Harbour Board Bill, was not an empowering Bill; it authorised no borrowing, neither did it confer any additional endowments. On these grounds he anticipated no objection from the Young New Zealand party in the House. The object of the Bill was simply to rectify omissions in the Act of 1883, and to make some necessary provisions in connection with the election of members. Clause 6 of the Act of 1883 provided that "The first election of the elective members of the Board shall be held in November, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three;" and clause 7 provided that "The elective members shall come into office on their election, and shall hold office from the time of their election until the election of members of the Board, to be held in November, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-five." No provision, however, was made for any subsequent elections. The Bill now under consideration supplied this omission. Another clause provided for the representation of the now-existing Dunedin Chamber of Commerce. By the Act of 1883 the Chamber of Commerce was authorised to elect a member of the Board. The interpretation clause of that Act, however, defined "Chamber of Commerce" to be "the present association in the City of Dunedin known as the 'Dunedin Chamber of Commerce.'" Since the passing of the Act of 1883 the then existing Chamber had been dissolved, and another Chamber of Commerce had been constituted and incorporated. This Bill provided that the authority to elect a member to the Harbour Board be conferred on the present association or on future associations which might succeed it. Another provision in the Bill substituted the second Monday in February for the second Monday in November: this is rendered necessary in consequence of the adjournment of this House which took place at the commencement of the present session having prevented this Bill becoming law in time to allow of the elections taking place in November. As the date must thus necessarily be altered, it was thought better to provide that the election should take place in February, on the same day as that fixed by "The Harbours Act, 1878," for holding Harbour Board elections in the colony. He would not detain the House longer, as other clauses in the Bill might be dealt with in Committee. He moved the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. FISH should not oppose this Bill, although, before the second reading was agreed to, he should like to say that he was very doubtful whether the Dunedin Chamber of Commerce should have special representation on this Board. It was a body which was constantly changing; it had exceedingly little weight in Dunedin, and recently it passed out of existence altogether. It was a body which was not fairly representative of the trade of the community, and it was notorious that it existed more for the dissemination of "cliquism" than for any useful purpose. He was free to admit that the gentleman who occupied a seat on the Board for the Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Donald Reid, was one of the best members the Board had; but he saw by the papers that Mr. Reid did not intend to continue his seat on the Board. He (Mr. Fish) very much doubted whether the Chamber of Commerce of Dunedin, or indeed any other Chamber of Commerce in the colony, should have special representation on these Boards. This particular Chamber was, he thought, the weakest one in any of the large towns of the colony. Although he would not oppose the Bill, he thought it just as well that Chambers of Commerce should not have special representation on these Boards.

Mr. ROSS wished merely to point out that this Bill did not interfere at all with the constitution of the Board.

PUKEKOHE BOROUGH BILL.

Mr. HAMLIN, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said the necessity for it had arisen owing to the fact that "The Municipal Corporations Act, 1886," repealed the Town Districts Act. A petition was presented to the Governor requiring that the land set forth in the schedule to the Bill should be formed into a town district. At the present time the Road Board at Pukekohe was unable to pay proper attention to that growing township, and therefore a petition had been signed, praying that the township should be created into a borough under the Municipal Corporations Act. The Municipal Corporations Act provided that no borough should be formed unless there were a hundred householders in the township. Unfortunately, Pukekohe had not quite that number at the present time; but the township was rapidly increasing in population, and it was absolutely necessary for the health of the people that drainage and other works should be undertaken. The reason the Bill was asked for was that the Road Board did not pay proper attention to the wants of that particular spot: hence it was that they desired to be constituted a borough, so as to carry out drainage and other necessary works. He might state that during the election people, in going to the Courthouse, had to wade half-way up to their knees in mud and water; and that was not an unusual thing in that township.

Mr. FISH thought this was a very objectionable Bill. It sought to turn a small town into a borough, and he thought the policy of the House should be to prevent small places from assuming the more dignified functions of a borough. The honourable gentleman said there were only forty or fifty householders in this township.

Mr. HAMLIN.—I did not say that.

Mr. FISH said, at any rate there were under one hundred householders in the town; and, if that was so, surely it was premature to ask that the place should be made into a borough. In this case there seemed to be no provision for a petition sent to the Governor being advertised. The honourable gentleman had stated that one reason for bringing in this measure was that the Road Board did not give proper attention to the place. That was surely a fault that could be remedied by the people of the district bringing pressure to bear on the Road Board. As to drainage, surely a small hamlet like Pukekohe could not require much in the way of drainage. No doubt the thing was a very small affair altogether; it was so small that he thought the House should not be asked to legislate upon it, thus making a special case of it. He failed to see why the House should pass the Bill. It was one of the most notable instances of parish-vestry legislation that he had ever seen introduced into the House. He would oppose the Bill.

Mr. SAMUEL was strongly opposed to this Bill, and he hoped the House would not allow it to be read a second time. To allow the Bill to be read a second time would be to agree to the principle of the Bill, which was a departure from the principles embodied in "The Municipal Corporations Act, 1886." By that Act the Town Districts Act was repealed, and it was rendered no longer possible for these small places to form themselves into towns; nor should the House now permit them to form themselves into boroughs. He considered that one of the greatest evils in the colony was the desire of so many settlers in small districts to have municipal bodies, and to rush into public-works expenditure, and into loans. This was all of a piece with many other acts of small bodies of that description. People in business in small townships said, "Let us make this a grander place; let us get concrete footpaths, drainage, and waterworks." These people had frequently nothing to lose themselves, and they entailed heavy taxation on those who came after them to occupy the town. That had been one of the greatest evils the colony had laboured under—namely, the high rates entailed by the action of local bodies. He considered that the local government of the colony was greatly at fault, the bodies often carrying out their duties most inefficiently and extravagantly. The Bill seemed to have no excuse whatever on the face of it; and, if the honourable gentleman in charge of the Bill wished to make it legal for small places to form themselves into municipalities, let him endeavour to amend the Municipal Corporations Act so as to make it possible for other small places to do the same; but do not let the House—except for some exceptional reason—allow this Bill to pass, and thus make an exception of one case.

Mr. PEACOCK said the honourable member who had just spoken had expressed in a great measure his opinions upon this subject. He thought the House should be very careful in departing from the general principle embodied in the Municipal Corporations Act—that the machinery for a borough should only be brought into play where there was a sufficient number of inhabitants. In this case it was intended to get behind that Act, not only in regard to the number of inhabitants required to petition, but also in regard to the stipulation that the revenue from rates, on the ordinary scale of one shilling on annual value or three farthings on capital value, should not be less than £250 exclusive of subsidies. They should see that exceptions were not made without very good reasons being shown. He had heard no such reasons given in the present case. The honourable member for Dunedin South was, however, in error in stating that no provision was made for making public the fact of the presentation of the petition. The subsections of section 24 of the Act to be left out were (2), (3), and (6). Subsection (5) would still make it imperative that the petition should be publicly notified before presentation to the Governor. On the general principle that the House should not readily depart from the provisions of the Municipal Corporations Act, or countenance very small bodies forming themselves into boroughs, he would oppose the Bill.

Mr. HOBBS could quite understand the honourable member for Ponsonby and the honourable member for Dunedin South, who came from large cities, not being able to grasp the position; and he could quite understand the honourable member for New Plymouth also not being able to grasp the position. There was every excuse for this Bill. The people had been clamouring for it for the last few years. He hoped the House, and especially the country members, would take a broader view of the matter, and not be influenced by the opinions of city members, who did not understand the circumstances at all. He always noticed that the city members were opposed to assistance being granted to local bodies in managing their own affairs. He hoped the House would give the people what was asked for in the Bill.

Mr. W. D. STEWART said this Bill was carefully inquired into when it came before the Local Bills Committee. The inhabitants of the place were unanimously in favour of the Bill. From the explanations given to the Committee it seemed that the part of the district referred to in the Bill was somewhat isolated, and had not that interest, so to speak, in common with the other portions of the district which it should have, and had not received that consideration as regards improvements and local expenditure which it should receive. He had gone into the matter very carefully, and he did not think an injustice would be done to any one if the Bill were allowed to pass.

Mr. HISLOP said, apart altogether from the principle of the Municipal Corporations Act, he did not see why this measure should be allowed to pass. He believed that the House had only on one previous occasion made a departure from the Municipal Corporations Act, and that was in the case of Campbelltown. But the circumstances which were shown to exist in the case of Campbelltown had not been shown to exist in this instance. He did not think that small localities should be encouraged to detach themselves from the local governing bodies. He did not think the House ought to allow this Bill to pass.

Mr. FELDWICK would not have risen had not the Colonial Secretary referred to Campbelltown. He (Mr. Feldwick) had a hand in the passing of the Bill which enabled Campbelltown to become a borough. Since then that borough had made astonishing progress, which fact alone would induce him to vote for this Bill.

Mr. LAWRY happened to be very familiar with the district dealt with in the Bill, and he could corroborate the remarks which had fallen from the honourable member for Franklin South. At the present time the place was, comparatively speaking, a small one, but it was situated in one of the best districts in the North Island. A number of the most bonâ fide settlers in the whole colony were settled there, and he looked upon the place as one destined to grow into a town of great importance. He did not believe in introducing exceptional legislation, but if it was justifiable at all it was justifiable in a case like this. He thought the honourable member for New Plymouth made a mistake in condemning these people for desiring to have footpaths, drainage, and so on. He had always looked upon these as necessities of life, and it was for that reason he would support the second reading of the Bill. Pukekohe was situated in a beautiful district, and, although some parts of it were practically waterless, still there were magnificent springs in the neighbourhood which might be utilised at little cost; and this could perhaps be best accomplished if it were formed into a borough.

Mr. GUINNESS thought it would be wrong to grant this concession to a small village like Pukekohe. The principle of allowing these small communities to establish governing bodies had been carried too far even in the Act of 1886, and it would yet be found that they would be a curse to the colony, not only in respect to the existence of so large a number of these small boroughs, but through the fact that they would stand in the way of the establishment of a proper system of local government to counteract the centralisation which was increasing year by year. He would therefore move, That the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Mr. TAYLOR said it seemed to him that this was a very important matter, and there was a very large principle at stake, notwithstanding what had been said by the Colonial Secretary to the contrary. It was a matter which entirely affected the people living in the district, and, although there were not a sufficient number of persons there now to enable them to apply under the Municipal Corporations Act to constitute themselves into a borough, still the remarks made by honourable gentlemen who were intimately acquainted with the locality showed that before long there would be more than sufficient. The honourable member for New Plymouth objected to the establishment of small local bodies because they wanted to form footpaths; but he (Mr. Taylor) would like to know why they should not have footpaths as well as the people in the large towns.

Mr. SAMUEL explained that what he objected to was, that these small places wanted to raise loans to form footpaths and such things.

Mr. TAYLOR said those loans would be expended for the benefit of the people, and the large property-owners in the neighbourhood had quite enough power to protect themselves under the Municipal Corporations Act. He hoped the Bill would pass.

Mr. FISH did not think a single argument had been used to justify the House in passing legislation of this kind. It was really absurd that a small place with fifty or sixty houses in it should want to assume the functions of a Borough Council. It was entirely against the spirit of the Municipal Corporations Act. He thought the House would be acting most wisely in reading the Bill a second time that day six months, not so much on account of the trifling case now under consideration as to discourage honourable members from troubling the House with such matters.

Mr. HAMLIN said that most of the arguments used against the Bill had been raised by gentlemen who enjoyed all the benefits of having beautiful roads, footpaths, waterworks, and everything they wanted. Under this Bill no loan was asked for; and the people were ready to put their hands into their own pockets to do the necessary works, so as to benefit persons travelling through the district. He would like to see the honourable member for Dunedin South, the honourable member for Ponsonby, and the honourable member for Greymouth arrive at Pukekohe by train at about half-past six, and have to walk through the town; and if they did not come back to the House and say, "Pass the Bill at once—pass it through all its stages at a single sitting," he did not understand what the feelings of those gentlemen could be. The fact was that those honourable gentlemen seemed to think that this place was a suburb close to a large city, whereas it was thirty-one miles from Auckland by railway. The township was growing fast, and required some works to be instituted at once; and the Road Board there had such a large district under its control that it could not attend to the wants of the borough. The House was told that this would put a stop to a proper system of local government; but he would like to ask, who was it that assisted in doing away with the system which had been in existence? Who slipped into the Municipal Corporations Act a clause repealing the Town Districts Act, so that even the Government did not know that that Act had been repealed until the 23rd December last? He had himself been in correspondence with the Government on this matter, and on that date he received an urgent telegram from them saying that he was to consider that all the correspondence which had taken place was withdrawn, as they had just found a clause in the Municipal Corporations Act repealing the Town Districts Act; otherwise they would have supported the application. That was the reason why this Bill was brought in. But they found that, whenever anything was brought in to benefit the people and do good to the country, there were none so ready to rush in and cry out about foolish people and silly people, and so on, as those who lived in large cities. He was sorry for people who took up that position, because the time might come when an opportunity would be afforded to people in the country of expressing their opinions on certain other matters. He felt inclined to quote an old fable, but perhaps he had better not, as it might compel Mr. Speaker to call him to order. He hoped the House would throw aside all the little special-pleadings which had been urged by certain honourable members, and would allow this Bill to pass. As he had said before, they asked the House for no endowment and for no loan. The land was of such value that there would be sufficient money raised to carry out in a proper manner all the works that were required.

GISBORNE HARBOUR BOARD BILL.

Mr. GRAHAM moved the second reading of this Bill. It was an amending Bill that did not ask for fresh borrowing powers, but it was rendered necessary through certain ambiguities in the wording of the original Act, under which the Board had done certain things that they thought they were perfectly entitled to do, but as to which doubts had since arisen. He would briefly go through the several clauses. As to clause 3, when the poll for sanctioning the harbour loan was taken the plan on which the ratepayers voted was the plan prepared by Sir John Coode, the wording of the original Act being,—

"The construction of, at or near the site reported upon by Sir John Coode, a breakwater to afford refuge and accommodation for vessels of large tonnage, and to reclaim and use such portions of the foreshore and land beneath the sea adjoining the harbour as may be necessary for the construction of such works and for purposes incidental thereto."

Thus, Sir John Coode's plan was put before the ratepayers when the poll was taken; but afterwards, when the loan had been raised and the Board had funds and were able to have fresh surveys made, it was found that some of the information which had been supplied to Sir John Coode, and on which he had based his plans, was not quite correct, and therefore the plan adopted had been one modified—to not a very large extent—from that of Sir John Coode. There had consequently been some doubt as to the validity of the poll, owing to the actual plan adopted not being before the ratepayers when the poll was taken. The plan on which the work was now proceeding had been approved by the Government, but it was thought to be desirable to remove all possibility of doubt by this proposed formal validation. Clause 4 was to validate the putting-aside of £25,000 of the loan as a sinking fund. This was not originally intended when the Act was passed; but, after the loan papers had been sent to London, the Board's financial agents—the Union Bank of Australia—wired out that it would assist in the success of the loan very materially if this were done; and the Board considered it and agreed to it. Of course the Board thought at the time that it had full power to do so; but in this case, too, doubts had since been raised. The arrangement had given general satisfaction, as it had given confidence to the lenders of the money, the loan being floated at a very good price; and the sinking fund was now invested at high interest. This clause 4 was to validate what had been done in that respect. Clauses 5, 6, 7, and 8 were in reference to the construction of a short line of railway found to be necessary in order to get stone for the making of the breakwater from the beach—three or four miles distant. It was thought at first that the Board had power to do the work under the Public Works Act; but on applying to the department the Colonial Secretary had advised that the proper course was to get authority under a special Act, and the recommendation of the Government was followed in these clauses. Clauses 9, 10, and 11 were necessary on account of the ambiguous wording of the original Act as to the maximum rating-power. It had been intended that the maximum should be 1d. on country property and 2d. on town property; but, on account of the ambiguous wording he had referred to, it was thought desirable to make the matter quite clear. The poll had been taken on the understanding that the maximum rating-power was 1d. and 2d., and it was proposed now to clearly declare that. Clauses 12 and 13 were to give extended powers to the Board for leasing a part of their endowments. The Board had a very large block of land called the Tauwhareparae Block, situated in a rather inaccessible part of the country, and the land and its position were of such a nature that it was difficult to find tenants for it at all under the powers of leasing which the Board now had, and it was thought the land might be used to much greater advantage if the Board were given the power of dealing with it under the provisions of the general Land Act, including the perpetual-leasing clauses. These were the main points of the Bill, which he hoped would receive the support of honourable members; but, if there was any objection to particular clauses, he trusted honourable members would allow the second reading to be passed, and raise their objections in Committee. The Bill was very necessary to the Board, as it was possible that, without it, the levying of a rate might be resisted; and if the rate could not be collected the Board would not be in a position to pay their interest, and therefore there would be serious difficulty to face. He trusted the second reading would now be agreed to, and he would be prepared to meet any criticism on points of detail in Committee. The Bill was absolutely necessary in order that the Board might have the means to meet its obligations in the payment of interest. He begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. PEACOCK did not rise to oppose the Bill, as he thought most of its objects mentioned by the honourable member for the East Coast were good ones, such as rectifying possible informalities, with respect to the want of plans when the Gazette was published, the validation of the setting-aside of a portion of the loan as a sinking fund in the interests of the bondholders, and the using of a portion of the loan fund for the purpose of making a railway to get the stone for the harbour works. But one clause bore a very different complexion, and to this he would like to call the attention of the House. The last part of clause 4 read,—

“And whereas the Harbour Board has, prior to the passing of ‘The Harbours Act 1878 Amendment Act, 1886,’ and of this Act, incurred an overdraft at the bank on the General Account: Be it enacted that it shall be lawful for the Harbour Board to advance such sum from the Loan Account as shall be sufficient to pay off such overdraft, provided the Harbour Board shall refund one-tenth part of such sum to the Loan Account out of the general revenue of the Board during each year for ten years after the passing of this Act: Provided, however, that the premium of four thousand one hundred and seven pounds five shillings, or thereabouts, incurred by the Board on the floating of the loan shall not be deemed to be overdraft, or part thereof, requiring repayment.”

It seemed from this that an overdraft to an indefinite amount, which had not been stated, had been incurred at the bank on General Account, and it was proposed to repay it in the meantime from the loan fund: that was, money borrowed purely for the harbour works was to be applied to paying off this overdraft used for general purposes, the amount to be recouped to the loan fund at the rate of one-tenth a year for ten years. That was a proposal which, he thought, required very careful looking into, because it was generally held to be most undesirable that money borrowed expressly for one purpose should be applied to another, unless there were very urgent reasons for so doing. One other point he would call attention to was this. In clause 6 it was stated,—

He thought it a wise provision that notifications required under the Public Works Act should be published in the Gazette, to be made known throughout the colony to more people than were resident within a small district. This was a point, however, which could be rectified in Committee; but he hoped the honourable gentleman, in his reply, would give some explanation of the proposal to take money from the loan fund to pay an overdraft used for general purposes.

Mr. SAMUEL said the honourable gentleman who had just sat down had drawn attention to the two points which had struck him as being objectionable features—first, the provision for repaying overdraft out of loan; and, secondly, the alteration of the existing law to dispense with the necessity of advertising, and also with the necessity of obtaining a Proclamation by the Governor in Council. But, of course, these were matters which might be amended in Committee. With regard to the overdraft there was something misleading in the Bill. It recited, “And whereas the Harbour Board has, prior to the passing of ‘The Harbours Act 1878 Amendment Act, 1886,’ and of this Act, incurred an overdraft at the bank on General Account,” as the reason for this proposed legislation. But the Harbours Act of 1886 made no alteration in the then existing law as to the power of Harbour Boards in regard to overdrafts. Overdrawing was illegal previous to that Act, just as it had been ever since, and the Act of 1886 only imposed a penalty upon any member who participated in such an illegal act. There had been no alteration in the law as to the illegality of an overdraft by the Act of 1886, and therefore it seemed desirable that these misleading words should be taken out of the Bill. As to legalising the repayment of the overdraft, that was a matter upon which there could be very little doubt as to what the House ought to do. If a local body, acting with the best intentions on behalf of the people whom it represented, incurred an overdraft and spent the money for the good of the district, the House should show indulgence and allow the money to be paid off. There was one other feature in the Bill to which he would call attention, and he felt the more interest in this matter because the Harbour Board which had jurisdiction over the district he represented had recently had some litigation in connection with a similar matter. The 4th clause said,—

“Whereas the Gisborne Harbour Board has, in pursuance of powers vested in it by the principal Act, borrowed two hundred thousand pounds upon debentures, and has entered into engagements with the debenture-holders that, in order to better secure the repayment of the sum so borrowed, a sum of twenty-five thousand pounds out of the proceeds of the said loan should be set aside and invested as a sinking fund: And whereas such sum has been set aside and invested, and doubts have arisen as to whether such investment could be lawfully made: It is hereby declared that, notwithstanding anything contained in the principal Act or ‘The Harbours Act, 1878,’ or any amendment thereof, requiring the proceeds of any loan to be expended in the construction of works or otherwise, the appropriation to sinking fund hereinbefore recited is hereby validated as if authorised and sanctioned by the principal Act, and the interest from time to time accruing therefrom may be lawfully paid into the General Account of the Harbour Board.”

Now, it was very important that the House should not legislate in any way in contravention of the agreement made by a Harbour Board with the persons who had lent them money, and he thought that the House should have, when it went into Committee upon the Bill, a copy of the agreement which had been made with the debenture-holders, and a copy of the instructions which were issued to any bank which floated the loan, in order that there might be no mistake upon the point. There had been very expensive litigation in connection with a matter of this sort by the Harbour Board of New Plymouth, and he should like to prevent the Gisborne Board being drawn into a similar difficulty. With regard to the provision that interest on the £25,000 should be paid into the harbour fund, and appropriated, he presumed, to general purposes, that was distinctly opposed to the present law. The Act of 1886 provided very clearly that interest should follow the principal fund; and, if the £25,000 was to be paid to the Sinking Fund Commissioners, then the accumulations of interest must also be paid to the Commissioners, and could not be appropriated to general purposes. If this Board had raised its loan while the law was in that condition it was manifestly inequitable that the terms on which the loan was raised should be varied, especially seeing that the debenture-holders would know nothing of what it was proposed to do. With regard to setting aside £25,000 for the purpose of forming a sinking fund, that seemed to be scarcely fair to the ratepayers, who assented to the loan upon the distinct understanding that the £200,000 was to be spent for harbour purposes, not that £25,000 was to be spent in forming a sinking fund. But the ratepayers were close by, they knew of the provision that it was proposed to insert in the Bill, and if they did not object he did not see why the House should object to it on that ground. But the debenture-holders could not take any steps for protecting themselves, not being in the colony; and it was the duty of the House to protect them. Therefore that provision, as far as it affected them, should not be consented to until the agreement was produced and it was shown that they would not be prejudicially affected.

Mr. FISH said that the points which had been referred to by the last speaker were those which had suggested themselves to him as being most objectionable. The introduction of the Bill showed one thing clearly—that the Gisborne Harbour Board had recklessly gone outside their powers as defined by the Act previously passed, and the House was now asked to validate illegal action. It seemed to him that if the House passed Acts of this kind it was simply encouraging local bodies to go outside of their powers—powers which would never have been given if the House had thought that they would be used as they had been used. It seemed to him that the House should punish in some way—and the only way in which it could punish was to refuse legislation of this kind—bodies who recklessly or carelessly went beyond the powers which the House had given into their hands. It would appear, from the 3rd clause of the Bill, that the Board had not complied with the former Act in the way of preparing plans—surely a reckless piece of neglect; and now the House was asked to remedy that. To do so would be adopting a dangerous principle. It was quite possible that had the plans been published as provided for the people would have objected to them. He understood, further, that the Board had departed from the recommendations of Sir John Coode, who was employed at great expense to give them plans of the work. The second thing which the Board had done was evidently illegal: they had made some private arrangement with the bondholders, outside the Act, to deposit a certain sum of money—£25,000 taken from the borrowed money—to form a sinking fund as additional security for the bondholders. Now, the Board had no right to do that; and, if the Board had agreed with the bondholders to exceed their powers under the Act, the House had no right to consider the bondholders for one moment. The Board and the bondholders should not be lifted out of an illegal position by retrospective legislation to be passed in their favour. The House could not be too careful or insist too strongly upon local bodies' observing the conditions and terms of the Act under which they were working, because, if illegal actions were loosely or recklessly validated, then local bodies would be found willing to accept any Act they could get, knowing that they could simply exceed their powers, and then come to the House for validation of their sins of omission and commission. If a local body fell into an error owing to a misadventure, then, of course, it was reasonable to validate its action. That was a very different thing. But the wrong in this instance could not have been without full knowledge that wrong was being done. They should have acted under legal advice; and, if they had acted under legal advice, and still had done wrong, then, as frequently happened, they had been badly advised. The honourable gentleman who had spoken last said that there could be no objection to the latter part of this clause 4—that was, that they should be allowed to take a certain sum of amount out of the Loan Account to pay off an overdraft at the bank; and, further, that they should repay the money to the Loan Account in periodical payments. If the House passed that clause it would give the Board power to divert the £25,000 and apply it to purposes foreign to those contemplated by the original Bill. It was all very well for the honourable member in charge of the Bill to say that no harm could come, and that the money would be paid back out of the general revenue of the Board in sums of so much a year for ten years. It was all very well to put a clause of that kind in the Bill; but what guarantee was there that such money would be paid back? It had already been seen that the Board was regardless of the law; and how could the House be sure that it would not break this provision as it had broken others which were not agreeable to it? The House would lose all control if it passed a Bill of this kind, and the Board might, at its own sweet will, pay the money back or not. He did not believe in slipshod legislation of this kind. The House could not be too careful how it passed by breaches of the law, for they knew that local bodies were too fond of breaking laws which put them under proper restrictions as to expenditure. If members of local bodies broke the law they should be made to feel that they were, individually and collectively, liable to pay for their mistakes. That was the proper system, and would impose a salutary check upon imprudent and improper expenditure. There was another thing which the Board wanted, and which appeared to be a very objectionable thing. The latter part of clause 6 said,—

The doings of the Board had an effect far beyond the locality in which the works were carried on, and the only means whereby the public generally, to a greater or less extent, could have notice of what the Board was doing was by requiring notice to be given in the Gazette. The notice in the Gazette should therefore be insisted on, and, if the Bill went into Committee, as he had no doubt it would do, he should move to have that portion of the clause struck out.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Give the other Bills a chance.

Mr. FISH.—An honourable gentleman said, “Give the other Bills a chance.” His opinion was that the House gave too great facilities for passing Bills of this character, and that the sooner honourable gentlemen looked personally more into legislation brought before the House by private members the better it would be for the country. He would like the honourable gentleman who moved the second reading, in his reply, to state whether the enlargement of the reserve meant the acquisition of any further lands for harbour purposes. He would not detain the House further; but he thought it was necessary to make the few remarks he had made, because it appeared to him that they were asked to validate wrongs on the part of the Gisborne Harbour Board which they ought not to be asked to validate, and which no local body ought to have committed.

Mr. MILLS said that members of the party to which he belonged had been severely criticized the other evening by the honourable member for Dunedin South because, after it had been understood that they intended to oppose these Harbour Bills, and had voted against the Wanganui Harbour Bill, they afterwards had passed the measure introduced by the honourable member for Napier. He now wished to explain that they drew a distinction between those Bills. They felt very strongly that the time had come when all the Loan Bills for harbour purposes should be subjected to the severest scrutiny. The colony was being deluged with these Harbour Board borrowing Bills and Bills for the creation of new harbours in all directions; and he, at all events, thought that the time had come when the Government should exercise some supervision over them, with a view to placing some check on them. The time was not far distant when the House would have to face the question of taking over a great many of these harbour loans, because the districts would not be able to bear the very great strain upon them of taxation for the purpose of paying the interest. Having that in view, the House should be very jealous of giving any further borrowing powers to harbours already in existence, and also for the creation of new harbours. He and those who were acting with him intended to criticize very closely any scheme which came before the House for the creation of new harbours and for further borrowing, and unless a very strong case were presented there would be a very large vote against it. This Bill, however, did not seem to come within that category, because it appeared to be a Bill for the purpose of amending what had been defective in the previous Act, and also of validating certain acts of the Gisborne Harbour Board which had been illegally done under some misapprehension of the law. There was no provision for further borrowing, and the Legislature was asked to confirm a very wise provision for setting apart a sum annually as a sinking fund for the repayment of the loans. He therefore intended to support the second reading of the Bill, but no doubt in Committee several alterations would be made.

Dr. NEWMAN did not know which honourable member of the Ministry was going to act as Minister of Marine during the recess; but, whether it would be the Premier or the Minister of Education, he would like to ask him if he would see, during the recess, that the Engineer-in-Chief of the colony went to Gisborne and examined the whole thing, with a view to report upon it before the next sitting of Parliament. He said this advisedly, because, having been there, and having taken a considerable interest in the harbour, he thought the harbour was not made at all in accordance with the plan of Sir John Coode, and it was a question whether it would not be advisable to stop the harbour works half-way, and, instead of going on with the expenditure of £200,000, consider whether it would not be better to expend £80,000, and stop there. The expenditure and liabilities already incurred amounted to some £50,000, and he believed they were pledged to works to the extent of another £30,000, and that expenditure must take the work to such a point as to make it profitable. This Bill was a very striking instance of the slipshod way in which the House allowed Bills to go through. What had happened was this: In 1884 the House, with very little thought, allowed the Bill to go through. On the report of Sir John Coode the House agreed that there should be a wharf run out, with lattice-work below in order that the travelling sand and shingle should run through it; but the new engineer of the Board had shifted the point of the breakwater, and had made it solid instead of being of lattice-work. This, he (Dr. Newman) believed, was a great mistake; and, instead of the wall being a long way away from the river, it was at the mouth of the river, and the consequence would be that the silt would come down in large masses, get mixed with the sand which the wall deposited there, and so block the entrance. The House should take into consideration whether the expenditure on this harbour should go on or not; and he trusted the Minister of Marine would send some one to look after it. Regarding the Bill itself, there were some very objectionable clauses in it. For instance, clauses 10 and 11 actually gave to the Harbour Board, a purely irresponsible body, the power of levying double the rate it had before. When the Bill came up three years ago it was agreed that the rating of the Borough of Gisborne should be 1d. and of the country districts 3d. That was agreed to, and on that agreement the inhabitants of the country districts voted for the loan. But three years had only just gone, and the Bill was brought in again and double rating-powers were asked for. He felt certain that a large number of the people who had voted for the loan would not have done so had they known that their properties for miles around were to be taxed to such an extent as was now proposed. From letters he had received, and from other information which had been forwarded to him, it seemed to him to be a very grave question indeed whether, if the whole of the £200,000 were expended, anything like the floating palaces of the U.S.S. Company could go alongside; and, if that was the case, the £200,000 might be absolutely thrown away, but the unfortunate district would be taxed for the next thirty years to the extent of £12,000 a year, and for many years after that to a lesser extent, and all for nothing. This was the result of allowing second- or third-rate engineers to take in hand these works: and he had begun to believe that Sir John Coode's visit had been an absolute curse to the colony. Everywhere he had been asked to give his opinion, as an engineer, as to whether certain works could be constructed, leaving out of consideration the question whether they ought to be constructed. No doubt works could be constructed almost anywhere in the wide ocean; and the result of his opinions had been that every poor little district had been encouraged to believe that it should spend unlimited sums of money. Looking at the Bill, clause 4 seemed to contain one of those old childish principles of banking which he should have thought had been exploded in the last century. In England a hundred years ago if the Government borrowed a million of money it put by a sinking fund. But that had long been considered absurd, and the idea was annihilated by Dr. Hamilton, and since then no Government had thought of acting upon such a fallacy. The Board had borrowed £200,000, and actually the first thing they did was to set aside £25,000 which they were never to spend at all. Then, why on earth did they borrow it? All he could say was that the Board must have been misled by its bankers into doing so childish a thing. It would have been far better to have borrowed only £175,000 and to have expended it, and, if they must have a sinking fund, to have had a sinking fund of 1 or 1½ per cent., and then the debt of the place would have been less by £25,000 than now. Then, clause 12 of the new Bill, which dealt with the power of leasing the endowments, proposed to give power to lease for the extravagantly long period of sixty-five years. That, he thought, was allowing the dead hand too much power. A period of twenty-one or of forty-two years at the outside ought to be the longest period for which land should be leased. He hoped the Bill would be very seriously amended in Committee, and that the Minister of Marine would consent to get a report upon the harbour works, and lay it before the House, so that the House could see whether the money had been properly applied, and, if necessary, when another £30,000 had been expended, the colony should step in and refuse power, if need be, to waste a further sum of £125,000.

Mr. FISHER said the honourable member for Port Chalmers and the honourable member for Thorndon had dealt solely with a point which ought to have been discussed three years ago. They had raised the question of the advisableness or otherwise of proceeding with this work. The proper time to have discussed that question was when the Bill of 1884 was before the House, and he submitted that it was a little late in the day to discuss it now. He had listened with great interest to the speech of the honourable member for Dunedin South, and he must confess that it had had the effect of convincing him that they ought to pass this Bill. What did the Bill propose to do? The Board proposed, in answer to the representations of the bondholders, he assumed, that additional rating-powers should be taken in order to enable it to meet the interest charge. That appeared to him a reasonable proposition, and one the Board had every right to make. The honourable member for Thorndon said that the work itself ought not to be allowed to proceed beyond a certain point, and that nothing beyond a specified sum which he named ought to be expended. If that contention was correct, surely the honourable gentleman could have no objection to the sum of £25,000 being tied up in the way proposed. The objection to the principle of a sinking fund had nothing to do with the point. There was the fact that the Board itself proposed to set aside for a specific period a sum of £25,000.

An Hon. MEMBER.—It has done so.

Mr. FISHER.—Well, instead of being blamed the Board ought to be commended for the course it had adopted; for, having discovered that certain irregularities and informalities had arisen, they spontaneously and voluntarily came to the House and asked to be put in a legal position—a position in which they could legitimately meet any questions such as had been mentioned. He would also ask if this was the first local body in the colony which had got into such a position. He had a vivid recollection of many other local bodies which had perpetrated irregularities much more serious than these, and it had devolved upon the House to pull them out of those difficulties. It appeared to him that the Board was taking the most honest and businesslike steps to get out of its difficulties. If there had been irregularities in the past, the blame ought not to be thrown upon the shoulders of those who at the present moment were doing their best to get the Board out of its trouble. He did not think much more need be said as to the Bill itself. As to the creation of a very large overdraft, although such a thing was by no means uncommon with local bodies, he was prepared to say that it was very improper; but the Board appeared to him to have done the best thing any body of men could do, as they had proposed to liquidate the overdraft as soon as they were able to do so. It appeared that they proposed to pay it off in ten years; and they asked the Legislature to make provision to insure that the overdraft should in due course be paid off.

On the whole, he considered the Board had placed before the Legislature a very fair mode for the payment of this money, and also for getting out of its difficulties.

Mr. PERCEVAL said that when this Bill came before the Local Bills Committee it struck him and other members of the Committee that it was a very fair Bill, and one that ought to be agreed to by the House. The objection raised to the plans was a mere technical objection. There was some slight deviation, some slight inaccuracy, in the plans, but it was considered by the Committee of a trivial character. He did not at all agree with the remarks made with reference to the sinking fund. It appeared to him to be a very wise precaution to take to set apart £25,000 of the original loan as a sinking fund, and he thought the Board were to be commended for it. It did appear, at first sight, rather serious to permit the Board to pay its overdraft out of loan; but, as he understood the matter, this overdraft was incurred in connection with the works. There were certain authorised works, and there were certain works which had to be done in connection with the works which were not strictly authorised, and, as he understood the matter, this overdraft was incurred in the construction of these works. The proposal to pay off the overdraft in the manner contemplated in clause 4 was, he thought, one that the House should not take exception to. They ought, he thought, to assist local bodies out of the difficulties which they had got into in the proper exercise of their functions. Clauses 10 and 11, he must confess, appeared to him to be rather in conflict with the original Act, because the original Act limited the rating to 1d., and it appeared to him somewhat pernicious to pass an Act increasing the rate, which had been restricted by the original Act. But that could be considered more carefully in Committee. There were several inaccuracies in the Bill, which had been pointed out by the honourable member for New Plymouth and others, and these could also be amended in Committee; but he hoped the House would pass the second reading of this measure, because he thought the Harbour Board should be assisted out of its difficulty.

Mr. W. D. STEWART had gone through the Bill very carefully, and could corroborate the remarks of the last speaker very fully. This Board did not come before the House, so to speak, to validate what might be termed a moral wrong or an improper transaction. It simply came to the House in order to get over one difficulty raised in connection with the question of the loan and overdraft. The other provisions of the Bill all tended in the direction of removing what might be termed purely technical difficulties—difficulties which, if not removed, would harass the Board very much, and tend to impair its efficiency and independence. The 5th section was considered necessary. Apparently, there was some land required for properly carrying on the harbour works, and they could not take this land without some legal authority.

Mr. TURNBULL asked why there was this power to enlarge the leasing powers of the Board as to its endowment. Could the honourable gentleman give them any information on that point?

Mr. W. D. STEWART said this land could not be profitably leased under the present powers. It was found from the peculiar character of the land that it was necessary to enlarge the leasing-power, in order to be able to lease the land to something like fair advantage. He did not think it was the duty of the House to raise—he would not say frivolous objections, but—objections of no real substance in connection with these Bills, so long as the parties locally interested had not agitated against the proposed amendments of the law. He should support the Bill, which was a desirable and necessary amendment that ought to receive the sanction of the House.

Mr. TURNBULL wished the honourable gentleman who spoke last would be more distinct in telling the House what was the peculiarity that rendered it necessary that the lease of so large a block of land should be for sixty years. It could be easily understood that in the case of town lands, where people had to put expensive buildings on their leased sections, long leases should be given; but it was quite another thing to give a lease for forty thousand acres of land for sixty years. That appeared to him to be a very fatal objection. He would not oppose the second reading of the Bill; but in Committee he would have an opportunity of eliciting further information.

Mr. VALENTINE said that when this matter was before the Local Bills Committee the honourable member for the East Coast explained that it would be necessary for any one taking up this land to expend £2 or £3 an acre on it before he could receive any return.

Mr. TURNBULL.—Why?

Mr. VALENTINE said it was because it was necessary to clear the land, lay down grass, fence it, and so forth, the cost of which would be £2 or £3 an acre; and therefore it was necessary to give a long lease before any one would take it up.

Mr. TAYLOR had not intended to speak on this Bill, and would not have risen were it not for the remarks of the honourable member for Port Chalmers and the honourable member for New Plymouth. He thought the views put forth by the honourable member for New Plymouth and indorsed by the Minister of Education were very bad. He (Mr. Taylor) could not conceive of a more immoral proposition than this: that a local body should be allowed to borrow money by way of overdraft without the authority of law, and then come to the House and ask it to ratify their illegal transaction. He must enter his protest against a doctrine of that kind. It was simply holding out an inducement to these gentlemen to squander the ratepayers' money, because they were only in the position for twelve or eighteen months, and it was well known that some members of these Boards expended money for their own or their friends' interest, knowing quite well that when they retired from office they ceased to have any responsibility, and they then came down to Parliament and asked to be relieved or "whitewashed" in that way. He trusted the promoter of this Bill would, in his reply, enter fully into these matters, and indicate to the House the exact position in which the Bill stood, because unless he did so he (Mr. Taylor) should have to vote against it. The opening remarks of the honourable gentleman were very meagre, and he trusted that, in his reply, he would enter fully into these matters, so that honourable members might have a fair case before them, in order to vote intelligently in the matter. He did not wish to delay the House in this matter, but he felt bound to protest against such an immoral proposition as that quoted by the honourable member for New Plymouth and indorsed by the Minister of Education.

Mr. GRAHAM, in reply, said that, with regard to this reckless extravagance which the Harbour Board was accused of, he might mention that at the time there were two lawyers on the Board, and the Board presumed that those gentlemen would have seen that the Board did not act illegally. As to this setting-aside of the sinking fund, he thought it was the best thing that could have been done, whether that setting-aside was illegal or not. The money was there; it was invested; it was not as many expenditures had been in some southern districts, where money had been got and squandered.

An Hon. MEMBER.—In Sydenham?

Mr. TAYLOR.—Oh, no; I object.

Mr. GRAHAM.—With regard to the borrowing of money from the bank, it occurred in this way: When the Board came into office there was an overdraft for works done that could not be carried out without an overdraft. The Auditor-General pointed out that it was illegal to have an overdraft; and the money could not be obtained without levying a heavy rate. The Board, however, had money lying at the bank to special account, and they borrowed from this special account, the repayment of which it was proposed to spread over a term. It was not a large amount that was borrowed—only £3,000; and this clause in the Bill, to which reference had been made, was a suggestion of the Auditor-General to get over the difficulty. As to the remarks that were made about the works that were being carried out, he should be glad if the Engineer were sent up to examine the works, because they promised to be more successful than any in New Zealand. He believed that it would not only be found that the work was being carried out in a highly-satisfactory manner, but that the plan adopted was what it ought to be. This plan had the sanction of the Government Engineer, and the site had been fixed by the Government Engineer. If it was only to satisfy the country and the House that the money was being properly expended, he should be glad if the Engineer went up there, and made a report on the whole expenditure of the Board. He was perfectly satisfied that his report would satisfy every one. As to the rate, the honourable gentleman who was in charge of the Bill when it was passed assured the Board that the intention was that the highest leviable rate should be 1d. in the country and 2d. in the town; and when a vote was taken this was clearly put before the ratepayers. He had a printed circular to show that it was so. As to the land, this block was covered with scrub, bush, &c. It was a long way from the coast. It was very good land, but would require an expenditure upon it of £1 or £2 an acre before it was capable of producing anything. The Board found that no one would take the land unless they got a long enough lease to recoup them for improvements. If sixty years was too long a term, it could be altered in Committee. The Board only wanted to apply the provisions of the Land Act of 1885 to this land as far as the agricultural portions of this reserve were concerned,—whatever the land regulations of the day might be. He hoped the House would agree to the second reading of the Bill.

NEW RIVER HARBOUR BOARD LOAN BILL.

Mr. FELDWICK—in moving the second reading of the New River Harbour Board Loan Bill—pointed out that money was required by the Board to pay off liabilities that had been contracted owing to various circumstances, and for the purpose of undertaking further improvements of the harbour. A small loan had previously been obtained, but this had been spent in the formation of a half-tide training-wall. The Board had also incurred debts in defending actions that had been brought against them. They also bought a dredge at a cost of £3,161, the object being to avoid the cause of further actions; and at the time of obtaining the dredge there was an overdraft at the bank of the sum of £2,090. At the time of making the overdraft it was not illegal to incur it. Subsequently Parliament passed “The Harbours Act Amendment Act, 1886,” which prohibits overdrafts, but had given no facility for the repayment of overdrafts which then existed. There was consequently a certain amount of indebtedness, which the Board were anxious to clear off. The sum asked for in the Bill was only £25,000, and it was believed that the interest on that sum would be easily paid out of the increased trade which would accrue in consequence of the improvements to the harbour. The loan was proposed to be expended in payment of the bank overdraft, in the purchase of the dredge and plant, and the remainder in dredging the channel and carrying out improvements. He would point out that the proposed works were not bar works. He might mention that any deficiency would be collectable from the Town of Invercargill itself, and no new district was included in the old district. He had received from the Chairman of the Invercargill Chamber of Commerce the following resolution of that body on the subject:—

“Resolved, That this Chamber respectfully urge the New River Harbour Board not to discontinue the use of the dredge in improving the approach to the jetty and the berth there, feeling confident that the interests of the mercantile community are bound up with the successful prosecution of the work. That the members for this district be requested to use their influence in having the Bill for legalising the expenditure in improving the harbour pushed on as soon as possible.”

He would add that the proposed loan was not to be raised without the usual vote of the ratepayers being taken; and, as a matter of fact, there was a probability of no rate being required at all, and the interest would be very small. He moved the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. ALLEN was sorry to oppose the second reading of the Bill, but he felt it his duty; also that it was the duty of the House to oppose the measure. What were the facts in regard to it? Some had already been put before them by the honourable gentleman in charge of the Bill. He would recapitulate them from his own point of view. The Harbour Board and City Council were one body dealing with harbour matters. As he understood the position, they had already exceeded their expenditure, out of the small loan they were authorised to raise, by £2,500, and that amount stood now as an overdraft at the bank. They had not only done that, but they had, without authority and illegally, entered into the purchase of a dredge for £3,150; so that, altogether, there had been illegal expenditure of something like £5,650.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Mr. ALLEN.—At any rate, it was possible that the £2,500 was not absolutely illegal; it was spent under the loan Act. This question, however, seemed to him to divide itself into two. Were they going to take any notice of this illegal expenditure? And were they to allow people to plunge themselves into difficulties in order that they might carry out works on borrowed money that were not essential and that were not necessary?—and he thought he could show that these works were neither essential nor necessary. Within eighteen miles of this place there was a good harbour—the Bluff—and the Bluff was connected by railway with Invercargill, and there could be no earthly necessity for having a harbour here when they were connected with such a good one by railway within such easy distance. The overdraft had been incurred in building the half-tide wall, which, he was informed, was of no use. The whole object of these works was to enable them to enter into competition with the railway in order to get cheaper freights. In regard to these new harbour works, he thought they must insist that, unless there was an absolute necessity established for them, no more money should be allowed the Boards. He was prepared to take that view and say that, in the interests of the people concerned and in the interests of the colony, they must put their foot down and put a stop to this kind of borrowing.

Mr. COWAN hoped that the House would agree to the passing of this Bill. With regard to the overdraft that had been contracted, he explained that the Board had been compelled to incur expenses in defending actions that had been brought against it. The last speaker said this expenditure had been illegal; but that could scarcely be so, as the Borough Council of Invercargill was also the New River Harbour Board. The necessity for the Bill did not arise till the Auditor-General objected to those payments coming out of the General Account. The new dredge had been paid for out of the general funds of the municipality, and that was another reason why this Bill was introduced. The lawsuits were caused owing to the insufficiency of the water to float the vessels that came to the wharf. The expenditure had been forced on the municipality, and he thought the least Parliament could do was to enable the municipality to comply with the requirements of the Auditor-General in regard to the payments which had been made. In regard to the proposed further improvements, for which £19,000 was wanted, Parliament had the control of this matter in its own hands. He would ask the House to look at the matter from a fair point of view, and give the people of Invercargill what they asked for.

Mr. VALENTINE was not altogether surprised at the remarks which fell from the honourable member for Dunedin East, because honourable members were well aware that Dunedin had got all the advantages which Invercargill was now seeking to obtain. They had got a channel now from Port Chalmers up to Dunedin, where those handsome steamers of the Union Steam-ship Company could go up and lie alongside the wharf; and the day might come, if they permitted this Harbour Board loan to be floated, when Invercargill would also have these steamers at the wharf. The honourable member for Dunedin East said they would be competing with the railways. The fact was, the railways should not have been constructed, as they were, along the coasts. Any harbour works of this description must necessarily compete with the railway. He did not believe the honourable member for Dunedin East would have made the remarks he had made if such a thing as a loan for the making of the channel to Dunedin were likely to come before the House. The honourable gentleman knew very well that there was no likelihood that he would have to support such a measure, and therefore he now came forward as the champion of economy.

Mr. PERCEVAL felt bound to oppose this Bill on principle. The measure might be a very good one or it might not—he had no knowledge on that point, but he quite agreed with the remarks which fell from the honourable member for Port Chalmers when the House was dealing with a previous Bill. He (Mr. Perceval) thought the time had come when some limit must be put to the borrowing powers of the Harbour Boards. This was a Bill which sought to give additional borrowing powers to a Harbour Board. It was said that the general tests which were applied in the Harbour Board Acts were a security against money being injudiciously expended. Those tests were a poll of the ratepayers and expert evidence to the satisfaction of the Marine Department. In his opinion these were two very unsatisfactory tests. Experience showed that the temptation of having money locally expended was so great as to blind the judgment of those who were called upon to give a vote. He ventured to say that, if a loan were proposed in almost any district, and for any work, a majority of votes could be got in favour of the work; so that he thought that test was in no sense a fair test as to the necessity for the work. Then, with regard to the expert evidence, honourable members knew perfectly well that, if one engineer reported that a work could be done in a particular way, and that the work was necessary, it was easy to get evidence contrary to that opinion. It was quite a common thing to see expert evidence divided in that way. He contended, therefore, that the tests as to the necessity for harbour works were unsatisfactory. What he thought ought to be done was to constitute a Commission to make inquiries as to the necessity for these harbour works. If they had a standing Commission to refer these matters to there might be some check upon injudicious expenditure of money. The repeated borrowing for local works had become a very serious question indeed. To his mind it was almost a more serious question than the increase of the public debt. The growth of local indebtedness in this colony was really becoming quite alarming; and he thought the House should endeavour to check borrowing under the present Bill and similar ones. He felt some disinclination to oppose the Bill, because it might be sacrificing it to a principle. The work might be a useful one—honourable members had not sufficient evidence of that; and he thought the House should reject all such measures as the present Bill.

Mr. MONK wished particularly to allude first to what he considered the rather brusque manner in which the honourable member for Dunedin East had been treated. Instead of feeling gratified at the manifestation of penitence on the part of young New Zealand for the wasteful extravagance that had been going on for years past, several honourable gentlemen had "sat upon" him. The honourable member for Dunedin East was not responsible for that wasteful expenditure, but he was one who would have to suffer for it. With regard to the measure itself—on principle he (Mr. Monk) was against all these borrowing Bills, and would impress upon all who would heed him the desirability of opposing every one that might come before the House. The introducer of this Bill complained that the rabbits had destroyed the vegetation upon a peninsula of sand, and that the sand, being thus exposed to strong winds, was carried into the river, reducing its depth. There was a peculiar kind of grass which grew very well upon sand, and if this grass were tried upon the refractory mole at New River the experiment might result in a great benefit, as it might also to other parts of the country where the encroachment of drifting sand was a matter of serious loss. He, along with others, thought that the very large expenditure which had been made on artificial harbours was a very unfortunate thing for the colony. In the course of two or three years—it might be after the next election—there might be a combination of these various Harbour Boards to bring pressure upon the House to take over the indebtedness of the Boards. Of course, the borrowing of money with the intention of ultimately obtaining relief in this way was immoral, and was conducive to recklessness in borrowing and wastefulness in expenditure. It was quite possible that in this instance there might be nothing of this kind actually contemplated. But he (Mr. Monk) knew that such a mode of obtaining relief was considered probable by some of these borrowers; and, when the ripe time should come, was there any of these burdened bodies that would not co-operate to, if possible, shunt their liabilities into the national debt of the colony?

Mr. WARD said the honourable member for Thorndon had stated a few evenings ago that it was the intention of a portion of the Young New Zealand party to oppose harbour loans. Three members of that party had, one after another, risen and opposed the present measure, and not on the merits of the Bill. He thought that was a very improper thing to do. This Bill was a matter of very considerable importance to the Town of Invercargill. The object of the measure was partly to wipe off an overdraft which had been incurred by the Harbour Board. He was surprised at the honourable member for Dunedin East opposing the measure as he had done. He (Mr. Ward) was aware of this fact: That there were some residents of Dunedin who thought that the Invercargill of the future was going to eclipse Dunedin, and probably the honourable gentleman, in his attitude towards this Bill, was actuated by a desire to prevent that coming about. Whatever was the fate of this Bill, he asked the House not to offer a wholesale opposition to any Bills, but to deal with every Bill on its merits. Those honourable members who were opposing this measure in so flippant a manner should seriously reflect upon the unwise course they were adopting, and have a proper regard for the responsibilities of their position in the House. He desired to enter his protest against honourable members combining to oppose any measure irrespective of its contents.

HOUSE RESUMED.

Mr. SPEAKER resumed the chair at half-past seven o'clock.

BIBLE-READING IN SCHOOLS BILL.

Mr. FULTON.—Mr. Speaker, this is not the first occasion that I have had the honour and the privilege of addressing the House upon this matter. I would that the task had fallen into better hands, and that a tongue much more eloquent than mine should speak and set before this House the claims which that Book which we seek to get reintroduced into the schools has upon this House and the colony. The Premier this afternoon plainly intimated to us that this probably would be at any rate one of the last private members' days, and appealed to us to consider one another, and to forbear, as far as possible, from lengthening debates, so as to give each of those who have Bills on the Order Paper an opportunity of bringing his Bill before the House. I shall be the first to seek, by the brevity of my remarks, to give others such an opportunity: not because the subject is not one that might be dilated upon at great length, not because it is one upon which I feel but lightly, but because of the reason I have stated, that there is other business, and I should like others to have the same opportunity that I have at the present moment to bring matters before the House. When I say this, I hope that on the present occasion we shall not be met, as we have been met in the past, by a motion of "the previous question," but that we shall meet this subject fairly and squarely, and that the results—and I have great hopes that the result will be in favour of what I am proposing—may be known distinctly by the House and the country. In 1877, when this Bill was first introduced, the proposition was made by Mr. Bowen, then Minister of Education, that the school-day should commence by the reading of the Lord's Prayer and of certain portions of Scripture. I regret to say that that was not carried; and the country, or, at any rate, a very large number of persons in the country, have ever since been regretting it, and have been making their regrets known by the petitions which they have been continually presenting from that time to this, and have, through some of their representatives coming to this House, spoken out upon this subject. That is sufficient testimony of the demand of our fellow-colonists, especially of those who are parents of children attending the schools. There has been one objection raised in regard to this Bill, but I do not know that it is one that I shall have to meet. Still, it has been objected by some persons who support the Bill that we do not go far enough, that we do not ask as much as we should seek for. They say that the bare reading of a few verses of Scripture by some scholars in the school-hours will not do much good, and that we should attempt to gain something much more than that. Well, speaking for myself and, I am sure, for many others, we should like to see something more than this; but, still, we shall be glad to get this modicum of justice, and see this ignominy which has been cast upon that book we revere, and which, I trust, a vast majority of the people of this country revere, taken off from it—in fact, that it shall be taken out of the category which it now occupies as being almost the only book that is not permitted to be read in the public schools. The Bill which I have before me is perhaps not exactly the same as we have sought to introduce in other sessions; but, taking counsel together, and seeing the temper of the House on many occasions in regard to this matter, we thought it would be well if it were framed in the shape in which I present it to the House,—namely,—

“ . . . to direct that a portion of the Bible shall be read aloud by the scholars every morning at the opening of the school. Such reading shall not exceed twenty minutes, and no child shall be compelled to attend such reading if the parent or guardian of such child shall, in writing, inform the Committee or teacher that he objects to such attendance.”

Why do we ask that this book should be re-introduced into our public schools? The State has taken upon itself the education of our young. To a large extent it has taken it out of the hands of private individuals: and I say that not only is public conscience offended by the taking of this book out of our schools and making it a forbidden book, but, seeing that the State proposes not only to teach the children some things, but really to educate them, it behoves the State to fulfil its duties in this respect fully and not in a partial manner. None of us will say that a human being is composed only of intellect. We have gone the length of seeking, besides training the intellect of the young, to train their bodies, and we have claims made that physical education should be properly attended to, that our schools should be properly ventilated, that there should be suitable playgrounds, and that every step should be taken so that the young may have sound minds in sound bodies; but there is one thing which to a large extent we neglect, and that is their moral teaching. Again, why do we ask for this book? We represent the feelings and wishes of a very large number of the people of New Zealand. In addition to the petitions which have come up from time to time to this House in large numbers and representing an enormous number of the population of New Zealand, we have this session had presented forty-two petitions, with names attached to them numbering 14,860 persons, and that not from one district only but from almost every district in the colony; not from one denomination only, but from nearly every denomination in the colony. Amongst them we had one from the Presbyterian Synod of Otago and Southland; another from the Synod at Nelson, signed by the Anglican Bishop there. These people are almost losing heart. They have come to this House so often that they begin almost to despair; but, feeling that a supreme effort must be made in the cause of what they believe to be righteousness, they have, during the election, —and I am glad of it—made their voices so heard that a very large number of members here have pledged themselves to support such a measure as that which I have introduced. We desire to give these persons an opportunity of speaking out the voice of the country here, and letting all know why they have this belief. That I should occupy the time of the House seems to me ungracious and improper. I have many a time before now, as the older members of the House know, spoken on this subject, and therefore, if others are anxious to speak upon it, I will give them the opportunity. By-and-by I shall have an opportunity of replying to any objections that may be raised. And now let me ask, has this system worked well elsewhere? Speaking of the part of the country from which I come, I can aver with safety that no religious difficulty ever existed in Otago under the system of education introduced there by the Provincial Government. Then not only was Bible-reading practised but religious teaching was given in the schools; and I have never heard that any substantial objection was made to it. What objections have been raised in other places, where there are a far larger number of children attending the schools than we pretend to teach? What objection has been raised under the London School Board? What has been the withdrawal from the London schools on account of the religious difficulty? One in 4,000. And are we to be one of the places in the world which object to give this blessing—for I can call it nothing but a blessing—to our children? Has not the system been followed with success in America? Does it not exist in Prussia? and even in France is not religious teaching given in a large number of schools? In fact, almost everywhere throughout the civilised world this system obtains; and are we here to be so narrow-minded that we cannot, for fear of a difficulty, which we only imagine, and which when the matter is put in practice disappears, face this question, because in some few parts of the country some religious difficulties may have occurred? What are some of the objections? First, it is contended that it is not the business of the State. Why, then, does the State take upon itself to educate our young? Does it educate them only with the idea of preparing them for material advancement in the world? Is it only to enable them to progress in regard to their means and their property? Is it not that their whole nature should be educated? Is it better that we should have an intellectual population or that we should have an upright, righteous, manly, honourable, and Christian population? When the State takes upon itself to educate our young it takes upon itself a solid duty, but it fails in a large part of that duty when it does not undertake to teach the moral being of the young. The State has recognised its duty by taking children from degraded parents and placing them in reformatories and ordering that each child shall be brought up in the faith of its parents. It does not except the religious question there, but gives such instruction as shall insure that the child is properly brought up. Then, why, with regard to our State schools, should we have this difficulty at all? Then, another objection is made that it may bring discord into the schools, and make distinctions which do not at present exist. I have really answered that objection already, by showing how little such a difficulty has obtained in schools such as the Board schools of London and Birmingham, and where there are other large gatherings of children. The Bishop of Dunedin, recently speaking on this subject, said that he had been superintendent of about a thousand children in schools, and not one single withdrawal within his knowledge had been made on account of the religious difficulty. And why not, then, meet this difficulty in a manly, straightforward way? Are we not to listen to the demands made by a large part of the Christian population of New Zealand, who demand this seriously and earnestly, who wish their children to grow up with a proper moral training, and a moral training upon a basis which they believe to be the only true and good one? Shall we say that, because, forsooth, some of the teachers may have conscientious scruples, because they may be free-thinkers and would not like to do it—shall we say that that is an objection? I have always thought that a free-thinker was one willing to give liberty of conscience to all. At any rate, they pretend to do so; but, while they agree with everything else, they will not give us liberty in this. Then, another very large question is said to be involved in this proposal, that it is the introduction of the beginning of denominationalism in our schools. Well, for eight years I have stood up in this House and supported this measure, and for eight years I have said that I deprecate any such thing; and, for my part, I would do all I could to prevent denominationalism being introduced. But I will tell honourable gentlemen what they are doing if they still continue to oppose even this slight modicum of justice to the people. They will drive those who, in the past, have been strong supporters of our education system, and who have striven to keep it free from all sectarian difficulties and denominationalism—you will drive them to combine their forces, and make them feel compelled, as our late eminent friend Mr. Macandrew told us he felt he was compelled, to support denominationalism as the only possible way to secure religious teaching in our schools. We are told that the advocates of Bible-reading in the public schools will burst up our educational system; but I say, with the deepest conviction of my heart, that those who oppose Bible-reading in schools are doing what they can to bring our system down in ruins, because they will not yield an inch. As I said before, I should have been glad had the initiative in this matter been taken by one with greater eloquence, or that I had a tongue more eloquent and more persuasive; but I can say from my heart that I yield to no one in this House in my earnestness, at any rate, to see this matter carried out; and if our earnest persuasions, the petitions presented to the House, and demands of a large number of our people cannot have weight with those here who represent them, then I feel that a voice as eloquent even as the voice of an angel from Heaven would fail to induce the House to give us what we demand. I hope and trust that on the present occasion we shall see not only a large number following us into the lobby on this matter, but I do trust and believe that honourable members, having had this matter brought prominently before them during the late elections, will so crowd into that lobby that the second reading of this Bill will be carried.

Dr. HODGKINSON.—I support the second reading of this Bill, though I do not intend to speak at any great length, knowing full well that I have not those gifts of oratory which would warrant me in so doing. We are now engaged in a great work, and I appeal to the younger members of this House, the Young New Zealand party, to remove the reproach under which the colony has laboured for the past ten years. I was in the House ten years ago when the present Education Act was introduced by the then Minister of Justice, and when introduced there was a clause in it which provided that the schools should be opened every morning with prayer and the reading of a portion of Scripture. Unhappily that clause was struck out, and ever since then a large portion of the best part of the people of New Zealand have suffered what they consider a great grievance. They have felt that the colony has been under a great stigma—in fact, that a great national sin has been committed, and that we should use all our efforts to remove it. Now, I myself have presented a petition, signed by no less than sixteen hundred women of Southland, in favour of the introduction of the Bible into the schools. In speaking on this question I wish to base my arguments chiefly on two foundations. In the first instance, I say we must recognise that it is the duty of the State in all its important functions to make recognition of its duty to and its dependence upon the Almighty. This duty has been recognised throughout all Christendom up to the present time. Even we ourselves recognise it every day on meeting here, by offering prayer: that is a public recognition by the State. Now, I ask, what more important function of the State can there be than that it has undertaken in our common-school system? This system has been introduced for the purpose of bringing up our young people to be good citizens and subjects—able to discharge their duties to the State, to themselves, and to each other. Now, this is one of the most serious undertakings that any State can commit itself to, and in that especially we are bound to invoke the blessing of God, by causing the children to read or to have read to them the revelation which we have received from God, and which, I am thankful to say, we do still recognise as the revelation of God, notwithstanding the progress of what is erroneously termed “free-thought,” but which ought to be called false thought. That is one strong reason for the introduction of the Sacred Scriptures into our public schools, that it would be a full recognition of our duty to and our dependence on God. Another reason is that, having undertaken to instruct our children so as to become good citizens and subjects, it is absolutely necessary to educate the whole nature of the child, not merely his intellectual faculties but his moral faculties and his religious sentiments. A mere sharpening of the intellectual faculties only will have very little effect, and that alone may indeed have a mischievous effect rather than a good one. A very great Englishman—Oliver Cromwell—when addressing Parliament on the reformation of manners and morals, spoke to this effect:—

“Make it a shame to see men bold in sin and profaneness, and God will bless you. You will be a blessing to the nation, and, by this, will be more repairer of breaches than anything in the world. Truly these things do respect the souls of men and the spirits, which are the men. The mind is the man. If that be kept pure a man signifies somewhat; if not, I would very fain see what difference there is betwixt man and a beast. He hath only some activity to do some more mischief.”

Now, that is what you are doing in the present school system: you just sharpen up the intellectual faculties of the child, and disregard entirely the moral and religious parts of his nature. In this you are not fulfilling the purpose you profess to take in hand. Moreover, you are casting the greatest slight it is possible to cast upon the Sacred Scriptures, which we still hold to be a Divine revelation, and thereby, in the most open manner, you set yourselves in open rebellion against the Almighty. We are, in fact, saying, “Who is the Lord, that we should regard Him? Depart from us; we desire not to acknowledge Thy ways.” Now, any one with common-sense can see—and it is vain to attempt to disguise it—that we have, by excluding the Sacred Scriptures from our schools, put ourselves in open rebellion. Some of the strongest reasons why we should admit the Sacred Scriptures to our schools are these: They would teach the young their moral and religious duties, and educate their moral faculties: then, the Bible is a great historical work, and contains the oldest and most authentic history in the world: then, it is also a literary work of the very highest merit, surpassing in that respect all other books in the world: then, also, it is a noble example of the power of the English language, surpassing all other books in that respect. Then, again, it may be well contended, as it has been by the honourable member for the Taieri, that we should introduce the Bible into our schools as a matter of humanity. It is well known that there are a number of children attending our common schools who are, unfortunately, worse than orphans, and unless they receive religious teaching in the public schools they will never receive it anywhere. That alone is one of the strongest arguments—the argument on the score of humanity: if we introduced the Bible into the schools for no other reason we should introduce it for the sake of these poor children alone. Another strong argument in favour of this Bill has been used by the honourable member for the Taieri: that, unless you do introduce the Bible into the common schools, you will doom your education system. I am fully convinced that the system will not subsist seven years longer in its present form unless what is now proposed is done. I have the strongest possible objection to denominationalism in the schools; but, if I live ten years longer, I will vote for denominationalism rather than that the colony should remain under the stigma which it now is under. I do not feel warranted in trespassing further on the patience of the House, having expressed my convictions in as strong a way as I can; and I will leave the matter now to other honourable members, who are no doubt anxious to speak and adduce further arguments in support of the Bill. I might, before sitting down, quote, in support of the position I have taken up—that if we profess to train up our children to be good citizens and subjects we cannot do that apart from religion, and also that the training of the moral faculties should be based on religious teaching, and that without religious teaching a high moral sense cannot exist—I will quote, I say, in support of that, one whose utterances are always heard with respect. The great General Washington, in his last farewell address to his countrymen—an address which has always been cherished by that country with the greatest respect—warns and counsels his fellow-countrymen in these words:—

“Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who should labour to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician equally with the pious man ought to respect and cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. . . And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.”

This is part of that valuable legacy left to the American people by the father of his country; and let us also profit by it.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES.—I do not know whether I am going to oppose this Bill, and I am not certain that I am going to support it. I am on the horns of a dilemma, and I should like to hear a few more of the arguments on both sides before I make up my mind. At present, however, I fail to see the necessity for the Bill. There is already, if I mistake not, power resting in the School Committees to have the Bible read if they choose.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES.—I say Yes. The local Committees have the power, if they choose to exercise it, to appoint a certain time for Bible-reading in schools after school-hours or before school-hours. I know for a fact, as the honourable member for the Taieri mentioned just now, that the Episcopalians and other denominations have tried to take advantage of that provision. I know that in Nelson some time ago they were in a great state of mind about Bible-reading, and it is a positive fact that six months ago, at a meeting of the School Committee, it was carried by the casting-vote of the Chairman that the Bible should be read in school for twenty minutes before the ordinary time for school assembling, and that the representatives of the different denominations were to attend there, and read the Bible in the school. I do not know whether that has proved very satisfactory or not. In the first place, I do not think the clergymen were prepared to attend; and, secondly, I do not believe that the attendance of the children was sufficient to warrant the experiment being continued. Then, in the Township of Richmond, in Nelson, it was tried there. The School Committee decided that the Bible should be read in the schools. There was sufficient enthusiasm there for the attempt to be properly made; and what was the result? That after a month the attendance of the children to hear the Bible read had dwindled down to one boy or a girl—I forget which. Under these circumstances, as the School Committees have the power to allow the reading of the Bible at certain times, I cannot see that there is any necessity for the Bill. I have no doubt the honourable member for the Taieri is thoroughly sincere in his wish to have Bible-reading in schools carried out, and I believe the honourable gentleman who has just sat down is also sincere, and no doubt there are many other honourable members who are equally sincere; but, for the reasons I have given, I do not see that there is the slightest necessity for the Bill, inasmuch as the Committees already have the power of allowing the Bible to be read. That is my difficulty in connection with this Bill.

Mr. GOLDIE.—I rise to oppose the second reading of this Bill, and I can put forward this claim, as showing that I am in earnest in wishing the young to have a knowledge of the Bible: that for the last twenty-three years I have been actively engaged in instructing the young. I suppose there has been scarcely a Sunday during the whole of that period when I have not been engaged in the work of instructing the young in connection with biblical teaching. But, though I have been and am engaged in that work, I still think that it would be a great mistake for us to force the Bible into the public schools in this way. In the first place, it has been said this evening that it is the duty of the State in the State school to instruct the children in religious knowledge as well as in other knowledge; but I think that is a great mistake. I believe that the proper place for the children of the country to be taught religious knowledge is in the Sunday-school or the home, by the ministers of the various denominations or by the parents. Yet, unfortunately, the fact seems to be this: that to a very large extent the parents themselves, as well as the ministers of religion, are only too anxious to have the children taught by proxy, they themselves altogether neglecting their duty. The parents and the clergymen have resting upon them primarily a duty in this matter; and it is because they do not perform this duty, do not care to do this duty, that this appeal is made to the House for Bible-reading in schools. Now, I do not think that it is the duty of the State to do this thing at all, and I think that it would be a mistake for the State to relieve of this duty the persons who should undertake it. The honourable member for the Taieri has told us that the Government recognises that it is the duty of the State to impart religious education because religious teaching is, as a matter of fact, given to the children who are in the industrial schools. I am aware that the children in those schools are taught in religious matters; but that is altogether a different thing. As far as the ordinary public day-schools are concerned the children only attend them about five hours a day. Surely that is little enough time for them to devote to the acquirement of ordinary knowledge. Before that time commences and after it is over there is opportunity for giving them religious instruction. But, as to the industrial schools, the children are there during each day in every week for the period during which they are maintained at these schools. They must be taught in the schools or not at all. But even there, I would point out, the religious instruction is not imparted by the ordinary paid teachers: the various ministers of religion go to the schools and impart the religious instruction. I cannot understand how the religious teaching could otherwise be given. The children in those institutions come of parents of various religions, and the children have to be brought up in the religion of their parents, and I do not see how the Government teachers could give instruction to all the children. Therefore it is that the ministers of the various Churches go to those institutions to impart religious instruction. One of the chief objections to this Bill is the different religious belief of the teachers in our public schools. They belong to different denominations. Some of them are Catholics, and, from what I understand of the teachings of that Church, I believe that it is considered unwise by those in authority that their people should read the Bible. A good number of our teachers are Roman Catholics; and are we to ask them to conduct the reading of a book which they may not consider themselves justified in reading? I do not think we should be justified in asking our Roman Catholic teachers to conduct the reading of a book when the Church objects to their having the book in their hands. On the other hand, I do not know that it would be wise, in the interests of religious education, to have Bible-reading under these circumstances. I feel satisfied myself that this is but the introduction of the thin end of the wedge of denominationalism. I know that a clergyman of the Church of England residing in Auckland has made no secret of it that in his opinion it would be, and that he would be anxious to drive the wedge home as soon as he could. I feel certain that, once we introduce this into the schools, the present national system will be destroyed. I do not think that the teachers are the right persons to impart religious instruction. I remember hearing of a case in which a teacher, after conducting the reading of the Word, remarked to the pupils, "Yes, it would be all very well if it were true." If we had teachers conducting Bible-reading finishing up the lesson in that way, I think it would hardly be disputed that the result of such teaching would be to do more harm than good. Nor do I think that the school is the right place. If we take children out of the playground and put the Bible in their hands just as an ordinary lesson-book, we shall, I am afraid, lessen their respect for the Word itself, and in that way do them more harm than good. If in the Sunday-school, on the Sunday, a day round which there cling associations favourable to the work, it is not always easy to secure due respect, how much more difficult will it be to inculcate respect when the Bible is read as an ordinary task-book! Then, it must be borne in mind that the children attending our schools are of many different creeds. For instance, there are a number of Hebrew children in attendance, who, from the teachings in which they have been brought up, only believe in the writings contained in the Old Testament. Are we justified in compelling these children to read the Bible—perhaps selections taken from the New Testament, in which they do not believe? Of course it is said that there would be a conscience-clause. But if that be the case the children need not go to the school at all for religious instruction. The children for whom this reading is required might have it before they go to school. Surely the school-hours are quite short enough at the present time. It is an easy matter, where there is any real desire to give children religious teaching, to do it earlier in the day or later in the evening. It is not because the children do not desire religious instruction or are not willing to receive it—the great difficulty is to get laymen or ministers who will take the trouble or make the opportunity to impart the instruction. I know that in Auckland the Women's Christian Union have tried to take this work up; and they find that the children are quite ready and eager to read the Word, but that the great difficulty is to get persons to impart the instruction. That is where the difficulty lies. The parents will not act up to their responsibilities, and the ministers set apart for and paid for the work of religious instruction will not do their duty. That is the difficulty; but the remedy which the honourable gentleman proposes is not the right one. I believe that we should adopt the old Scotch system. Under that the children were sent to church in the morning and in the afternoon, but in the evening they were kept at home and instructed by their parents. From time to time the clergyman called and examined them in religious knowledge, and if they were found deficient in that knowledge the parents were held blameworthy. But here it seems to me the parents and the ministers have no desire to do their duty in this matter, but wish to throw the work which they should do upon others. I am quite prepared to throw the schools open in the morning before school-time, or in the afternoon after school-hours, if we can get persons to go there and give instruction; but beyond that I am not prepared to go. It has been said by some honourable gentlemen that if we do not accept this Bill a number of members of this House will take a determined stand and revert to denominationalism. Well, if a threat of that kind is made I can only say that if they carry out their intention they must take the responsibility for it. We know what denominationalism has done in the past, and I do not think we want any more of it. Let those honourable gentlemen be responsible. I have as much desire as any one to see the young educated in religious matters, and I do my share of work in that; but I feel satisfied that the day-school is not the place for it, nor the ordinary school-hours the time for it, nor the school-teachers the persons to impart it. Bible-reading under those circumstances would take away children's reverence for the Bible which they now feel; because, if on the Sabbath-day and in the Sabbath-schools it is a most difficult matter to impart religious instruction, it appears to me that the mere reading of the Word in a day-school would not be sufficient. We know perfectly well, in connection with Sunday-schools even, that a very large proportion of the children are lost to the Church, and lost simply because they have not received the Word as they should have received it. They have the letter of the Word, but they have not the spirit, and so in this and various ways from 80 to 90 per cent. are lost to the Church. Having such results from Sunday-schools, what can we expect the day-schools would be able to secure by Bible-reading?

Mr. BRUCE.—Although this is only what is called a private member's Bill, it is in reality a measure of very great importance, and I intend to make a few remarks in explanation of the vote I shall give on this occasion. It is important in the first place as embodying the wishes of a very large proportion—indeed, some say a majority—of the people of this colony; and it is also a very difficult question, as we cannot apply to it, or measure it by, the ordinary tests or standards of either economic or mathematical science; because it is essentially a question of conscience and belief. Now, I think the most determined opponents of this measure must admit that for these reasons it is entitled to a very great deal of consideration. I believe, speaking from my own point of view, that very much can be urged in its favour, and also that something can be said against it. I believe also that if it is placed on the Statute Book we may not anticipate the very beneficial results which its zealous advocates claim for it; for I believe that religious lessons ought to be given at home and in the Sunday-school, where they are presumably both given and received with reverence, and not rattled over irreverently as tasks in the common schools of the colony. I also say—and I speak at the same time at least as a professing Christian—that Bible-reading under sceptical school-masters will have an effect in a contrary direction from that which is intended. But, on the other hand, we know perfectly well that if children, in many instances at least,

o not receive biblical teachings—which are, after all, the only real basis of morals and conduct—if they do not receive those teachings at school, in many cases they will grow up entirely ignorant of the true basis of conduct or of their relations either to their Creator or to their fellow-creatures. But this measure has been supported for other reasons than either moral or religious reasons—it is defensible on other grounds. Such orators as, for instance, Webster, and many other Americans I might mention, have testified to the beneficial results they have obtained from a perusal of the Bible, and I believe that some of the most eminent American writers on jurisprudence have done so also. There is, I believe, among the extreme advocates of this measure a belief that the world is rapidly growing worse, and that every crime of which they hear or read is attributable to the exclusion of the Bible from our day-schools. Sir, I believe that is a great popular delusion—for I am speaking a little on both sides of the question—I may say that I do not feel very strongly in reference to it. As I have said, I think that is a great popular delusion. I believe the world, instead of rapidly growing worse, is in reality daily growing better; and statistics entirely support this view. It has been alleged to-night that this measure meant the introduction of the thin end of the wedge of denominational education, eventually destined to break up our educational system. I do not believe a word of it. I cannot see any ground for that belief; it rests on no basis whatever. But I believe in many instances this view is urged by those who dislike the book and who ridicule its teachings. I again repeat, I do not expect, if this measure is placed upon the Statute Book, the beneficial results claimed for it by its warmest advocates; but I intend to vote for it, and mainly for this reason: Being a Democrat, I believe in majorities ruling, and particularly when, as in this case, that rule will be unattended with any injury to the conscientious scruples of minorities; and principally for that very sound democratic reason I intend to vote for the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. BUXTON.—Sir, I shall make a few remarks respecting this very important matter. I, like honourable members who have preceded me, have had a little experience in Sabbath-school teaching—at any rate, for about thirty years I have known something of teaching the young in Sabbath-schools; and, to my mind, there is not the slightest cause to be afraid that this book, which we so much prize, is likely to do any harm in our day-schools. There are a great many reasons assigned why we should not have this book in our day-schools. As regards the right at present to have the book taught in our day-schools, we have no real right to have the Bible read there during school-hours, and we have an equal right to have almost anything that is of a moral character taught in our day-schools out of school-hours; but we want the Bible to be read in the schools during school-hours. This is what we are asking for. There are a variety of reasons assigned why we should not have this book read in our day-schools. One reason that is very often assigned is that it will be offensive to some. Well, there is scarcely anything that we could do or say but would give offence to some people; and there is scarcely a book that can be allowed in our public schools but it will be offensive to some people. I think if there is any book in the world that ought not to be offensive to the consciences of individuals, it is the Bible. Then, there is also this reason assigned: that the children cannot understand it. That, I think, is not a proper reason for its exclusion. When the various school-books are put into their hands they cannot understand them; and yet a great many people will assign the same reason why others should not read this precious book—because we cannot understand it all. I maintain that, while this book is not understood altogether by any of us, there is a great deal in it that is easy to be understood—that almost the smallest intellect of a child can grasp. I maintain that, while it is the philosopher's masterpiece, it is the schoolboy's spelling-book, and has a right to be in his hand. I speak from experience when I say that this book has been a blessing to me from my earliest youth. It has also been a blessing to mine—it has been within the reach of my children from their earliest infancy. And it has been in the school that I was taught this; and I have seen no danger as regards the Scriptures. Some will assign the fact that they do not believe it as a reason that it should not be allowed in our public schools. Why, I should imagine that those honourable gentlemen who say that is a reason why it should not be read in our public schools have themselves read thousands of publications that they do not believe, that they have not the slightest belief in; and yet they read them. And there are things which they would allow in our public schools that they do not believe. I maintain that this precious book, if a portion of it was read by the most profound atheist or deist every day, and he had no one to comment upon it, would be likely to do him good, and not harm. It is my impression that this reading of the Word in the hearing of the children, without comment, would be more likely to do them good than by any one teaching it or explaining it to them. I am opposed to religious teaching in our day-schools; I do not believe in it in the least. I say, Keep all the ministers out of the day-schools, but let the Bible in: it is a Word and a work that belongs to a higher power than man, and the Giver of it will explain it to the intelligences of men and of children. Only let the Bible have its place in our public schools, and it will do an honour to our colony, and will do no one any harm. I was somewhat surprised at an honourable gentleman who was on his feet a short time ago, and the exceeding sympathy he extended to a certain class of the community—namely, the Roman Catholics. He felt so much on their account, I wonder if he feels like that on other topics. I am rather afraid he does not. However, I think that the Roman Catholics are not such enemies to the Bible as some people may imagine; and I do think that, though we may have some Roman Catholic teachers in our day-schools, they would not object to the reading of a portion of that Word which we call the Word of God. I have not the slightest fear respecting that, either from Jew or Gentile, Roman Catholic, or anything else. While we are a Protestant people we should have our Protestant Bible in our schools, and not be ashamed of it or afraid of it; and if those gentlemen will forsake us because we stand to our principles, why, let them go, and we will find better men in their places. I have a very strong feeling as regards having the Bible in our day-schools, and I have a variety of reasons why I should feel so strongly upon it. I believe it would be a great blessing to what we have often heard about, "the unborn millions," when they come, if we do have the Bible in our schools. It has been a blessing to thousands, it is a blessing to thousands to-day; and why should we keep out of our day-schools the best book the world can produce? Let us allow it in the schools without comment, and leave it to the great Giver of it to explain it to the minds of the children. I would appeal to the intelligence of this honourable House, and say,—

Let us spare the tree,
Touch not a single bough;
In youth it sheltered me,
And I'll protect it now.

And if I go into the lobby alone I shall go in favour of the Bible being read in schools; and let us keep out of it all comment. Let us not allow comment in our day-schools. We want the State to protect religion, but not to teach it. And let us, whatever we do, have the Bible in our schools. It will improve the morals of the youth and be a blessing to the colony.

Mr. TANNER.—Sir, the honourable gentleman who last spoke felt what he said. Some of the prior speakers deplored that they had not oratory sufficient for the importance of this subject. I am sure the last speaker had the oratory that must have commended itself to all hearers. Truth needs no oratory to commend it—it appeals to the heart more than to the head; and this is a subject that appeals to that which is the highest part of our nature. But before I enter upon the subject I should like, first of all, to refer to some of the remarks made by previous speakers, and the remark made by the honourable member for Auckland West. He imagined a great many difficulties which did not exist. The difficulties are more in his imagination. To hear him speak on this subject and suggest these difficulties, one would think we were going into a new experiment, something that had never been tried elsewhere. This is nothing new. The Bible is read in the schools of a great many countries of the world, and we know that the results have been most beneficial wherever that has been the case. Another objection made was that the thin end of the wedge of denominationalism would be introduced. An honourable member says, "Hear, hear;" but what is the fact? The denominationalists are now joined together in demanding that the Bible shall be introduced in the public schools. At one time they were afraid that sectarianism might be introduced; but they are now fully convinced of the baneful influence of excluding the Bible altogether, and Presbyterians, Church-of-England people, Wesleyans, and all denominations have joined together to demand this right.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES.—What about the Catholics?

Mr. TANNER.—And even the Catholics. Catholics, who are supposed to be so bigoted, have shown themselves very liberal in the matter, and some of the enlightened Catholics have said that they do not object to the introduction of the Bible into the State schools of the colony so long as their claims are recognised. I am one of those who are prepared to recognise their claims, and I say their claims are just. Another objection the honourable gentleman made was that the public schools were not the proper place in which to teach religion,—that it should be taught in the homes of the people and in the Sunday-schools. But that honourable gentleman said he had tried it himself. I have done so, and many friends have done so; but what is the result of our attempts to give religious instruction after school-hours? Only about one-fourth of the children in the school remain and attend the religious instruction. And what is that fourth composed of? It is composed of the children who attend Sunday-schools. The three-fourths go away without any religious instruction whatever. It is not fair to ask children to remain after school-hours. A system of that sort is injurious in the interests of religious instruction. These children wish to get away home or to play, and it is an injury to the subject to attempt to teach the children during playhours. I must not, however, forget the injunction laid upon us by the Premier to make our remarks as brief as possible. Another honourable gentleman says, "Hear, hear," as much as to encourage that idea. I fail to see why any exception should be made in reference to private Bills. The honourable member for Auckland Central told us the other night that private Bills have been of the utmost importance—sometimes as important as, and frequently of much greater importance than, the other Bills brought before the House, policy or local Bills. He referred, as an instance, to that private Bill for the emancipation of the slaves. I think that was the Bill to which the honourable gentleman referred. That Bill was of no greater importance to the Old World than this is to us. This Bill is to emancipate our children from the fetters of secularism that have so long bound them. It is time that the light and freedom of religious instruction were admitted into the schools, and I say the people demand it. Those who have heard the petitions presented to both Houses must feel convinced that the people have arisen now to a sense of their great responsibility in this matter, and their voice is heard, and heard loudly, within this House and the other House, demanding that they should have this right accorded to them, that they should have this question relegated to themselves; and this is proposed to be done in the Bill. This Bill says,—

"It shall be lawful for the School Committee of any district already or which may hereafter be constituted under the provisions of 'The Education Act, 1877,' if it shall see fit, anything in the said Act contained to the contrary notwithstanding, to direct that a portion of the Bible shall be read aloud by the scholars every morning at the opening of the school. Such reading shall not exceed twenty minutes, and no child shall be compelled to attend such reading if the parent or guardian of such child shall, in writing, inform the Committee or teacher that he objects to such attendance."

Now, Sir, as to this handing-over of this important question to the people themselves, I repeat the time has come when they demand it. The people have the election of School Committees; therefore those who have any interest in this question will elect those of the candidates who they think are in favour of it, and we have no right to withhold this privilege from them. I could have wished that the Government could have seen its way to bring this question forward. It is a question of very great importance, and if the Government had brought a measure like this forward and given it their great influence I am sure that not only would it have been of the greatest benefit to the Bill, but I am quite sure that they would have had the applause and support of both sides of this House. I say this is a question that the Government ought to have brought forward, and I should have been very glad to see any Government having the courage to do so, as I feel sure they would have got a large amount of support. But, considering the vast importance of the subject, I still hope that the members of the Government will see their way to support this Bill, and I am sure they will have no reason to regret it, but the future generations that rise up will bless them for it. Those who do not believe in the Bible have admitted, at all events, as their opinion that it is very desirable that morality should be taught in the public schools of the country. In support of this view I will call in to my aid no less an authority than the late Premier of this country. In an address which he delivered down south not long ago Sir Robert Stout stated it as his opinion that there should be some moral teaching in the public schools, so as to counteract the tendency to rowdiness and larrikinism which was evidently growing up so strongly amongst us. This was at a time when there was a great deal of this larrikin element about, and when it was taken notice of by the public prints of the day. Now, I would ask that gentleman and others who think with him, how would they introduce this moral teaching into the public schools? Surely they would begin by teaching children proper respect for their parents and those in authority over them: "Honour thy father and thy mother." They would teach the children that they should have a proper respect for other people's goods, other people's property, and teach them not to take what does not belong to them: "Thou shalt not steal." Then, again, they would teach the children that it is improper to encourage a revengeful spirit, to bear malice. There would be no moral teaching unless you taught them that. They must be forgiving, and must not injure those who have offended them: "Thou shalt do no murder." Then, we should teach the children that they should not covet; also, to be truthful. Surely all those who advocate the teaching of morality would advocate that those who give evidence in our Courts should be taught to speak the truth: "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour." How, then, can we teach morality without recognising that book from which all morality is derived? That, I say, is a strong point in favour of introducing the Bible into our public schools. You cannot teach morality without it, because on the Bible it is based, and from that book we have derived it. The value of the Bible as a book of instruction has been referred to by other speakers, and without a knowledge of its contents no one can be said to be educated. Every one knows how interested every child is in Bible-instruction—I need not refer to the different portions of the Bible—to the Old or the New Testament; these Bible stories are so interesting to children. They both enjoy and profit by them. I would refer now to the system that is prevalent in other countries, and the system which, I hope, will yet be adopted in this. I hold in my hands the Scripture-lessons for the use of schools. This book is printed and published by the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland; and what is the remark it makes?—

"These selections are offered, not as a substitute for the sacred volume itself, but as an introduction to it; and they have been compiled in the hope of their leading to a more general and more profitable perusal of the Word of God. The passages introduced have been chosen, not as being of more importance than the rest of Scripture, but merely as appearing to be most level to the understandings of children and youth at school, and also as being the best fitted to be read under the direction of teachers not necessarily qualified, and certainly not recognised, as teachers of religion. No passage has either been introduced or omitted under the influence of any peculiar view of Christianity, doctrinal or practical."

These are the Scripture-lessons in use in the Irish schools of to-day, and I commend them to the attention of honourable members who may not perhaps have seen them. Now, what is the position of this question in England?—and I refer to the Board schools of England. They rose in 1870 with the Education Act. The State wanted to make the meshes of the education net so close that no fish could escape, and they went into the highways and byways and brought in the children of the poor; and here is what is said on the subject:—

“There are 6,291 Board schools, with 1,011,477 children, and at present the Board schools educate more than one-third of the children of the poor. The State acted wisely in permitting religious instruction and Bible-reading in the Board schools during school-hours. It refused to make it compulsory, by introducing a ‘conscience clause,’ which allowed any to absent themselves from the hour of religious instruction at discretion. But religious instruction was there. The various local School Boards throughout the country have the power of omitting the religious instruction altogether. How do they use it? Well, out of the 6,291 schools there are only three or four in which the Bible is not read or explained. The number of children who attend too late to profit by Scripture-lessons is inconsiderable: the first lesson is on Scripture. Similar instruction is given, with few exceptions, regularly, in accordance with the plan adopted by the London School Board. In Birmingham, where these schools are supposed to be most secular, the Bible-reading was originally left out, but it has now been resumed, with religious instruction. Most of the School Board masters and mistresses come from training colleges and institutions where religious influences are paramount. The biblical instruction in Board schools is similar to the religious instruction in ‘voluntary and Christian schools;’ if anything it is better—more systematic and more carefully prepared, the chief difference being that it omits the Catechism and all formulæ distinctive of the creeds of particular Churches. The Nonconformists are satisfied with the Board schools, and the Established clergy are in many instances members of the School Board and active as chairmen of the local committees of management.”

I will now read section 91 of the London School Board’s minutes, which runs thus:—

“In the schools provided by the Board the Bible shall be read, and there shall be given such explanations of such instructions therefrom in the principles of morality and religion as are suited to the capacities of children.”

Simple prayers and hymns are also used at these schools, and the London Board has drawn up an elaborate system of biblical instruction, ranging over the whole of the Bible. For the rest, the details are left by the Government entirely in the hands of the committee of each Board. It is only necessary to take up the syllabus of Bible-teaching issued for 1882 to show that sound religious and undogmatic teaching may be given in connection with the Bible. The Bible is made the grand centre of religious instruction in the Board schools. Now, I commend this information to those who have not made up their minds on this subject; and I am sure—if they consider what has been written, and the information we have upon the system as it exists in the Old Country, and its satisfactory results—it will satisfy them that we shall be acting wisely by following the good example set at Home. It is also allowed in the school system of New South Wales. In other countries which I will mention it also prevails; and I will quote very briefly from a very eloquent and able speech that was delivered on this subject by a gentleman who was recently a candidate at the late elections in the Wairarapa. His remarks are given in these words:—

“In America it is the common practice to open or close public schools with Bible-reading and prayer: the influence of the school is on the side of morality and religion. In Germany it is said, ‘Religious training is part of universal education.’ In Switzerland there is Bible-reading. In England there is Bible-reading; and the London School Board, in June, 1886, resolved on a thorough and detailed examination in Scripture-knowledge in every school once every third year. In Victoria, where the Bible was excluded, and all passages relating to Christian teaching struck out of school ‘readers,’ the Minister has promised to advise the Cabinet to ask Parliament to reinstate them. The Melbourne Age, the great opponent of religious teaching, has declared that ‘for the safety of the nation there must be a change.’ In France, where there is on the part of the State a violent intolerance of all religion, where the name of God is excluded from the schools, crime of all kinds is increasing with startling rapidity, and is worst where the education is highest.”

These facts ought to make honourable members pause in considering this most important question. We find this system, as I have said, in one sister colony; and, from the information we possess, it is about to be introduced into another. Shall we be the last to adopt it? Shall we be the last to give way to the religious influences that we desire to see introduced into our schools? Experience teaches us, and we learn from history, that nations without religion fall into decay. We have only to look at the nations of the past—for example, Greece and Rome, which were foremost in the arts and sciences—to be assured that they fell into decay because they had no religion; and that will be the fate of this country if we exclude religion from our public schools. The youth of the country will grow up as infidels, and we shall find that as religious influences decay so will our nation. If it is true, as the honourable the mover of this Bill said that it was commonly remarked that “it is no part of the duty of the State to teach religion in the public schools,” then I say the converse is equally true, that it is no part of the duty of the State to prevent its being taught. I have only to appeal to the better feelings of the representatives of the people, who are here to represent the people’s best interests, and if they do their duty to themselves and to the people they represent they must grant to the people what they now demand, and that is—the permitting of religious instruction in the public schools.

Mr. BLAKE.—Sir, I think if the reading of the Bible in schools causes so much seriousness to the scholars as this debate has caused to me they will be very glad to get away to play. When young I was taught that the Bible was a book of peace and good. In this House, after the various expressions of opinion on the part of the representatives of the people, it seems to be almost a book of discord; and, if there is so much discord and so many differences of opinion among the chosen of the land, there will be differences of opinion among the children, and it is likely to disturb the schools just as the torpedo which got away the other day disturbed the harbour. I am opposed to the reading of the Bible in schools, because I think the schools have been a success without them, and I think the probability is that the schools will be broken up if we begin it. I do not know that I have much more to say, except that, in introducing this religious question into the schools, we shall have to suit the wishes of those who believe in the Maxims of Confucius, or in the Koran of Mohammed, and I do not know that we should not have also to suit the lost ten tribes of Israel;—there are so many differences of opinion even in a small population like ours. The population we have to be taught would not be very large—about eighty-three thousand—and amongst these children there will be some representing all kinds of beliefs and opinions; and I suppose, in the matter of colour, they will range from the Ethiopian to the albino, and, in the matter of religion, from the professor of religion to the dire atheist, who fears nothing but pain. And how they are going to meet these difficulties seems strange to me.

Mr. FULTON.—I hope the honourable gentleman will pardon me. Surely he does not think this a denominational Bill.

Mr. BLAKE.—It seems very like it. The honourable member, in an able speech, said that the Bible should be explained in the schools; and another honourable gentleman, who also made a very able speech, said that the Bible should be read, and that the child should make the best of it he can. I do not think, however, that it will do much good. What I have learned from that book has taught me that "a house divided against itself cannot stand;" and I believe that the differences of opinion that would arise from the introduction of the Bible into the public schools would certainly have the effect of breaking the schools down.

Mr. HOBBS.—I should not like this Bill to go to the vote without taking advantage of the opportunity to give my reasons for the vote I am about to give. I should have no difficulty whatever in the vote I am about to give if we all belonged to one denomination. But, unhappily, that is not the case; and I consider that religious strifes and differences are the worst kind of all differences, and we have not to go very far back in the history of the world to know that. Several speakers assume that because the Bible is not taught in our public schools therefore the children get no religious teaching; and yet you will find that most people who speak of religion at all can remember how the first impressions made upon their minds were at their mothers' knee and at various sanctuaries which they attended, not that they had been rubbed into them by the schoolmaster. I was kept in school one day and had to learn, for punishment, a chapter of Proverbs, and I am not prepared to say that that made a favourable impression on my mind. I think there are many persons who are defending the introduction of the Bible into our schools who have really not considered the question as they ought to have done. It is a matter of sentiment with a great many men. We must be careful that, in a question of this kind, we do not introduce into our public schools "the thin end of the wedge" which will have the effect of introducing denominationalism. I was a member of the Board of Education where the system of denominationalism prevailed many years ago, and there I saw the evil of it, and I shall never forget the evils that came under my notice. It would take a great deal to influence me in favour of denominational education. These are some of the reasons why I shall not vote for this Bill. I will not detain the House longer, because I know that honourable members are very anxious to get on with other business. I did not, however, feel disposed to allow this question to go to the vote without, at any rate, giving some reasons why I shall vote against the measure.

Dr. NEWMAN.—As one who is very enthusiastic about the present system of education, I should not like this debate to be so entirely lopsided as it appears to have become. The honourable member for Waipawa told us that he would defy any one to teach morality in schools without reference to the Bible. When he goes on to talk, as other honourable members have also done, of the rowdism and larrikism of our young people, I say, that is a monstrous slander. Clergymen in the churches are always telling us of the rowdism and larrikins of young New Zealand. I say it is a foul slander.

Mr. TANNER.—When I spoke of larrikism I spoke of a remark made by the late Premier.

Dr. NEWMAN.—One sees in the newspapers statements to the effect that the young people educated in the State schools are often larrikins and rowdies. I say the reverse is the fact. I say, as regards the schools in this colony and in New South Wales and Canada, that the schools do teach uprightness and morality; and comparison shows the enormous advantage, from a moral point of view, which children attending the State schools derive. In Great Britain, since the establishment of the State system of education, the gaols have become rapidly empty, and juvenile crime has decreased. In Canada crime had decreased year by year since the establishment of the State system of education; so much so that a little while ago no fewer than eleven gaols were put up to auction because there were no inmates to fill them; and why? Because of the State system of education. Young New Zealand commits fewer crimes per hundred of the population than are committed in any other part of the world. For honourable members to come and talk of the rowdiness and larrikinism in this colony I say is preposterous. There is far less rowdiness and larrikinism in the streets now than there used to be when there were no State schools in New Zealand. Wherever children are not taught under our system the crime amongst uneducated children is four times more than what it is where our State schools are. One has only to go through our streets to see the marked improvement there is in the children. If we look at the numbers of boys and girls congregated in the large cities we shall find that the amount of crime is small. As to the little larrikinism which occurs in the streets: amongst the gilded youths of the universities at Home, amongst the higher students of the London University, you see every bit as much larrikinism. There they call it "effervescence of youthful spirits;" but the moment anything like larrikinism occurs here it is charged to our education system. The greatest boon which has been conferred upon the people of this colony has been our system of education.

Mr. PARATA.—This Bill commends itself to me because it provides for religious instruction in schools, and because a number of people are in favour of religious instruction being granted to the children. I am quite in sympathy with them upon that point. These words, "Scriptural teaching," mean a very great deal. There is one thing which does not appear to me to be clear in the measure before the House. It is not stated what portion of the Scripture shall be taught. There seems to be a great diversity of opinion amongst honourable members. Some are entirely in favour of the Bible being read in schools, others are emphatically opposed to it. The question is, Who is right? As there seems to be a strong desire for religious instruction, I think that a trial should be made; and let us judge by the result. With regard to there being a great number of children at school who belong to different Churches, and with regard to the supposition that that will be an apple of discord, it is quite true that there are a great many denominations, but I think that they all admit that religious instruction is the one important thing. The parents of the children all admit that we should teach the children what is right, so that they may distinguish between good and evil—to know right from wrong. I think that is of paramount importance. We know that if a person does wrong—takes what does not belong to him—the law provides a punishment. Now, the Scripture teaches us that it is wrong to bear malice against others, or to take what does not belong to us. In fact, the whole of the moral teaching that we require is contained in the Bible. I think that the wishes of the people should be acceded to, and that an experiment should be made. A great number of honourable gentlemen have been returned to this House pledged to support Bible-reading in schools, and if these honourable gentlemen do their duty to their constituents they will support this measure, and so grant the wishes of their constituents. I again reiterate that I think a trial should be made. I hope that, if this measure become law, the children in Native schools will have the same privilege as is now sought to be given to others. People in some parts of my district have urged me to support this Bill. This very matter was discussed in the House in 1885. I spoke against the Bill on that occasion. It occurred to me then that if the Bible were read in schools there would be this difficulty: that the children of Roman Catholics, or Mormons, or other denominations who did not approve of Bible-reading in schools would have to wait outside while the Bible was being read. That was the objection which induced me to oppose that measure; but since then I have observed that it is the great wish of the people to have religious instruction in the schools, and therefore I consider it my duty to support this measure now. We must all admit that religious instruction is a very important matter. We all know that before men are allowed to give evidence in the Courts of justice they have to take an oath on the Bible, and that is a proof we attach great importance to it. Then, the marriage ceremony is by many made a religious ceremony. I look upon the Bible as the groundwork of all our proceedings. The first teaching we should have is to fear God, and to be afraid to do that which is evil. I will not say more, but I will support this measure.

Mr. TAIWHANGA.—Sir, as far as I can understand, all the foundation of England is the Bible, and all her laws are made on the Bible. Therefore it is a very important thing that the Bible should be taught to children. Without the Bible I do not think that England would stand for many years. One chief of Samoa went to England, and he went to see the Queen, and he asked the Queen, "How is it that England is so large?" The Queen simply took up the Bible, and said, "That is what makes England what you see." That is what I heard in England, but whether it is true or false I cannot say. Therefore I say New Zealand must follow the example of England, because it is our Mother-country. Of course there are laws in New Zealand, and what is passed here we must follow. There are so many religions in New Zealand that they must all be satisfied, and, of course, every one of us must be equal. I merely stood up to say that I would support this Bill.

Mr. FISHER.—Sir, while I yield to no man in my respect for the Bible, I yet feel constrained to oppose this Bill. And I wish it to be understood that I do not speak in the interest of those persons called secularists, but because I dread the dislocation or derangement of the State system of education by the school-floor being made the battle-ground of religious intolerance. Those honourable gentlemen who have spoken of countries where the Bible is read in schools have not referred to those countries where the introduction of religious influences has led to most regretful results. For instance, they have not referred to the deplorable consequences which resulted from the admission of ministers of religion into the schools of Newfoundland. Two or three years ago the scholastic and religious worlds were startled by the frenzied and fanatical feuds which broke up the schools of Newfoundland and other Canadian provinces, and which were the direct outcome of denominationalism. Now, if it is really desired to have read in our schools selected portions of the Scriptures, I see no difficulty in the way. We see from the petitions presented to the House, and we gather from the speeches made on this occasion, that there is a very general desire to have portions of the Scriptures read in the public schools; and I should feel inclined to agree with those who move in the matter if they would consent to accept the Irish Board Scripture-lessons, to which the honourable member for Hawke's Bay has referred. That would be a fair compromise. But how were those selections made? After great conflict and almost interminable controversy they were drawn up by two Archbishops, an Anglican and a Roman Catholic Archbishop; and that fact in itself shows that no selection would have been acceptable unless made by some such eminent authorities. But what would happen under this Bill? The School Committee is to direct that every morning, at the opening of the school, a portion of the Bible is to be read aloud by the scholars. There, at once, you put more or less power of selection into the hands of possibly irreverent teachers and also possibly irreverent children. I have already said that it is in the power of those who desire this change to do now what they want to do; and here is the proof. The Education Act, section 84, says,—

"The school shall be kept open five days in each week for at least four hours, two of which in the forenoon and two in the afternoon shall be consecutive, and the teaching shall be entirely of a secular character.

"The school-buildings may be used on days and at hours other than those used for public school-purposes upon such terms as the Committee may from time to time prescribe."

There is the fullest liberty to use the schools for the purpose of giving religious instruction, if the Committees wish to use them for that purpose. If their feeling is so strong as it has been represented to be—and as I have no doubt it is—why not elect Committees who will insist that religious teaching shall be given in the schools after the secular teaching is finished? It is said that that would not be fair to the children; but I say that it would be not only fair to the children, but it would be fair also to the religious sentiment of the country. But, Sir, is it not a singular thing that, while we have two hundred religious creeds, there are but two methods of cooking a potato? I am all too conscious that large numbers of people regard this question with great earnestness of feeling, but, as I have pointed out, there is already provided in the Education Act a means of carrying out their views if they chose to avail themselves of it. If the various religious bodies entertain so strong an opinion upon this question as is expressed in the numerous petitions presented to the House, and in the speeches delivered in synods and Church-meetings—if there were the life, vigour, and enthusiasm in the Churches which those petitions would seem to indicate, they would avail themselves of those means; but it is fair to conclude that, as this clause is not acted upon, it is proof that the life and vigour and enthusiasm are not altogether what they are represented to be. There are the means, if the religious bodies wish to use them, to obtain that form of teaching which they so much desire. I think it would be a retrograde step to amend the existing Act. I ask, with all respect—for I do not wish to show the slightest disrespect to any persons or bodies of persons—the means being ready to hand, why do they strive to arrive at the same conclusion by a circuitous route? I do not wish to dwell on the fact of there being too many different religious distinctions, but we cannot conceal from ourselves the possibility of so many differences and distinctions leading to the display of religious intolerance in the schools. When these numerous religious creeds become merged into one broad Christianity, then we may introduce religious teaching into our schools without fear or misgiving; but, as a fair commentary upon the religious distinctions which have been built up in England, I will take the liberty of reading the view of an educated East Indian, Mr. Keshub Chunder Sen, the great native reformer of India, who died some few years ago. He says,—

"We Indians have not been able to accept any particular form of Christianity; yet we are steadfast in our attachment to Jesus Christ. Christianity is a many-sided religion, and every individual and every nation takes in a small portion of this many-sided thing. These are accepted and developed into a creed, till we see a large number of individuals, entertaining a particular kind of opinion, forming themselves into a distinct Christian denomination. Let the ministers of the various sects exchange their pulpits; let the brothers and sisters of one Church go into another and shake hands with their brothers and sisters there: then we shall find, not two hundred and fifty narrow sects scattered here and there, but one grand universal Cathedral, where ten thousand voices of ten thousand nations shall commingle in one sweet and swelling chorus, and proclaim the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man."

When we reach that state of religious tolerance it will be possible, openly and without restriction, to make religion part of the teaching in our schools; but I say it would be dangerous to attempt religious teaching in the form in which it is sought to be introduced in this Bill. I should have no objection, if scrupulous care were taken that proper religious and moral teaching were so inculcated as to establish on a sound basis a true sense of honour and integrity; but to admit the whole volume into the hands of careless and irreverent teachers, and children not sufficiently old to understand the Bible, would, I say with all deference to those who are moving in this matter, be dangerous. I hope I have not said anything which would in the slightest degree wound the feelings of those who are moving in the matter. I have as strong feelings on the subject as they, but it appears to me that we are pursuing the same end by different means. If the Bible is ever introduced into our schools, I hope it will be in the most careful manner, that the selections to be used will be most carefully made, and that the Bible will be placed only in the hands of teachers who have some reverence for the Great Work itself.

Mr. ALLEN.—The Minister of Education has spoken, and I deem it we ought to consider that the wisest man, so far as we are concerned, has given us his opinion on this subject. But, Sir, I cannot help thinking that, so far as this Bill is concerned, he has rather been studying the religious feelings of an East Indian, and the methods adopted in Ireland for carrying out religious instruction, than the actual words of this Bill. For, if I mistook him not, he said that the introduction of the Bible into the schools in the manner now proposed would lead to intolerance and strife owing to the admission of ministers. This Bill does not provide at all for the admission of ministers into the public schools. It provides simply that the scholars shall read the Bible in the schools, and nothing else. Then, the honourable gentleman used an argument which has been used more than once to-night, that under the present Act we have the power to have the Bible read in the schools. I admit we have the power now to have the Bible read in the schools; but when? That is the question. Is it during school-hours or out of school-hours? You cannot have the Bible read in the schools during school-hours; and, if I remember rightly, the honourable member for Inangahua mentioned a circumstance which is direct proof, to my mind, that the fact of the Bible being excluded during school-hours shows that we want a Bill of this kind. The honourable gentleman mentioned an instance in which the School Committee allowed the Bible to be read in school for twenty minutes after school-hours, with the result that, in a very short time, only one pupil remained to hear it. If I can read anything from that fact it is this: that if Bible-reading in schools is to be of any use at all it must be in school-hours, and not by forcing a child to remain twenty minutes extra beyond the school-hours. It must be made a portion of the school-teaching within the school-hours, or it can have no effect at all. Is it likely that children will give up twenty minutes of their play even for the reading of Holy Writ? If necessary, I might refer to what has been and what is being done in other countries; but I know that there are other Bills to come on, and I will not detain the House with any detailed remarks about other countries. I will only say that in Germany and Switzerland religion is the basis of education in the elementary schools, and it forms a very large and a very essential part of the education of children in Great Britain, Italy, and Belgium. I believe all these five countries are enlightened countries that we may well take a lesson from. It has been argued this evening that by allowing the Bible to be read in the schools we open the door to denominationalism. I totally and entirely deny that it opens the door to denominationalism at all; and I, for one, would be the first to resist any attempt at denominational education. It does not, in my opinion, open the door to any denomination. My honourable friend the member for Rangitikei said he is a Democrat, demanding that the Bible shall be read in the schools; and my honourable friend the member for the Bay of Islands said that was illogical. If Democracy means anything at all, it means that the majority shall rule; and I ask members of this House, seeing the petitions that have been put on that table, and reading—if they can read it—public opinion, whether the majority in this country have not demanded that the Bible shall be read in the schools.

Hon. MEMBERS.—No.

Mr. ALLEN.—I ask those who say "No" to travel through the length and breadth of the land, go to every home, to every parent, and come back and then say whether or not the Democracy has demanded that this Bill shall pass. I say they will be convinced, if there is any conviction in them, that the Democracy has demanded it. Then, let me ask, why is this the only book—or one of a very few books—excluded from the public schools of the colony? What does that mean? To my mind, it means this to the child—

Mr. TAYLOR.—Sir, I rise to a point of order, and to ask your ruling on this: I understand the honourable gentleman to say that the present education system does not provide for religious instruction, that the schools are not open for it either before or after school-hours. I think the honourable gentleman is labouring under some misapprehension in the way he is arguing the question.

Mr. SPEAKER.—That is not a point of order. You can answer any arguments you disagree with when the honourable member has finished speaking.

Mr. ALLEN.—If I base my arguments on false grounds the honourable gentleman will be able to reply to them, and I dare say, if I had an opportunity to speak again, I could upset his reply. I asked why the Bible is the only book, or nearly the only one, excluded from the schools. Perhaps that touched the honourable gentleman, and he did not like to hear it, and so he interrupted me. What does the special exclusion of this book teach the child? It must teach him that in this book there is something he ought not to see and ought not to read.—(No.)—I say, if the book is kept out of the school, it must be kept out for some reason. And what is the reason? It is this: that the child ought not to have it read to him. There are other books of every kind allowed; and why should this one be debarred? It is the voice of the persistent minority trying to overrule the majority. I will only touch on one other argument that has been used, and it is one that has been used with some force, or apparently with some force. Some honourable gentlemen have said that the public schools are no place in which the Bible should be read, or in which religious instruction should be given, and that the home, at the mother's knee, is the place where the child should receive religious instruction. I am quite prepared to admit that at the mother's knee is the place where the child should receive religious instruction; but I must modify that admission by this: Is every home a fit place for a child to receive religious instruction? Is every father or every mother fit to impart religious instruction? If they were that argument would be one of great force. But, unfortunately, there are men who are debased by crime, who are debased by drunkenness, who are debased by many other evils; and, unfortunately, too, there are women who must be put in the same category. Are such men and such women fit to impart religious instruction to their children? They are not, and that unfitness is found not only among the poor, but among the rich; and I say that in either case, either amongst the rich or amongst the poor, in such cases it is impossible in the home at the mother's knee to impart such religious instruction as ought to be imparted. I felt compelled to rise after the speech of the Hon. the Minister of Education, because I thought he spoke with some considerable amount of authority, and I thought some one should reply to him; and, having attempted to do so, I will not detain the House longer, as time presses and there is much business yet to do.

Mr. FERGUS.—I think those who are advocating Bible-reading in schools are assuming a great deal more than the facts warrant, and especially do I think my honourable friend the member for Dunedin East assumed a great deal more than he was warranted in assuming, when he said that the majority of the people of the colony are in favour of the introduction of the Bible into the schools. Does the honourable gentleman know the history of the movement for the introduction of the Bible into the schools, or the action which was taken by the Bible-in-schools party? The honourable member for the Taieri and myself were members of the Otago Education Board some years ago, when the Bible-in-schools party sent circulars to all the parents of school-children throughout Otago, asking whether they were in favour of the introduction of the Bible into the schools or not. What was the result? The great bulk of the people declined altogether to send replies. Fifty per cent. of the parents in that school-district absolutely declined to answer the circular at all. The people are not in favour of the introduction of the Bible into the schools; and I will give the reasons: In the first place, just as surely as you introduce the Bible into the schools, in all fairness and justice you must grant denominational education. You can stop nothing short of that—that is the logical sequence—that is inevitable.

Mr. ALLEN.—No.

Mr. FERGUS.—Then, where is the honourable gentleman's logic and his desire for fair-play? If the Bible were introduced into the schools I, for one, should be found under the banner of denominationalism. A great many honourable gentlemen say that all they want is simply the Bible read in the schools without note or comment. But as soon as that had been got there would be something else they would want. It is the thin end of the wedge we should have allowed the party to insert, and they would soon drive it right home.

An Hon. MEMBER.—What party?

Mr. FERGUS.—The clerical party. Honourable members talk about the petitions sent, and the number of people they are signed by. How are these things managed? Let me describe. This Bible-in-schools party sent round the celebrated circular I have referred to to every parent. Directly after the circular has been received round goes the clergyman, who says to the good wife, "Did you receive the circular about Bible-reading in schools?" "Yes." "What are you going to do with it?" "I don't know." "Oh, the Word of God is the most precious thing, and it is a crying shame it should be debarred from the public schools. Fill in the answer, and send it to the secretary." And, as a matter of course, a great many of them did so; and it comes here as the voice of the people. If the people of New Zealand want one thing I opine that it is to maintain intact and inviolate the present system of education. This Bible-in-schools party deliberately, in a great many cases, are playing into the hands of the enemies of our present system of education. What does the whole thing arise from? Simply from the laziness of the people preventing them from teaching the religion they profess to believe. They want, in other words, to establish a State Church in New Zealand.

Hon. MEMBERS.—No.

Mr. FERGUS.—Yes. You want to establish a State Church. Because the professors of religion and the parents are incapable of doing what they should do, or for some other reason, they wish to force the whole of the duty on the State, and want the State to teach religion to the children. And what would be the result in the matter of teaching? To raise up religious differences in the various Committees, and cause strife amongst them as to who would have the appointment of the teacher, so that their peculiar views would be favoured. And what will you do? You will be doing an injustice to a great many of the children of the colony. It means another thing. We have laid it down, very rightly, I think, that the State shall not teach in reference to religious matters. We have decided that we shall give secular education, but not religious education. Now, suppose that it is true, as the honourable member for Dunedin East says, though I do not admit it, that a majority of the people demand this religious education in the schools, and you pass this Bill, then you are infringing the rights and consciences of a very considerable minority.

Hon. MEMBERS.—No.

Mr. FERGUS.—Yes; of every Jew, every free-thinker, every man who does not believe in all the tenets contained within the borders of the Old and New Testaments. And you are doing more than that: you are inevitably breaking down the system which has grown up under our hands—a system of education which is conducive to morality, as all education is, because we know that since the free, secular, and compulsory system has been established in Victoria crime has been gradually decreasing—convictions have been coming down year by year; and, when we reflect that of the people in Victoria considerably more than half were born in that colony, it cannot be asserted that the reading of the Bible in schools is the cause of that improvement. The same thing is taking place in New Zealand. Our crime is decreasing year by year, the number of people convicted is growing less and less, and our present system of education has not been in force over ten years. I hope that this House does not intend to pass the Bill of the honourable member for the Taieri. I am quite certain that on this question the House is absolutely sound at heart. I am perfectly well aware that the country is sound at heart on the question; and I am bold enough to say that, if the only issue was whether we should have the Bible in schools or denominational education, the country would prefer the latter; but by an enormous majority the people would say that the present system of education must be left intact and inviolate. I do not disparage the Bible for a moment, but its true place is in the church, the Sunday-school, and, most of all, at the mother's knee in the home.

Mr. TAYLOR.—I think the honourable member for Dunedin East, though he is not often illogical, was quite wide of the mark. He said that there are people in this country, fathers and mothers, who are not capable of teaching their children religion, and then he went on to say that these children must be taught religion in the State schools. Now, that shows that this is simply a denominational "move." I say it is not at all necessary that the State should teach these children religion, because the Act provides that clergymen may go to schools an hour before or an hour after school-hours to teach the children religion. Now, if these gentlemen were sincere they would take advantage of these hours to go and teach the children religion, to teach them what they believe in. I listened with pleasure to the speech of the honourable member for the Bay of Islands, in which he told us the result of having chapters of the Bible set before him to learn when he was young; because his experience has confirmed my impressions. About four months ago I met two or three aged men in Christchurch, and I asked them what they thought of Bible-reading in schools. I asked them this question: "In your young days was it customary to start from Genesis and go right through the book?" They said it was, and that the result was that they used to dread coming on to jaw-breaking names; but that, speaking conscientiously, they could say that reading the Bible in that way did them no good, but rather set them against it. And I can indorse that myself, so far as that goes. Now, I ask those honourable gentlemen who want to break up the education system of the country to come down boldly and say so. A member of this House has told me that that is the object he has in view. He said, "We want to get the first spike into the system, and then we will get another in, and so break it up altogether." Well, as long as I am in this House I will fight against that, and in favour of our present free and secular system. "Free," so called; but I entirely deny that it is free in any sense of the term. The working-men of the country contribute through the Customs and in other ways towards the general taxation, and pay for every iota of education that they get. They pay for it, and it is monstrous to talk of it as if the people were educated under it as paupers. I cannot tolerate that for a moment. I have great respect for the honourable member for the Taieri, and I believe that he is moving in this direction not from any desire for popularity, but because he sincerely thinks he is doing right; but I would ask the honourable gentleman to consider what position he is placing us in. Certainly I am not going to be a party to bring about the results which this Bill, in my opinion, would bring about. I say that most distinctly, and I hope honourable members generally will take the same view, and that, without further delay, we shall reject this Bill, which is the first attempt to split up our system of education.

Mr. WITHEY.—I had intended to give a silent vote against the second reading of this Bill, but it appears to me that most of the speakers have missed an important principle that underlies this question of religious instruction in the State schools. The question as it presents itself to my mind is this: Is the State warranted in taxing the whole of its people to teach the religious opinions of a section? The Minister of Justice touched to some extent on that point, but did not put it in that distinct form in which I should have liked to see it stated. This question seems to have three stages. The first of these we have before us to-night. I quite believe that many honourable members who approve of Bible-reading in schools do not wish to go any further than it is proposed to go by this Bill. But I cannot help seeing in the country—and the discussion here to-night has shown the same thing—that the advocates of religious education and the advocates of a denominational system of education are with those who want Bible-reading in schools, and I am therefore very anxious that we should not take the first step. The honourable member for Dunedin East spoke about the character of many homes. We must all admit what he says, and deplore it; but I say that that is a condition of affairs for the amelioration of which the State cannot usefully intervene. Many countries have found that the absence of general knowledge is detrimental to the prosperity of the State, and tends to create crime and wretchedness, and therefore have decided to endeavour to ameliorate the condition of the people by educating them. So far the State can intervene with safety. But I maintain that this question of morality and religion is one into which the State cannot enter. It could not do so usefully; and it could not do so justly, because of the principle that I have laid down. I did not intend to speak, and am not going to weary the House; but I must just say that there is one rather pleasing feature of the discussion which deserves notice. The honourable member for the Northern Maori District told us the other day that England was a great country because she had railways everywhere, and that we ought to follow her example; but to-night he has told us that she is great because of the Bible. I am glad to see that he is progressing, and I believe that he has now come to a sound conclusion.

Mr. DUNCAN.—I have only a few words to say on this subject. I must say that I have a great deal of sympathy with the mover of this Bill; and I should very much like to see the Bible introduced into the schools if it could be done without raising what is known as "feeling." I have presented two petitions from the district from which I come; but I know that these come from one part, from one section of the district. The district generally, I believe, is not in favour of this Bill; and that is where the trouble comes in. We should have a great deal of feeling shown. It would begin with the Committees. There would be an attempt to elect Committees in favour of the introduction of the Bible into schools, and according to some religious sect, such as Presbyterians, or Methodists, or Anglicans, or Catholics; then there would be an attempt to get men who would suit, to teach in the direction the Committee wished. We have been told by the member for Dunedin East, and rightly so, that there are many fathers and mothers who are unable to give religious instruction to their offspring. But are there not many teachers in the colony who would be unfit to give religious instruction? I think a majority would not be likely to be able to please the Committees. That is my opinion, at any rate. Now, I will go one point further and state that, if the honourable gentleman who introduced this Bill is prepared to vote to allow the capitation-grant to Catholic schools—I mean the schools that are thrown open to inspection, and come up to the standard of the other schools of the colony—if he will agree that they should get capitation-allowance, I will go with him into the lobby; but I want him to state that plainly when he replies; if he does not do so I shall be compelled to vote against him. The honourable member for Dunedin East, when speaking, said that he was the very man to stand out against denominationalism; but what does he want to do but to introduce a denominational system—a denominational system which suits himself, and none besides? The subject has been very well debated to-night, and as honourable members are probably anxious to vote, I will not say more; but I certainly do wish the honourable gentleman in charge of the Bill to say what he is prepared to do in the direction I have indicated. If he goes the length I have asked him to go, I will go with him on the second reading of the Bill; but if not I shall be forced to go into the other lobby.

Mr. LEVESTAM.—It was asserted by the honourable member for Dunedin East that a majority of the people of New Zealand were in favour of Bible-reading in schools, and, when other honourable members interjected "No," he said, "Well, let them go through the length and breadth of the land; let them visit the homes of the people, and when they come back tell me that." I ask him, has he been through the length and breadth of the country? Has he visited the homes of the people in order to support his opinion? I ask him, has he examined the petitions laid on the table of this House? For, if he has, he will see that a large number of signatures have been written by the same hand. Does he know how canvassers go about? I will tell him. A canvasser goes to a house and obtains the signature of the head of the household, and then he tells him that he will be justified in putting down the signatures of his wife and of all the other members of the household.

Mr. FULTON.—Will the honourable gentleman be kind enough to say what particular petition he refers to, or where it came from?

Mr. LEVESTAM.—I refer to petitions that have been got up in favour of Bible-reading in schools.

Mr. FULTON.—Where?

Mr. LEVESTAM.—If I tell that I shall be breaking confidence; but I can assure the honourable gentleman—and I have no doubt he will accept my assurance that that is so—that a person who was a canvasser acted in that manner.

Mr. FULTON.—If the honourable gentleman refers to the Nelson District I shall be able to show him why I ask.

Mr. LEVESTAM.—I think I should be breaking faith if I were to state where it was, but I can assure him that that occurred. Then, the honourable gentleman tells us that this will not open the door to denominationalism. He says that is not wanted. Now, I hold in my hand a speech delivered at the opening of the Synod at Nelson during this present month, and will tell him what the Bishop of Nelson says:—

"I hope we shall, without delay, send our petition to the Houses of Legislature, in whatever form it seems best to you to frame it. We must watch the proceedings narrowly, lest we have a permission for religious instruction given in such a form that, by the use of the word 'non-controversial,' the reading of the Word of God itself shall be excluded, as was the case in the former Nelson Provincial Act. The simplest course of all would be to add a clause to this effect: 'The Bible, and instruction thereon, may be given in the public schools at the option of the local Committee; and this further proposal: that, where fifteen or twenty heads of families desire it, they may have a capitation-grant given to them, provided the scholars satisfy the examinations of the Government Inspector."

Is not that controverting what the honourable gentleman here asks? Bible-reading in schools would not satisfy the clergy, and it would not satisfy those who are agitating for it. No, what they want is denominationalism; and what would be the effect of that? It would simply mean the breaking-up of the whole system of education. The Bishop of Nelson actually asks that, where fifteen or twenty heads of families require it, they should have the capitation-grant. If you take a country school, and from the school take the children from fifteen families, how many would be left for the State teacher? The inevitable effect of passing such a Bill as this would be to break up the educational system.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Mr. LEVESTAM.—My honourable friend says, "No." He is welcome to his opinion; but I think I have the argument altogether on my side. If a number of parties of families took away their children from a country school I do not think there would be many pupils left for the State school-teacher.

An Hon. MEMBER.—That is denominational schools.

Mr. LEVESTAM.—I do not know if the honourable gentleman is hard of hearing; but I am speaking against denominationalism; and I say that wherever it is introduced it will break up our school system; and I say that is what is asked for by this Bill, and in proof of that I refer to what I have just read from the speech of the Bishop of Nelson. The Bishop of Nelson lays great stress upon the fact that they did not make it a party question or a sine quâ non at the last general election, and he lays it down that it should be so treated at the next general election; and yet he says, later on, "Well, preaching cannot teach them, for God preaches to them in His Word, which they profess to acknowledge, and they hearken not. There is nothing left but prayer." There is no doubt that the clergy are very much interested in bringing forward this Bill and in getting it carried; but there are also other people who are very much interested in passing this Bill. I ask, is not the best man to fight in any cause the one who has the subject at heart? And yet what do we find? We find leaflets sent broadcast over this land signed by men who, to add weight to their names, have affixed certain mystic letters thereto: "M.L.C." Why was that done? We have been told that these petitions were signed right through the land. And how were they signed? They were signed, as my honourable friend the Minister of Justice told us, simply because people were persuaded into it. My friends from the other House have also sought to surround the thing with a lot of influence on those who perhaps have not the education or knowledge to judge for themselves. What would their names have been worth but for the "M.L.C."? Nothing. And nobody would have gone to the trouble of printing it. Why did they not ask other people who had not "M.L.C." to their names? I say they tried to surround this matter with a halo. And if they were so earnest why do we not find them fighting for it? Why did they not resign their seats in the Council, and stand against those who were opposed to it? They did not do that, and I will state why. My opponent in Nelson stood in the interests of a Bill of this kind, and he told the people there that in that district alone eight hundred people had signed in favour of it; but he added, "Of those, only seven voted for me;" and he ended by telling the people that if they took his advice they would never stand on that ticket. I suppose they have had similar experiences elsewhere, and so, though they were willing to urge others to fight in a cause they knew was hopeless, they had not the courage to leave their places of security and come and fight for that which they contended to be right. We have been told by a good many that it is the duty of the Government to teach religion in schools—

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Mr. LEVESTAM.—My honourable friend tells us so. He told us that prayers were read here every day, and that we thus acknowledged that religion should be taught. But I ask him, is this Assembly better than any other Assembly where no prayers are read? Are the proceedings we have witnessed in this House time after time such that we can claim that the prayers to which we have listened have done any good, or that we are better than other men? He tells us there is great virtue in this prayer. I ask, where is the proof of that virtue? We are told that the duty of the Government is to teach religion in schools. I take objection to that. All government is for the good of mankind. I will admit at once that that varies in different places and under different circumstances; but I think we may safely say that the good of mankind is the greatest amount of happiness to all men which they can possibly have without encroaching upon the happiness of other people. And I ask my honourable friend, is it possible to give those who wish this Bill to become law what they want without trespassing upon the happiness of others? Must we not all admit that if we teach in schools this religion—the Bible which we are asked to introduce—we are taking away happiness from those who do not believe in the Bible?—(No.)—My honourable friend says "No." There are a number of Catholics in this country who do not believe in having the Bible taught in the schools; and to my mind the introduction of the Bible in schools would compel the Catholics to pay for that in which they could not participate. I ask, is it happiness to the honourable gentleman to pay for that which he cannot enjoy or which he cannot have? Then I say that by passing this Bill we are encroaching upon the happiness of others by taking away from them that which we have no right to take away. So long as we leave the education system intact, as it is now, all can enjoy the same privileges. We teach no religion, enforce no creed, but simply give a good sound education. It has been urged by the honourable member for Dunedin East that there are some families where the father and mother are unfit to teach religion to their children. How do the Catholics do in that respect? I know, and he knows, that there are as many Catholics unfit to teach religion to their children as there are unfit Protestants. But, if the parents do not teach religion to the children, the priests do. They visit the home and the school, and teach religion. But do the clergymen who are so urgently in favour of this Bill take the same trouble as the Catholics take? No, they do not. I know of an old lady in Nelson who has been attending church regularly for over thirty years. At last she was stricken with blindness, and had to undergo an operation. The clergyman who had seen her under his pulpit for thirty years knew that she was in trouble, bodily and mentally; but did he go to see her? No, he never went; and when I was waited upon by a clergyman and asked by him to pledge myself to support this Bill I told him I should not do so. I told him my experience of the case I have just been mentioning, and he said, "I stand self-convicted." That is seven months ago, and yet since then he has never been near the old lady. That is very wrong, and I simply mention it to show the sincerity of those people who call for a Bill of this kind. We were told—I think by the honourable member for Hawke's Bay—that if we had this Bill children could be taught religion after school-hours, and that only those would remain who went to Sunday-school. Has he ever looked at the statistics we published in 1886? and have all those honourable gentlemen who are in favour of this Bill, and who tell us that the children of this colony are not taught religion—have they perused these statistics? If they do they will find that 90 per cent. of the children attend Sunday-school. Therefore, if it is admitted that a certain percentage absent themselves on conscientious grounds, all the children practically are taught religion. We are told that the moral tone of the children must necessarily fall very low in those countries where religion is not taught. I ask the honourable member for Dunedin East if he remembers an address delivered by Bishop Nevill in Dunedin some months ago, and the reply that was made to his Lordship's statement. Was it not shown that, although in New Zealand religion was not taught in the schools, the children were morally of a higher standard than those of a neighbouring colony where religion is taught, and that the children of New Zealand occupied a higher moral standard than the children of almost any other country? We are told, again, that the State is very unmindful of its duties in that respect. Does my honourable friend know the value of the reserves that religious bodies hold? Why, they amount in value to £877,287. I am leaving out the odd shillings and pence. That he will find in the Blue Books. Besides that they hold other endowments purely for educational purposes. If he takes against that the reserves that are held by educational bodies he will find that they are under £624,718. The honourable member for Thorndon told us that where religion is not taught crime among children is very much greater. That point has been answered by those gentlemen who replied to Bishop Nevill's address. What is asked by this Bill is, that the Bible should be read without comment. Now, what will be the effect of that? Would it give secular knowledge or religious instruction? I think it would do neither. They would be worse off than they are now. It will be admitted that the Bible is unintelligible to many persons even of intellect; but to young children the Bible must be unintelligible. Therefore, if it were read in the schools the only effect it would have would be to give them secular instruction. Does my honourable friend believe that a child would not profit more if it takes an interest in what is read than by simply droning words over that are unintelligible to it? If you take a little story that is interesting to the mind of the child, and give that to the class to read, will not the whole class follow the one who is reading, and understand it, and, when another child is called upon to take it up to read, will he not know exactly where the first left off? But if it were the Bible they would not understand it, and, instead of looking upon their book, they would look elsewhere, and would not profit much by their lesson; so that, as far as reading is concerned, they would profit very little. As regards religion, it will be generally admitted that the reading of the Bible alone would give very little knowledge of religion. But what would be the probable consequence? It would be this: that, whereas now 90 per cent. of the children attend Sunday-school, the percentage would fall very low indeed, because the parents would say, "Oh! you need not go to Sunday-school to-day because you are taught religion in school." Therefore I take it that to pass this Bill would do no good, either as far as religion is concerned or in any other way. The honourable member for Dunedin East said, "Is it likely a child will stop even to hear the Word of God when other children go to play?" Is it likely that any child would stay in school if it were not compelled to do so? If the parents say, "You shall go and learn so-and-so," the child must learn it. Are there not children who are compelled to learn music after school-hours? Are they asked whether they are desirous of learning music or anything else? No; they are told they must learn it. And if parents are desirous that their children shall learn religion they will compel them to learn religion. The honourable member for Dunedin East says, "It is the voice of the minority which rules over the majority by keeping out that book." I always understand that in assemblies of this kind the majority rules. If a majority in this House were in favour of this Bill, no minority could keep it out. If the majority of the people had been in favour of this Bill, the majority of the people would have sent representatives here to support this Bill. A few years ago an election contest took place in Nelson between two men, one of them in favour of denominational education, and the other not: and the man who lost was by far the more popular man—he was liked by everybody; but just upon that point he was beaten, and beaten very badly indeed. He had the same experience as my friend who opposed me this time. He said eight hundred signed the petition, and only seven voted for him. The contention which has been advanced, that if this Bill is passed it will not lead to denominationalism, is, in the face of this speech delivered by Bishop Suter in Nelson on the 3rd. of this month, quite contemptible. I agree with the Minister of Justice; and if this Bill is passed I should consider it my duty at once to vote for a Bill to give aid to Catholics. I think every one who has any sense of justice would do the same thing. I hold the opinion that if we pass such a Bill as this our educational system will inevitably be broken up. I consider it my duty to vote against this Bill. I have always spoken and voted against it, and will do so as long as I have the honour of a seat in this House. I have never concealed my opinion in that respect. I have always given it straight, and have told the people that I should not support the measure; and I shall not be breaking faith by opposing it.

Mr. GRIMMOND.—I rise simply to remind the House of the position in which education matters are at the present moment. We know that it is proposed from the Government benches to reduce the amount of capitation granted to the Education Department for the present year, and, in the face of that fact the introduction of this Bill will deal a blow at our education system when it occupies a very crippled and unfortunate position. Every person interested in education in New Zealand should be united; but by the introduction of this Bill you will introduce—let its advocates say what they will—the element of discord. In that part of the country from which I come the people are very much united in regard to the education question; but if you introduce this religious element you will introduce an element of discord, and we shall weaken the system that we have worked up to such a state of proficiency. I have a very great amount of respect for those who have promoted this measure, and I also believe that religious teaching would do good; but I hold that the State has no right to interfere or deal with religion at all. It has been stated that this question was submitted to the electors at the last election. The electors of this colony have been lulled into a state of security; they believed that the education system had such a hold on the people that the question of whether the Bible should be read in schools or not did not affect the election at all. It has also been said that the Bible is debarred from the schools. It is debarred during the time that secular education is taught; and rightly so, because it introduces into the schools an element of discord which I hope will be kept out. I have really nothing more to say, except that I hope and sincerely believe that this Bill will not pass. I should like to move an amendment that the Bill be read a second time this day six months, but I see my object will be attained without that step. As it is, I shall vote against the Bill.

Mr. W. P. REEVES.—I hardly expect much profit from the amount of time that has been spent in discussing this question. I do not say this is not a very large and important question; but the point is, whether it is in place here, and whether this is the time to discuss it. This House is not a debating society or a Young Men's Christian Association; if it were a body of that kind no doubt this matter would be extremely useful and important to discuss. But we come here to do practical work, and not to listen to manifestoes or the blowing-off of steam; and this, I take it, is really a manifesto. There is no chance of altering our education system in the way the honourable member for the Taieri proposes, and he knows there is no chance of doing it; this House knows it, and the country knows it; and therefore why should the honourable member occupy evenings in threshing out a question which has been so often threshed out already? There are only two reasons why the House should spend time in debating a question: one is that the matter is an entire novelty, when the matter wants to be brought before the public, and have excitement caused over it for the benefit of public opinion; and the other is that it is a matter that has been threshed out in the country, on which the people have made up their minds, and which they wish to be discussed by this House and dealt with. I do not think these reasons can be urged in favour of the present discussion. Goodness knows this matter is not a novelty! It has been discussed and talked over and fought over year after year and session after session. There is hardly an intelligent man in the country who has not thought over it, and who ought not to have been able to make up his mind about it by this time, if he has not made up his mind. I believe there is not a member of the House who has not made up his mind about it, and therefore the argument of novelty does not apply so far as the House is concerned; nor can we say that the majority of the people demand that it should be discussed by this House. But it is not a little question, or a matter which the House has to take up irrespective of a united demand on the part of the country; it is a very big matter indeed, and it is certainly something which ought not to be touched unless a great majority of the people have made up their mind and say very plainly that it should be touched. I maintain that the majority of the people have not expressed any demand that this matter should be touched. If they had they would soon send men to the House pledged to do it—most undoubtedly so. On great questions the public do exercise their power plainly enough, though not on minor questions. Advocates of Bible-reading in schools have their proper place for the argument of these questions, and that is in the country and not in this House. They should go to their constituents first, and not come here. Let them first convert the constituencies by fair argument to their own way of looking at this matter, and let them then come to this House and carry this great resolution. I do not believe the majority of people believe in the reading of the Bible in schools. I do not believe they want any change in that direction in the present system, because when we look at the religious people, the advocates of Bible-reading in schools, what do we see? We see that they are not at all united in the matter. They cannot come here and tell us what they want. When the religious bodies have made up their mind on some common platform, and when they have gone to the country and can tell this House what they want, I am certain they will get what they want. So far, they have not done that; and until they do I do not think they will get anything,—which is what some of them want, and what some of them do not want. I do not think they will get what Catholics do not want and Presbyterians want, or what the Wesleyans want and the Church-of-England people do not want; but when once they can make up their minds on some compromise, on some common demand from the country, then I believe they will get that. I think the task which the honourable member for the Taieri and his friends should set themselves about to accomplish first is to convert the constituencies, and then let them carry their point. Until they have converted the constituencies their labour here is only waste of time. I hope that, when they do set themselves to this task, they will confine themselves to fair and reasonable arguments, because I do not think, with all due respect to the honourable gentlemen, that all the arguments they have employed are fair ones. I do not think it is fair to make out that the colony is going down and down on the descending path of crime, when we know perfectly well that it is doing nothing of the kind, and that there is not on the whole a more moral and religious colony. And it is not fair to take away the character of the rising generation by making such unfounded and exaggerated declarations, which are so recklessly put forward. It degrades the rising generation of this colony, and degrades them not only in the eyes of the world, but also in their own eyes. I hate larrikinism as much as anybody; I do not think anybody would deny that larrikins are the greatest nuisances possible; but if he looks around he must admit that this is not a country that is distinguished by that nuisance. There are boys who march about three or four abreast, or stand at the corner of a street, and talk in a loud tone of voice for ten minutes or so, and do not laugh in a way that one would laugh in a lady's drawing-room; and we are told that these are larrikins. Should they see boys playing cricket hit a cricket-ball into a garden, and perhaps break a pane of glass, or boys smoking cigars which make them sick, then they cry out that larrikinism is on the increase. I maintain that the lads of this colony are as well behaved as any lads in any country of the British Empire. I am a young New-Zealander myself, and I feel very strongly the slander which has been cast upon New-Zealanders by honourable gentlemen who in their wish to attack the State system of education think that the end justifies the means. However good their end may be, it does not justify taking away the character of the colony's children. That is what I have to say on the main question. Before I sit down I should like to appeal to this House not to prolong this debate—

Hon. MEMBERS.—Oh, oh!

Mr. W. P. REEVES.—I do not think I have made such a terribly long speech that I am not entitled to say that. I would bring to the recollection of this House a very ancient proverb which says, "The devil can quote Scripture for his purpose." I can suggest a slight alteration on that, which would perhaps be not inappropriate to the proceedings this evening: "The devil's own can talk Bible-reading in schools for their purpose." I think the honourable gentlemen belonging to the legal profession may possibly be inclined to prolong this debate for their particular purpose. I would say to those who are in favour of Bible-reading in schools, "Do not play into the hands of those who may possibly be prolonging this debate for reasons of their own."

Dr. FITCHETT.—I am astonished to hear the remarkable sentiments expressed by the last speaker touching "the devil's own." This debate has been on the boards since half-past seven o'clock; it is now more than half-past eleven; and I think I am the first member of that august body who has spoken. But, leaving aspersions against the lawyers, and coming to the Bill before the House, I have a word or two to say. As I understand the matter, at the bottom of the whole of the objections to the Bill lies the conviction that it means denominationalism; and we have heard a great deal to-night as to there not being grounds for suspecting such a thing. Indeed, the honourable member who moved the second reading of the Bill said if it involved any peril to the present system of education he himself would oppose his own measure. I have in my hand a pamphlet headed "Bible in Schools," which the honourable gentleman has circulated with the view of assisting the passage of this Bill. I take it, then, that the sentiments contained in this book are sentiments which he indorses; and I ask the House to listen to me while I refer to one or two passages in the book, and I ask whether those passages are consistent with the present system of education. The pamphlet consists of a series of letters and articles—of letters chiefly. One of these letters is headed, "The Responsibility of educating Children rests primarily with the Parents, not with the State." I ask whether that is not a direct attack on our national system of education. I will not read the letter, but the heading indicates its purport. I glance down another page, and find these words: "Every district should be obliged to support its own schools in the same way as it supports its own churches." Is that consistent with the present system? Then again: "I cannot see why those who have not many or any olive-branches should contribute to the teaching of mine." Is that consistent with our system? Then, I find also the following:—

"The responsibility of educating children rests primarily upon the parents, not upon the State. . . . The expense of providing education for their children should fall primarily and directly upon the parents, and not upon the State through the medium of Education Boards. . . . It is a bad policy. . . . Government should rather call upon parents to educate their own children."

I ask, what are we to think of the real underlying motives of the gentlemen who support this Bill by a pamphlet such as that? I ask, are they honestly friendly to the present system? I question it. One honourable member pointed out that at the Anglican Synod at Auckland it was agreed that denominationalism, and nothing else but denominationalism, should be demanded. To my own knowledge, at a meeting at Dunedin presided over by the President of the Bible-in-schools Association, a lecture was delivered by the Anglican Bishop of Dunedin in which he openly avowed it, and that avowal has been indorsed by the Bishop of Nelson, I am told, and also by other clergymen in Otago.

Mr. FULTON.—The pamphlet was left here by a gentleman who is now dead, a clergyman of the Church of England. It has not been issued or published at all by the Bible-in-schools party; but there are certain things in it with which that party and those who work with them agree—notably the speeches delivered by Sir William Fox in this House, and the Hon. Mr. Menzies in the Legislative Council, and some things which the gentleman who compiled the pamphlet also states; but we do not hold ourselves responsible for all that he says.

Dr. FITCHETT.—It is very extraordinary that they should not adopt a thing which they have circulated. This pamphlet has been put into the pigeon-hole of every honourable member for the purpose of this debate. Apart from the avowed sentiments of those honourable members who support Bible-reading in schools, a slight examination of the question will satisfy any one as to what is the logical outcome. The Bill is asked for because we must have religious teaching in schools. If that is so we must have the religious teaching of one sect and have a State Church, or we must allow the religious teaching of every sect; and if we allow the religious teaching of every sect we have nothing more or less than denominationalism. If the various creeds could define a common platform, if they could eliminate all discordant elements, and come down to the House and ask that such-and-such passages in the Bible should be read, then they might have a standing in the House; but to grant Bible-reading in schools as sought in this Bill would be neither more nor less than to introduce an apple of discord.

An Hon. MEMBER.—That could be dealt with in Committee.

Dr. FITCHETT.—I take it that the principle of the Bill is Bible-reading in schools, and this House could not take upon itself the extraordinary function of deciding what particular portion of the Bible should be read. There is another way of looking at it. The Bill merely says that the Bible shall be read. There is an ambiguity there—it may be read either with or without comment. I take it that the words of the Bill are quite wide enough to admit of comment. Some honourable gentlemen say, "We do not want comment," and some say, "We do." I hold that if the Bible is read without comment it will be a positive evil, and nothing else. To read the Bible without comment must injure the Bible itself.

An Hon. MEMBER.—It cannot injure the Bible.

Dr. FITCHETT.—Well, I do not know. In the schools every book except the Bible would be expounded most fully, and every difficulty would be cleared up to the child; but this book he could ask nothing about: and can the child gather any other sentiment than that of disgust towards a book which he is compelled to read but cannot understand? I say that in the interests of the Bible itself it should not be read in the way this Bill contemplates. If comment is to be given, is it to be a mere explanation of words? That would be a farce. It necessarily involves the teaching, the inculcating and expanding of the verses, and there you come to the sectarian differences ending in denominationalism. It was well said by an earlier speaker on the other side that religion was a matter affecting the heart rather than the head. Therefore it is, I suppose, why, on the other side, we have had so much of exhortation and so little argument. The honourable gentleman asks us to pass the Bill because of the way religious teaching has worked elsewhere, and he instanced Germany and France. The illustrations are not conspicuously happy. In the first place, if religious instruction is given in German schools without causing sectarian differences, he forgets that there is only one Church in Germany; and it was, I think, the Minister of Defence who pointed out that we have forty or fifty creeds, each of which is entitled to equal recognition. And, further, as to the moral results of religious education in schools, I do not know that the honourable gentleman was conspicuously happy in the example he gave. The most infidel nation on the face of the earth is Germany, unless it be France; and education in France has been under religious control for centuries. It has been stated that it is the duty of the State to teach religion. We have had assertion for it, but we have had no reason. It has been said that, inasmuch as the State attends to physical training, to technical training, and to intellectual training in the ordinary school-work, therefore it is the duty of the State to teach religion. Now, if it is the duty of the State to teach religion, the State must decide what religion it shall teach. Here we have a State Church at once. Then, again, why should it follow, because the State teaches secular subjects, that therefore it should teach religion? Why does the State teach secular subjects? In the first place, because ignorance is the mother of crime, and the State must check crime; and, in the second place, because, unless we teach our children, our young men when they grow up will not be able to compete on level terms with the educated artisans of other countries. It is solely for these reasons, and not for any moral reason, that the State gives secular teaching to its children. Therefore no argument follows from that that the State should give religious teaching. Most of the arguments which have been urged in favour of Bible-reading in schools have been urged on false grounds. Glowing pictures have been drawn of the moral, religious, and intellectual results that will accrue to the nation if this Bill be passed. A moment's reflection will show that these gentlemen have in their minds national righteousness, not Bible-reading in schools—a very different thing. The present law is that for two hours in the morning and two hours in the afternoon secular teaching shall be given; the Bill proposes that for twenty minutes or so the Bible shall be read, the two-hours period being broken into for that purpose. Is it not absurd to say that such gigantic results as the moral, religious, and intellectual perfection of the nation are to follow from so trivial a cause? There is very much more that I could say on this subject; but, as there are many honourable members who want to follow me, I shall not proceed further.

Sir J. VOGEL.—I will briefly state the reasons which lead me to vote as I am about to vote. Before proceeding to those reasons, I should like to say a word with respect to the statistics referred to by the honourable member for Wakatipu. I am afraid that honourable gentleman draws much too favourable deductions from those statistics—much more favourable deductions than he is entitled to draw. I will also briefly refer to one of the arguments which fell from the honourable member for Dunedin East. He argued, and seemed to attach great weight to the argument, that, if the Bible were not allowed to be read in schools, the children would conceive the idea that it was not a good book; and, inferentially, he insinuated that, if this House would not allow the Bible to be read in schools, this House showed also that its opinion was that it was an objectionable book. I think that is a very shallow argument. He might just as logically say that, because we do not every evening conclude by reading a page or a chapter of one of Dickens's novels, therefore this House considers Dickens's novels objectionable books. Sir, it may be because honourable members have too high a reverence for the Bible that they object to its being trifled with, that they object to its being read in schools in such a manner as neither to do justice to its great and solemn truths nor be of advantage to the children. Indeed, they might go further and say that under such reading as this Bill proposes the children might be taught to look upon the book with a want of reverence. And so it is with members of this House. It is not to be inferred, because they do not agree to the proposal that the Bible should be read for twenty minutes in the schools, therefore honourable gentlemen do not becomingly regard the Book of Books. And now I will say a few words as to the reasons which will guide me in voting this evening. I deplore as much as any one can do the tendency which is to be observed in this colony to give children a purely secular education. For my part, I think the child which grows up without a firmly-implanted religious belief, no matter with what creed that belief is associated, is likely to become a misery to himself and an evil to the community. But I do not think the State should act the part of teacher of religion. There are too many creeds, too many refinements of creeds, to make it possible for the State to undertake that duty with satisfaction to the parents of the children, who have a right to designate what direction the religious instruction of the children shall take. And, if the State were to undertake the duty of religious instruction, it should do so thoroughly and efficiently; and I contend that it would not be doing so thoroughly and efficiently under the proposal contained in this Bill. To allow children, for twenty minutes each day, to read to each other passages from the Bible, without explanation or exposition, would infallibly create in the minds of the children a distaste for The Book and a want of reverence for its great teachings. I believe that there are only three ways by which a religious education can be given to children. The State must either leave that duty to the parents and guardians of the children, or it must undertake the duty and establish sectarian schools, or it must subsidise denominational schools conducted by private people. One of these three courses only is open, and so obviously is this the case that I cannot help thinking it must be apparent to the honourable member for the Taieri, who is not wanting in intelligence, that what we have heard throughout this House is true, that this is but the initial attempt to drive home the larger system of denominational education. For these reasons, and not because I have not a reverence for religious teaching, I feel myself compelled to vote against this Bill.

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—This is a subject which has been occupying the attention of colonists for a large number of years. Ever since 1877, when the Bible was first not allowed to be used in the public schools, the feeling has been growing that a wrong has been done to the people, and that feeling has been intensified year by year, and, I venture to say, will not be satisfied until their object is accomplished. Year by year the demand for reading the Bible in schools has increased, and honourable members may do what they please for a time, but I submit that, ultimately—whether it be a year or two or more—Bible-reading will be established in our public schools. We boast of our national system of education; but how can that system be national which proscribes the book to the presence of which we attribute the civilisation of the English countries, and, indeed, the civilisation of all the civilised world? That book is held to be the standard of civilisation. The countries which profess belief in this book are the countries most advanced in science, in literature, in art, and in all those civilising agencies of which we are so proud. Why, then, is this book, in this colony, to be kept out of our public schools? We have been told that this is simply an initial stage towards denominationalism; but that is one of those cries which are so easily got up, and which are so easily answered. If you wish to do away with denominationalism, establish Bible-reading in your schools; and, if you wish to foster denominationalism, exclude religious teaching from your schools, and, depend upon it, the demand for that teaching will be so great that in a few years the country will demand to fall back on denominationalism. Therefore, if you wish to work against denominationalism, the best way is to support this Bill. I think a great deal of misconception has arisen with respect to the terms of the Bill. I think, if the people in Otago or in Hawke's Bay, or elsewhere, desire to read the Bible in the schools, there is no reason whatever why they should be prevented from having that system. Why should we in Otago be prevented from having this system because the representatives from other parts do not want it?

Mr. KERR.—Because you want to thrust it upon us.

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—No; the very object of the Bill is to make it optional with the districts to adopt the system or not as they choose. It expressly gives authority to the School Committees to sanction the reading of the Bible. What I was about to point out was this: that we have had a great many sentimental objections to this Bill. What is the fact with regard to the past? The Bible was read in the public schools of Otago until the Act of 1877 put a stop to it, and ever since then there have been complaints and grievances in Otago in respect to that Act. Up to that time the people of that district were in perfect unanimity and harmony in this matter; and it would be so again if this Bill were passed. That the people desire it has been fully demonstrated by speakers before me this evening, and especially by the honourable member for Dunedin East. I venture to say that in several parts of the colony—take Nelson, take Otago, take Hawke's Bay, take South Canterbury—you will find five-sixths of the people in favour of this Bill.

Mr. KERR.—It was never mentioned in our district.

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—Well, that may be the fault of the honourable gentleman himself; but that it was discussed fully and prominently in the southern districts of the colony I can vouch. Now, Sir, upon the general question, in the first place I submit that this question of denominationalism is a mere myth. Then, we have been referred to the question of a State Church. What possible connection that has with the subject I cannot understand. Is there a State Church in America? Certainly not; and yet they have religious teaching there. Is there a State Church in Canada? Is there a State Church in New South Wales? Is there a State Church in Victoria? No. Why, all these arguments are simply arguments which go to show that the subject has not been thought out by those who have used them. Take, for instance, the Minister of Education. His speech seemed to me to be practically an apology. The only apology he could offer for not supporting the Bill was a number of very far-fetched arguments which did not seem to have very much bearing on the question. In the first place, he said that the reading of the Bible in schools would lead to religious intolerance. Where is the evidence of that? Not in those countries where the Bible is read in schools. We know perfectly well that at present there is a cry of intolerance in this country because the Bible is not read in the schools. In America and New South Wales, where the Bible or portions of it are read in the schools, there is not this cry of intolerance. We are told about some instances in Newfoundland where some ministers are admitted to the public schools to teach religion; but the very object of this Bill is to keep ministers out. At present considerable dissatisfaction is caused in several parts of the colony through the ministers of some denominations teaching in the public schools, the ministers of other denominations not doing so; and difficulties have arisen through privileges being conceded to the one and not to the other; and sometimes there are complaints of ministers being admitted to the schools and availing themselves of privileges they have no right to. The Minister of Education asked, Why do not the Committees sanction the reading of the Bible out of school-hours? That has been tried in several parts of the colony—we have tried it in Otago—and for the reasons given by some other honourable members it has failed. If the Bible-reading takes place before school-hours, the children will come late or will find some excuse for not being there, their attendance being entirely optional; and, if the reading is after school-hours, they will not remain. The result is that, although, in some instances, I believe, in Canterbury and Otago, Bible-reading classes have been held successfully, still the scheme generally has not been so successful as its promoters desire. What is wanted, then, is that during some part of the ordinary school-hours the children whose parents wish them to attend will be compelled to attend, and will be subject to the discipline of the school. This Bill is to carry out that intention. Then, we have been told by the Minister of Defence that we have assumed too much in supposing there is a very strong feeling throughout the community in favour of Bible-reading in public schools. He said that not 50 per cent. of the parents were in favour of it.

Now, I venture to say the honourable gentleman has not devoted much attention to the study of this subject. We know perfectly well that persons who do not wish to get information on the subject do not go into it very carefully, and are apt to be convinced with very little evidence. But what are the facts? A plébiscite was taken, and practically the whole of Otago was unanimous in its expression of opinion—it was not quite unanimous, because there was a dissenting number, but seventenths of those who voted on the subject were in favour of Bible-reading in schools. Now, we know the floor of this House has been flooded with petitions for it since 1879, and they seem to be on the increase. We have had even this session a very large number of petitions indeed presented to this House.

Mr. KERR.—What are they? Go and look at them. Most of them are written by one man. I speak as a member of the Committee that saw them.

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—The honourable gentleman is talking of that about which he is not informed. Then, we have been told by the member for St. Albans that the subject is out of place here. Why, the honourable gentleman forgets that the reading of the Bible in schools was part of the education scheme in most parts of the colony before the present general system was established in 1877; and we know it was simply by a catch-vote that the Bible was excluded from the schools under the colonial system, and efforts have been made ever since to get the Bible restored to the schools. The honourable gentleman told us that this subject afforded an opportunity of "blowing off steam." I am afraid the honourable gentleman avails himself of many opportunities of "blowing off steam;" and he availed himself of one in speaking upon this Bill. He told us we should go to our constituents and convert them. That is the very thing we are now doing. The object of this debate is to enlighten the people as to the importance of the subject, and to weigh the arguments of those who advocate the Bill; and it also gives an opportunity to those who oppose it to adduce what arguments they have. An important object of the debate is to try to convert the constituents to support this important movement. I was much struck with the argument of the honourable member for Auckland West, who, I know, has very great sympathy with the Bible and its teachings. He stated that the proper place for religious teaching is the Sunday-school and the home. Now, we know very well that a very large number of children do not attend Sunday-school.

Mr. LEVESTAM.—Yes; over 90 per cent. of the children who attend the public schools.

Mr. FULTON.—Only 25 per cent.

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—If you go to the cities you find that the children who attend the Sunday-schools do not represent half of those who could attend.

Mr. LEVESTAM.—110,000 attend the public schools, and 99,884 attend the Sunday-schools.

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—Yes; but they are not the same children. Besides, Sunday-school teaching is only one day a week, and is not all the teaching that is desired by those who advocate Bible-reading in schools. As to religious teaching in the homes, the honourable member for Dunedin East fully demonstrated that that is a failure. We know very well that many parents of children are utterly incompetent to impart religious instruction to them, or have not the time or inclination to teach their children at home the teaching of the Bible. Now, I submit to this House that it would be only a fair measure of justice to those who demand the object of this Bill that it should be granted to them, and that what is asked here should be conceded. The Bill inflicts no injury upon any one. It is entirely optional with the parent whether he will let his child attend the school during the Bible-reading or not, and it is entirely optional with the School Committee whether the Bible-reading shall be allowed at all or not. I should myself prefer to leave the option to the Education Boards; but that was discussed, and this proposal was adopted as the better under the circumstances. We know it is a very lamentable thing indeed to find a boy or girl of fourteen or fifteen, when called as a witness, not able to understand the nature of an oath. I know perfectly well a case of that sort that occurred some years ago, where a youth who ought almost to have been leaving school was put in the witness-box, and was asked whether he understood the nature of an oath, and he said he did not; and, being asked if he knew anything about the Bible, he said he did not. Now, was he qualified to discharge the duties of a citizen? I submit, not. Then, we are told that the reading of the Bible without comment would cause a feeling of revulsion against the Bible. Now, as to that, we have only to look at the facts in older countries than this for the reply. In Scotland the Bible has been taught in the schools for century after century. What is the case there, and in many other countries? Is there any revulsion there?

An Hon. MEMBER.—How is it taught?

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—As it should be taught. I submit to honourable members who have any feeling that injustice would be done by the passing of this Bill that they should dispel that feeling entirely. It can cause no injury to any one, and a very great good can be done in satisfying the demands of a large and influential body of colonists who demand the reform proposed by this Bill. I do not know whether we shall succeed in getting the Bill passed into law this session; but, if not, I think I may venture to predict that this agitation will be kept up, and I have no doubt whatever that ultimately, like many other great objects that have taken time to achieve, success will be attained in this matter. I am convinced that the fullest success will come by-and-by if it is not obtained to-night.

Mr. LEVESTAM.—The honourable gentleman has made it appear that I misrepresented the feeling of the people of Nelson on this subject, because he said they were in favour of Bible-reading in schools. The last election of School Committees in that district was held specially upon this question, and the number of votes given were—For Bible-reading in schools, 1,765; against it, 1,740—a majority of twenty-five for it. But there were thirty-four informal votes, and those who received these informal votes were notoriously against Bible-reading in schools, so that really there was an actual majority of nine against the proposal.

Mr. W. D. Stewart

Mr. WALKER.—I do not like to give a silent vote on this question, because I feel it is a very serious one, and if I thought this Bill would be a solution of what is undeniably a very great difficulty I should support it most cordially. But I cannot see for one moment that it will do so. I cannot be persuaded of that by any arguments I have heard to-night, or by any of the mere assertions that have been given as arguments in support of this Bill. I think the remarks of the last speaker were nothing but assertions. If the honourable member had been doing anything but listening to the clergymen and the dominies who have circulated petitions and otherwise tried to work up an agitation in favour of this proposal during the last few years, he must have seen that the colony is not in earnest in wishing for this proposal to be part of the education system. The honourable gentleman says that by a catch-vote in 1877 the provision excluding the Bible was inserted in the Act. But, even if that were so, the people of the colony have in no way risen against what he maintains to be a glaring case not only of injustice, but almost of national immorality. But I maintain quite the contrary, and I also say I am glad to have an opportunity of replying to an honourable gentleman who comes from Otago, where, most distinctly, this so-called agitation has its home; because I charge that part of the colony, I charge those who bring these petitions to the House, in the first place, with not being sincere in the matter which they profess to have at heart. We all remember the old story of the Quaker who asked the man who said he had sympathy with the widow and orphan, "To what amount do you sympathize?" To the honourable gentleman who brought in this Bill I would say, to what amount do these gentlemen in Otago who profess to have this matter at heart sympathize with it? They have large endowments for Church and educational purposes; and I ask, how much of these endowments have they devoted to the cause of religious instruction? Contrast what they have done with the self-sacrificing course pursued by the Roman Catholics. I say that they show the Presbyterians of Otago and the other denominations who are working in the same direction a most bright and glorious example. I say to the honourable member for Dunedin West and those who are working with him that, until those who support this measure are prepared to put their hands into their pockets and show their sincerity, as the Roman Catholics have done, they will get no justice such as they demand from the colony, nor any sympathy. I have the greatest sympathy with and respect for my fellow-colonists who profess the Roman Catholic religion, and if I could see my way to help them in their present difficulty I should be the first to do it; but I am sorry to say, and I have always said it, that I do not see my way to help them at present, because it would disturb the national system; but I say this: that, if ever this Bible-in-schools proposal is carried, and has any practical effect in the way of altering our educational system, I, for one, will also join with those who seek to give denominational schools their fair share of educational expenditure. You cannot give the Bible-in-schools party what they want unless you also give the Roman Catholics what they desire; and therefore, while it is all very well for the honourable member for the Taieri and for the "true-blues" in Otago to say that they are only asking for what will be for the good of the Presbyterian Church, they are doing what their fathers would have been very sorry to do, they are really doing what will be the downfall of the national system of education.

Mr. GUINNESS.—I do not wish to go over all the arguments that have been used against this measure, because I think that the honourable member for Auckland West stated the arguments most fairly and concisely; but there is one view of the case I do not think has been presented by any honourable member who has spoken to-night. That is this: We know that, in establishing a State system of education, we wish to make it as attractive to all colonists as possible. Now, we know that, although our system has been at work for a long time, there is one section of the community that cannot, owing to conscientious scruples, obtain any advantage from that system. I refer to the Roman Catholics; and, as has been said, they have expended large sums of money and have made large sacrifices in order to satisfy their consciences. I ask honourable gentlemen whether we shall not, if we carry this measure, add another objection to the system, not only on the part of the Catholics, but on the part of some other denominations which do not wish to have the Bible read in schools. We cannot get away from the fact that there are a large number of persons in the colony besides the Roman Catholics; and we know that, if we are to maintain our national system, we must make it as free from objections as we possibly can. The Bill says that the Bible is to be read in school-hours. Now, I ask any honourable member to look back at the time when he was at school and say whether the fact of a boy reading the Bible aloud to a class, or of a teacher reading it aloud in that way, would be likely to confer any benefit upon the children. I fail to see that it would. Can moral or religious principles be implanted in the minds of pupils by reading the Bible aloud in turn, verse by verse, for twenty minutes a day?

An Hon. MEMBER.—Yes.

Mr. GUINNESS.—I maintain, not. I say that the Scriptures should be expounded and taught, as well as read, in order to have any effect; and it is against the whole principle of our education system to do that. But, even if it could be done as part of the national system, under the provisions of this Bill you would not teach all your children religion, because there are a number of denominations which would not allow their children to be taught religion in the schools. That is recognised in the Bill when it is said that a parent may notify to the School Committee that a child is not to attend. Then, I say that you are asking the State to provide money to teach religion to only a certain number of the children of the colony. That is going in the direction of sapping the system that we have at the present time, and which we wish to maintain. Then, if my contention is correct, that the Bible cannot be read merely but must be expounded in order to carry out your wishes, who is to expound it? The teachers of the schools? Then, I ask, would it be right to allow some of the teachers to do that? We have had an instance given to us to-night of a teacher reading the Bible, and then saying, "That would be all very well if it were true." I ask, are such teachers fit persons to impart religious instruction or a knowledge of the Scriptures? I say certainly not. I think the arguments used by the honourable member for Auckland West showed that the only proper method of imparting religious instruction is for the clergymen and the parents to do it; and his testimony on this point is most valuable. There was one argument made use of by the honourable member for Dunedin East. He said that it is not to be expected that we can get parents to teach their children anything from the Bible, because many parents are not able to do so. Well, I answer to that that it does not apply to all persons in the colony. There are many persons who are able to do this, and there may be some who are not able to do it; and it is in respect of those classes where the parents are not able to do it that the duty of the clergyman or minister comes in.

Mr. FULTON.—If the honourable gentleman will promise to stop talking, so as to get on with other business, I will not take two minutes in reply.

Mr. SAMUEL.—What are other honourable members to do?

Mr. GUINNESS.—Sir, I think these interruptions are unseemly. I was very glad indeed to hear the Minister of Education and also another Minister speak out so plainly and decidedly upon this matter, because it is in their charge that the system of education is placed at the present time. It is refreshing to us on this side of the House to know that the Government, and especially the Minister in charge of the administration of this department, hold views on this question that are sound. I say that the arguments of the Minister of Education entirely meet the arguments that have been brought forward in favour of this measure. I think what ought to have been done was to have stopped this debate long ago by simply moving, That this Bill be read this day six months; and I shall move that now.

Mr. FITZHERBERT.—I rise to second that. I did not intend to say anything on the subject to-night, and when I came here I was quite undecided how I should vote. I have listened to all arguments pro and con., and I feel that I am as unprepared to vote now as when I entered the House. For that reason, I feel that the only way to solve the difficulty with regard to matters is to second the motion my honourable friend has just moved. I have, as I have said, listened to all the arguments, and especially to the arguments of those who have advocated this Bill, and I have discovered nothing in their arguments to induce me to vote for it; nor have I heard anything on the other side that would induce me to vote their way.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Why vote at all?

Mr. FITZHERBERT.—My honourable friend says, "Why vote at all?" I have not voted yet. Now, is it the desire of those gentlemen who introduce this Bill and endeavour to carry it through that children should really receive religious training at the State schools, or are they merely carrying out the wishes of their constituents in attempting to get this Bill passed through Parliament? I think it is the latter; because, for myself, I do not see that any real religious instruction would be given to children in the State schools by the reading of the Bible for twenty minutes or half an hour. We all know that children, when they do read the Bible—and some of us, I suppose, have children who read the Bible with us—ask a number of most extraordinary questions about it. We are told that the children in the schools are to receive no instruction with regard to the Bible—that it is not to be explained to them—that they are merely to read it. Now, if that is so, I feel quite sure that, having read it, they would shut up the book with the most foggy notions of what they had read, and that, instead of its doing them good; it might possibly give them food for reflection of a kind which might do them harm. For that reason I think it would be unwise to have Bible-reading in schools, unless what the pupils read is fully explained to them. We have also heard to-night that this Bill would do harm, because it is the thin end of the wedge which is to be used for ultimately obtaining denominational education. Now, if it was really the thin end of the wedge for that object, I myself should at once vote for it, because I think the best thing we can do is to at once adopt denominational education. What do we find? We find that the Roman Catholics here are educating their own children. Last year there were 22,000 Roman Catholic children of school-age; and if the Roman Catholics, as they have a perfect right to do, had taken advantage of our system of education and sent those 22,000 children to the State schools, what would have been the result? Their capitation alone would have amounted to £88,000; and, in addition to that, you would have had to build schools and to provide teachers. I maintain that if the Roman Catholics had sent their children to the State schools, as they had the right to do, the colony would have been put to an extra expense of £100,000 at least—probably it would have been £150,000; and when we are groaning under frightful taxation, and have this great liability for education, I think we should be glad at once to adopt the denominational system of education. But this Bill does not go so far, although it may be the means of bringing about ultimately such a result. Now, I am not going to occupy the time of the House, because I know there are honourable gentlemen who wish to bring other measures on.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Do not be cruel.

Mr. FITZHERBERT.—Sir, I am accused of being cruel. I suppose I have a perfect right to speak. It is not often I speak in this House, and I suppose I have the right to second the motion. I say we require more time to reflect on the subject, and when I say I am not going to keep the House long I am not being cruel, I hope. I will conclude my remarks by seconding the amendment.

Mr. SAMUEL.—I have been in the House on several occasions when this question has been debated, and I have never yet stated my reasons for giving my vote upon it. During the recent elections I found there was very great interest taken in this question, and I was many times asked what were my reasons for the vote I gave on this important subject. I feel, therefore, although the hour is late, that I should allow nothing to prevent me from stating my reasons for voting as I intend to vote. And still less, Sir, should I allow any insinuations of ulterior motives to keep me silent. Because there may be some other Bill on the Order Paper underlying such an important Bill as this, am I therefore to be gagged, and deprived of the right of expressing my sentiments? Sir, I am surprised that any honourable gentleman should have given expression to the insinuations I have heard this evening.

Hon. MEMBERS.—Oh, oh!

Mr. SAMUEL.—Honourable members say, "Oh, oh!" Some honourable members are themselves so insincere that they will never believe in any other man's sincerity. Some honourable members have acquired such notoriety for insincerity that it would be quite foreign to their natures that they should not ridicule the sincerity of any one else. Now, this Bill is a very short one—I venture to say, far too short to deal with such an important subject. It is a Bill which, I venture to say, has been very inadvisedly drafted, and is not at all fitted for the purpose for which it purports to be designed. Its object is said, baldly, to be to allow the Bible to be read in schools, subject to a time-table and conscience-clause. That is what is said of the Bill; but when we look at it what do we find? We find that the time-table is comprised in these few words: "such reading shall not exceed twenty minutes;" and we find that the conscience-clause is comprised in these words: "and no child shall be compelled to attend such reading if the parents or guardians of such child shall, in writing, inform the Committee or teacher that he objects to such attendance." Sir, is that a worthy or full provision to make for a time-table or conscience-clause? It seems to me it certainly is not. What does the "twenty minutes" mean? Does it mean that one particular denomination is to have twenty minutes on Monday, another twenty minutes on Tuesday, and so on? If that is what it means, then why does it not say so, or why is not the thing properly defined and set out? It may be said that we can arrange it in Committee: but surely we should have something more than this bald outline; it should not be left to us to frame a new measure in Committee. Honourable members who introduce measures should bring down complete Bills, and not mere sketches or outlines for us to fill up in Committee. Then, Sir, "no child shall be compelled to attend such reading if the parent or guardian of such child shall, in writing, inform the Committee or the teacher that he objects to such attendance." Let us look how this would work. We all know that there are children in the colony who are not sent to school as they ought to be; that the compulsory clauses of the Education Act have to be from time to time enforced; that parents are brought before the Magistrates for evading the provisions of the Act: and we cannot but recognise that by a great many people in the colony the benefits of our education system are not taken proper advantage of. Would not those people be only too glad to keep their children from school for twenty minutes in the morning, and would not they take advantage of this provision to keep their children from school? I say that thousands of people in New Zealand, caring little or nothing for the education of their children, as we see is the case at the present day, and caring still less for the religious education of their children, would make this a mode of altering the school-hours. This cannot be denied. I think the honourable member for Dunedin East told us that a mother might care nothing about the education of her children in religious matters—that she might be addicted to intemperance, and therefore would not care about the educating of her child. Would such a woman as that send a child to school twenty minutes earlier than there was any necessity to do? Not a bit of it. They would not send their children at all until twenty minutes after the school opened; and so this provision for religious training would be quite ineffectual. Then, what would be the deciding body? Not the Education Board, but the School Committee. We find that School Committees are to be the persons to impose this Bible-reading on the schools or not. We shift off the responsibility from this House and put it on School Committees. We say to them, "There, we give you the power; you can take twenty minutes, and regulate it as you like. You can let that reading take place in the presence of any minister you like, and there shall be no supervision over you." What would be the effect of that? At the elections for these Committees we should have all sorts of methods used to get particular members elected; and we should find School Committees working together to make such regulations as would fit their own religious prejudices. It would be an engine, too, of religious intolerance. There is a very large body of colonists who are paying for education, while they are getting no benefit from it. We have no right to gloat over their miseries by imposing this slight upon them. It does not follow that, because we are strong, we should insult the weak. Our excuse for making them pay for these schools is that they may send their children there. But we must take care there is nothing taught that they can object to. Yet the promoters of this Bill are asking us to sanction something that they can with good reason object to. I do trust the Bill will not be carried, and I hope that such an injustice will not be done to so large a body of people as to not only tax them for what they do not use, but to give them an absolutely good and sufficient reason for not taking advantage of the free education afforded in this colony.

Sir G. GREY.—Sir, what a solemn farce we have seen acted to-night! Was ever a great Legislature so disgraced—the teaching of the Bible made the means of robbing wretched people of benefits which were about to be conferred upon them! What shame must the members of this House themselves feel, to think that a religious question of this kind should have been used by lawyers for purposes such as this—to disgrace the Bar of this country! Will they dare to take their seats upon the bench as Judges, after having used the power conferred upon them by the people for such a purpose as this? Let their names be recorded, let the facts be recollected, let the people of New Zealand remember that the name of religion has been used for such a purpose as this. Why, there was a Bill here immediately to follow this debate which was to give to a suffering people a freehold of their lands, to relieve them from the oppressive burdens of continued residence upon one spot that have been laid upon them. And now, for another session, these benefits must be delayed; and those who have done this deed would aspire to wear the ermine hereafter, which they have disgraced as members of the Bar this night. What have these people done that they should be deprived of these benefits to gratify the desire of monopoly of the men who already possess too great a monopoly? Why are they to shut out their fellow-countrymen from pleading for the oppressed, from striving to relieve them from the servitude they are under of being compelled to employ those gentlemen who have treated them thus to-night? Are they to raise fees from the pockets of their countrymen—

Mr. SAMUEL.—I rise to a point of order. Is the honourable gentleman to be allowed to debate another Bill on the Order Paper, to allow him an opportunity of commenting unduly on members of this House?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The rule is to confine the debate to the order under consideration; but I think the honourable gentleman is merely commenting on the length of the speeches, and he has a right to speak on that subject, but he will not be at liberty to enter on a discussion upon other orders of the day.

Sir G. GREY.—I am glad the honourable gentleman's conscience is touched at last. I say, Sir, that I am fairly entitled to comment on the conduct of those who have this night, as I say, robbed their fellow-countrymen, by their lengthened speeches, and by a plot that is not upon the Order Paper—by a plot laid in the lobbies of this House—by which they were to defeat the chances these poor people had of gaining benefits such as I speak of. And, then, when I mention these benefits, that a question of order should be raised in order that, by my being prevented from speaking, those who have been robbed of their rights should be left in ignorance of the rights that have been taken from them in this House! I say it is all wrong that, in the name of religion, these things should be done,—that one of the greatest debates that could have taken place should have been prostituted for such a purpose. It is to me inconceivable; but let them walk forth to-morrow before their countrymen branded with the recollection of what they have said to-night, boasting of their sincerity at the very time their actions and words were insincere, and they knew it; standing up under a false mask as sincere and good men, while at the same time by their words and actions they give most abundant evidence of their insincerity. I trembled when I heard some of the words that fell from some honourable members' lips. I heard one honourable gentleman state that the object of reading the Bible in schools was to impart those great truths it contains to the scholars, and he spoke these words as if he was speaking with no other object than the teaching of those truths; and yet those words were but the cover of a plot, by extending this debate until half-past twelve to-night, after which hour no new business can be brought on, to rob the people of rights to which they were entitled. When I think how the poor have been treated in this country, when I think of how long they have suffered, and the state they are reduced to, and how, when relief was so near them, when, apparently, the healing-cup was at their lips, it has been dashed down for so contemptible a purpose as the gratification of the greed for gain of some people—

Mr. SAMUEL.—Sir, I rise to a point of order. Is the honourable gentleman justified in accusing members of this House of being actuated in their action in this House by their greed for gain?

Mr. SPEAKER.—I think that is an improper motive to impute to members of this House.

Sir G. GREY.—Sir, I should be sorry if I have said anything improper; but I feel for the sufferings which others have to undergo in various ways. I can fancy plots being made to ruin the poor in many ways. They have suffered so that I hardly know how to speak. I fear every word I say may trespass upon some rule of the House. But, I ask, are ordinary rules easily applicable to such a great occasion as this, when so great a wrong has been done under the deceiving cloak of virtue? I believe if I moved the adjournment of the House it would give me a larger field to speak. The object I have before me is really this: Very great wrongs have been suffered by the people of New Zealand, and I believe that the very honourable gentlemen whose speeches I am finding fault with this night have been the main movers in many of those wrongs. I believe that the present depression in the colony is due to those causes. I would fain now, while the sense of all those things is fully upon me, give expression to some of the views I feel on these points. I could fancy, for instance, a people coming into this colony, as yet almost unoccupied, and then such a state of things prevailing as a friend of mine, a noble lord, states, after his visit to this country, that he found to prevail. He was a visitor on a great run, and is entertained by the squatter. He hears how the people of this country are treated; and what does he say? The run consisted of about fifty thousand acres. Nominally, any one might go in and buy any of that land over the squatter's head. We shall be told that there was a free choice open to the people; that they might purchase anything they liked; that that country was open to them. Why did they not purchase it? Ah! what are the words? "Nominally" they had that power. And then it would be boasted by members in this House how difficult it was to get people to go upon the land. "Have they not all the right to go in and select any unpurchased land they like?" And every one who spoke these words knew there was no such right; that it was a nominal thing, a deception practised upon the settlers and those who are poor and ignorant, just such a deception as has been designed to-night, when they read in Hansard how these noble and righteous men struggled for Bible-reading in schools and made long speeches upon the subject, while the purport was different: it was to prevent other measures from being brought forward: it was to ruin the poor. Well, what took place in these runs? Let me follow the parallel out. It was thus that Lord Lyttelton wrote:—

"The run was about 50,000 acres. Nominally any one might come in and buy any of this land over the squatter's head; but, besides that in these remote places it would not be worth buying, the early squatters had what is called a pre-emptive right to buy at the fixed price of £3 an acre such parts of the land as they had made certain improvements upon. They used to 'spot,' as it was called, these improvements in different parts of the run, the effect being that the intermediate parts were valueless without them, and these they thus secured."

Suppose these same gentlemen, some of those who this very night have been very prominent in what has been done—suppose that they form this plan. Here for twenty-eight years have these great runs been shut up against men in New Zealand by those persons who have gone in and occupied these vast tracts of country, secured by these unfair means. And during these twenty-eight years they have reaped large profits, and have shut everybody out from these large tracts of land. And they make the country full of poor. They have impoverished many; they have prevented numbers from growing rich, and have driven others from the country. Supposing that was the case, as it really was, and that then the thought occurred, "Let us get a great railway made. Let us do that. Let us promise the poor abundant employment on the railway—those who are impoverished by our having grasped the land. Let us tell them that these works shall be found for them. Let us enter into a treaty with a foreign company, nominally, but many of ourselves taking part in it; and let us pass a law which will enable us to enter into a contract by which these runs shall pass to that company, and then those who occupied them for years, in great part wrongfully, shall enter into those vast freeholds and impoverish the country for all time, and use this House as an instrument to obtain it"—use myself as one of the instruments to obtain those things, as one ignorant of what was being done, the people thus being deprived of their inheritance. That would be a fit object of the debate, this night to be accomplished; and, in fact, it has been accomplished. What have they done? From the people and their children all this have they this night taken. And now, when some small relief could have been afforded to them this night, it seems hard that some few members should use their power in the manner they have used it, and dare to send men working upon their land, and, for one job, which job would make it five times the value it is now to those who take it over, to lose it for all time, to become the serfs of people who live in the Mother-country. Oh, I think that these things ought not to be done, and that to-night we should not, under cover of a religious debate, which every one knew was fictitious, have done such wrongs to our fellow-men. I heard some of those honourable gentlemen professing their sincerity, declaring they were sincere, in solemn language, in the face of this House; and I ask the House whether they were sincere or not.

An Hon. MEMBER.—There is no sincerity among us.

Sir G. GREY.—Well, so be it. I say that for years great wrong has been plotted against the people; for years a great wrong has been plotted which was to deprive them of vast tracts of country; and that wrong has now been accomplished: but no blessing will fall on those who have achieved it. At last some man will rise in the country who can rally round him the people, who will insist that after the debate of this night such things shall not be repeated. When I think hopes had been formed that such things would not occur this session; and yet that such a great wrong should have been done to the population, and that to-night that wrong should have been increased by the slight remedy that was to be applied to it having been by such means defeated, I am grieved. It is sad to reflect upon. I do not wonder honourable members hide themselves behind the curtains, and try to keep out of sight. Well they may. But we, for a time, must submit to a triumph which has been achieved. The lawyers have gained by the means I speak of, apparently—they have succeeded in wresting their lands from the lawful owners. Wretched children may run about half-fed and naked, who are the real proprietors of the soil. And a time will come, I believe, when some support will be given, some aid afforded, some reparation sought for and obtained for these great wrongs. And possibly yet, coming back to the question of throwing open the legal profession, we may see this measure carried; see it the law of the land; see men fairly walking into their inheritance, all being able to plead in our Courts; and we shall see those who aided in what has been done to-night to defeat that measure dwarf into their just proportions. I know they will sorrow in their hearts for what they have done. I know they will feel that a wrong has been truly done. I cannot forget one gentleman. This is not the first time he has robbed his fellow-countrymen by an action of this kind: it is a repetition of the same sort of thing. But I believe yet this Parliament will say they will not see me wronged as I have been wronged this night; that justice shall be done, that these measures shall all be brought forward, and that such a plot, so treacherous in its conception and so cunningly carried out, will not attain the end which its authors hoped to attain from it. I feel sure that the public at large will contend that justice shall in this respect be done. I believe they will direct their attention to the great events I speak of: and this Parliament will see that it will not be used for such purposes,—that honourable gentlemen shall again be allowed to bring forward Bills which have been defeated in such a manner. Let these Bills be discussed openly and fairly, and be defeated by fair means. But, no; if they thought they could be defeated by fair means they would not have ventured to follow the course they have adopted this evening. I ask for justice, not for myself, but for the people of New Zealand—those who have been robbed for years, the oppressed of New Zealand, the men who are now out of work, with starving families, and for whose protection and sustenance no sufficient provision has yet been made. I feel sure that I may rely upon justice for them, and justice in regard to the measures which to-night have been disposed of in the manner I speak of; and on a future occasion I shall strive to attain that end and to have justice done myself and those whom I represent. The rules of the House will not allow me to use the terms I should like to use in regard to the unfair position we occupy; but I feel that justice will be done to us, and that at last we shall attain those rights which we are entitled to.

Dr. FITCHETT.—I cannot allow the remarks made by the last speaker to pass unchallenged. He has imputed to the lawyers in this House that, by a cunningly-devised plot, they have robbed the people of certain rights and lands. I regret that the honourable gentleman has left the House; but, as I am vindicating the lawyers, not attacking him, I will proceed. This debate came on at half-past seven o'clock this evening. I was the first lawyer to speak, and I did not rise till about a quarter to twelve: even then, I was provoked into speech by the attack of the honourable member for St. Albans. I say that the honourable gentleman is not warranted in imputing to us a plot to kill his Bill, and the House ought to resent such an imputation. It means, if true, that we made tools of every member who has spoken; and that is not a compliment to members who constitute the House. It may be matter of regret that the Standing Orders prevent the Law Practitioners Bill from coming on. Personally, I am glad of it, for I am opposed to that measure. I emphatically deny, however, that the lawyers have talked it out. The great bulk of the speaking has been done by others. No lawyer has spoken for as much as ten minutes. There is therefore absolutely no ground for the very grave reflection the honourable gentleman has cast on the members of the legal profession in this House.

Mr. FULTON.—I will only occupy the time of the House a few minutes. I have taken a number of notes of objections raised by various honourable members to this Bill, but I shall not be able to deal with them all. When we come to practical experience in this matter we find that the difficulties which have been raised disappear. We find that religious teaching in schools can take place without any serious difficulties being met with at all. The honourable gentleman who last spoke and the honourable member for Ashburton have both virtually accused us of being insincere. With regard to the honourable member for Dunedin Central, I think that those who heard his speech will recognise that it was rather the clever speech of an advocate addressing a jury or pleading a cause and trying to find holes in a case—it was rather like pleading in Chambers than the speech of a person who was dealing with a matter of this sort. The Hon. the Minister of Education said that we should make use of the school out of school-hours. Something kindred to that has been stated by other honourable gentlemen, who said that it was only necessary to have teaching for two hours in the morning and for two hours in the afternoon, and that surely there was plenty of unappropriated time in which religious teaching might be given by those who were deeply interested in it. Does the honourable gentleman not know that the school-hours are all occupied far beyond two hours in the morning and two hours in the afternoon? In my own particular district the children are kept in beyond the ordinary school-hours, and the parents are complaining that the children are pressed so hard that they cannot find time to do their lessons. There is one point that has not been noticed, and it is perhaps the strongest of the arguments against the Bill, and that is the overpressure of the syllabus. That is really the greatest difficulty which at present exists. I have spoken to teachers without number upon this matter, and they have said, "Where is the time? We are favourable to the measure, but how can we find the time to give for this purpose? We are obliged to go on pressing the children. If we do not, the status of the school goes down, our own proficiency is called in question, and we at once fall in the estimation of the school authorities." I say we are cramming the intellect while we are neglecting to train the moral nature of the young; and we are neglecting it because we are taking up the time which might be useful for that purpose. If it is—and I believe it to be to a very large extent—the voice of the mothers of the colony which has been given in this case, I say we are dealing with those who have the interests of the children at heart more than the fathers, and who are better able to judge as to what the requirements of these children are, and as to what training they ought to have, than even any others could do. An honourable gentleman asks, "What is the duty of the State?" We want, at any rate, this: We want a recognition of this book as the foundation of morality; and that it shall not be driven out of our schools, and treated as a thing worthy of indignity, and to be expunged from the category of books admissible there. Accusations were made by some honourable gentlemen as to the character of our teachers. I say a gross injustice has been done to them in saying that even a large number of them are unfit to teach religion, or to preside while the Bible is being read. The honourable member for Nelson spoke of the petitions brought up here, and he questioned their genuineness, because he said that many of the signatures were in the same handwriting. I asked him whether he referred to petitions from Nelson, and I am not at liberty to say what answer he gave me in private. I say now that, if he did refer to petitions from Nelson, those who got those petitions up took care to forward me certificates to this effect—I can show them to the honourable gentleman if he wishes it: that nearly every signature was the genuine signature of the person professing to sign it; and, where it was not signed by the person himself, authority was given to the person going round about for the signatures. What shall we say when an honourable gentleman casts such a slur upon the petitions presented to this House? The honourable gentleman also spoke with regard to the endowments. Is he aware that, as far as Otago and Canterbury are concerned, those endowments were really purchased by the people who first colonised those parts? He is not perhaps so well versed in the early history of the colony as I am—he has not been so long here—but I may tell him this: In point of fact, those endowments were purchased by the early colonists, inasmuch as they paid a larger sum for their lands just for the purpose that a certain portion of them might be devoted to religious and even to denominational education. It is not necessary for me to say how the persons intrusted with the care of these endowments performed their duties. That property was intrusted to their care, and it is for them and not for me to answer. The honourable member for St. Albans seemed to infer, from the statement he made, that we had no right to bring this matter to this House until, in fact, we had a majority. How many matters of vital moment—one was referred to by the honourable member who has just spoken so eloquently, the abolition of slavery—how many matters of this sort, when they were first advocated in the Parliament at Home, received scant support! but, because they were true and just, those causes grew upon the people, the people became educated, and, last of all, the members were able to carry them. And shall it be said that we should stand still until we get a majority in this House before we discuss this matter? "We should seek," an honourable gentleman said, "to educate our constituents." I know that our constituents have been educating a great many of our representatives. I think we shall find, in the division that takes place, that a far larger number of honourable gentlemen will go into the "Ayes" lobby with me than on any previous occasion. The honourable member for Thorndon stated that many people said that much of the larrikinism and crime was due to the want of Bible-teaching in schools. He and other honourable gentlemen were but setting up men of straw for the purpose of knocking them down. I am not aware that any advocates of the present measure have said so. But the late Premier of the colony said in a speech that "morality must be taught, to cure larrikinism." I feel that there are many other matters which I might well refer to—I have not exhausted even the notes I made—but I do not wish to weary the patience of the House, and I ask them to come to a decision upon this question. There is one other point I wish to refer to. It is said that this is the thin end of the wedge to introduce denominationalism. Let me repeat now what I said at the beginning, that I have never been an advocate of denominational education. I have had promises in this House of support for this measure if I would advocate denominational Bills which are to come before us, and I declined to do so. We ask simply this: that it shall be left to the people themselves to say what they want. We ask that it be left to the various local bodies and School Committees. They surely can deal with this matter. We many of us know cases where the people are almost unanimous: where, I believe, it would be possible to have a Catholic teacher teaching Catholic views, because, practically, there would be no dissent at all. We know other places where nearly the whole of the settlers belong to some other denomination, and where the views of that denomination might be taught. But, quite apart from religious views, are we to say that, where a Committee are so united and where the people are so united that there would not be a dissentient voice, we shall refuse to allow them that which they sincerely and honestly believe will be a boon which they have a right to claim from this House? Again, with regard to denominationalism, I have only to add that those who are refusing this measure are themselves paving the way for the introduction of denominationalism. If they would have our present system of education maintained, I say to them, Do not consider it a law of the Medes and Persians, which may never be altered. It will have to be altered. A very large number of the people are determined that it shall be altered, and the longer that is refused the stronger will the feeling of the people grow.

Mr. SEDDON.—I think the legislation on this subject should be definite. If it is necessary for the well-being of the youths attending our State schools that the Bible should be read, then, I say, the Legislature should at once enact that the Book of Holy Writ should be read at given times. By leaving it optional with School Committees we are simply throwing down a bone of contention, and the School Committee elections will become a strife for supremacy, which will cause ill-feeling among the various religious sects and be very injurious to our educational system. I must say that the views I have held on this question have been somewhat shaken during the last few years; so much shaken that on this occasion I shall not feel myself justified in voting against this Bill. If it goes into Committee I shall endeavour to have it so amended that this House shall speak out plainly either in one direction or the other, and not leave the matter optional. Another reason why I rose to speak was to say that there is some justification for the strong feeling exhibited by the honourable member for Auckland Central. Considering the importance of the Bills which he has on the Order Paper for this evening, and that this Bill has never before, to my knowledge, taken half the time it has to-night in discussion, I think there was every justification for the honourable gentleman speaking as strongly as he did. I do not know that we have ever had an occasion on which two Ministers have spoken at such length and, I may say, in so provocative a tone. I do not know that we have ever had, from the Government side of the House, fourteen members following Ministers speaking upon this measure. These matters require explanation; and if the explanation is that which has been expressed by the honourable member for Auckland Central—namely, that the intention was to prevent the Freehold Tenure Acquisition Bill and the Law Practitioners Bill from being discussed—it is easy to see why the discussion has lasted so long. I am positive that these measures are of far greater importance to New Zealand than the Bill we have had under discussion to-night. There has been a desire on the part of the Legislature to give large tracts of country away to a syndicate for railway purposes, and for harbours; and the result will be that, ultimately, when that land is required there will be no provision whereby the people can demand as a right to have the occupation of it. Seeing that the feeling is growing in the House to construct public works by means of land-grants, there is all the more reason for the introduction of a measure to maintain the rights of the people; and, as the honourable member for Auckland Central has been struggling hard for years to maintain those rights, and has, by the long discussion on this Bill, been prevented bringing forward his measures to-night, there is full excuse for the feeling and earnestness he displayed. As regards the minor question which the honourable gentleman supposes the legal gentlemen of the House have been blocking, I scarcely think the honourable gentleman was justified in referring to it in the manner in which he did, because in looking over the names of those who have taken part in the debate I find that those who belong to the legal profession are in a minority. However, this matter has been discussed, and no doubt the result of the discussion will be good. It is not the first occasion on which a minority, if it take time, will become a majority. I shall not feel myself justified in voting against the Bill.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

GOVERNMENT BUSINESS.

Major ATKINSON.—In moving this motion I should like to ask the House for permission to insert the word "Thursday" as well as "Wednesday." I should have been glad not to propose to add Thursday, but the occurrences of the past few sittings on which private members' business was down for consideration have shown that there are a number of members who have determined that opportunity shall not be given for the consideration of certain Bills which I should have been glad to see discussed, and which I have used my personal influence to get discussed, but without effect. I confess that I think our Standing Orders are defective in this matter, for, clearly, private members have a right to expect that the House shall have an opportunity of expressing an opinion upon any measures which they may bring forward, and the House ought to have that opportunity, even though a few honourable members may not desire those particular measures to pass. I have some hope that the Standing Orders of the House of Commons, which, I think, are applicable to this Assembly, do provide for this; but the Speaker prefers to take time to consider the matter. All I can say now is that, if the House agrees to this motion, I will endeavour, if possible, to secure that the House shall have an opportunity of discussing these measures. But it is of no use devoting a day to these Bills if time is to be wasted as hitherto. I hope the House will agree to the motion, and will consent to the amendment I have asked to make. If leave is refused, I shall get some one to move an amendment.

Leave to amend refused.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That Government business take precedence on Wednesdays for the remainder of the session."—(Major Atkinson.)

Sir G. GREY.—It would be, I think, satisfactory to the House if we had a rather clearer explanation from the Premier upon this subject. I understand him to say that he will endeavour to give to the House an opportunity of discussing these measures and expressing an opinion upon them.

Mr. LEVESTAM.—Those that he thinks desirable, only.

Sir G. GREY.—"Those that he thinks desirable." But I mean that even then he does not promise that there will be a chance given of getting them passed this session. If it is to be only a discussion,—and I have no doubt the Premier means that,—I do not think it would be satisfactory really to anybody, and I think it would simply increase the mortification of those whose measures have been rejected, and perhaps further disappoint the country. Then, I understand one honourable gentleman raises this question: that the Hon. the Premier only proposes to agree to this with reference to those Bills which he thinks it desirable to bring forward. I think, if he will mention the Bills he will allow to come up, and that he will allow them to come up in time to pass this session, we shall be much better able to express our opinion. Perhaps the honourable gentleman will be good enough to give us that information.

Major ATKINSON.—I have not made the motion that the honourable gentleman seems to understand. I have only moved that Wednesday be given up. There is no doubt an amendment will be moved to that effect. But it is impossible for me to say that any of these private Bills will be passed this session. I have given, as the House knows, every opportunity for this business, and we have had wasted no less than three private members' days already. Nothing has been done; and that, I think, will occur again unless we come to some arrangement. I shall be very glad this week to give a day, if possible; but, looking at the time at the disposal of the House, the large number of Bills on the Order Paper, and the present feeling of the House, I am afraid there is very little hope of many of them passing. I should be glad to see some of them passed; but I could not give any pledge as to their passing, though I would gladly try to get a day this week for their consideration. I think it is useless bringing them on unless we can come to some arrangement.

Mr. FISH.—If the honourable gentleman intends seriously to give a day this week to private members' Bill, what necessity is there to take away Thursday? Why should he take that day away, if he is prepared to give Friday? I said "No" not so much against the extra day being taken, but because I thought notice ought to be given of such a proposal, so that members might consider its effect. I agree with the honourable member for Auckland Central that the Hon. the Premier ought to be a little more definite as to what his intentions are with regard to these Bills.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON.—I beg to move, That the words "and Thursdays" be included in the motion.

Mr. LEVESTAM.—I should like the Premier to explain what he means when he says the Government would give a chance to the House to consider such Bills as he thinks desirable. There are a number of honourable gentlemen who have Bills on the Order Paper, and I do not think they would like very much that their Bills should be set aside for certain Bills the Government consider desirable. I think the Bills the Government consider desirable should come up from them as Government measures. I have a Bill on the Order Paper, and the Government may consider it a Bill that it is not desirable should be considered by the House; and I should like a little further explanation.

Mr. SAMUEL.—I am surprised that an old tactician like the Premier should make such a suggestion as the one he has just now made. Is he going to take upon himself the invidious task of selecting a few Bills from the many Bills brought forward by private members, and saying that these Bills shall be given prominence to, and that they shall be put in such a position as that they shall have a chance of passing, while other Bills shall have no chance at all? It seems to me, Sir, that the Premier is likely to acquire very little popularity by such a proposal as that. Several members have brought in Bills, and have set down the Bills for second reading on such days as they may have selected; and they have to take their chance, and if that chance is taken away, and prominence given to other private Bills, it will be wrong and unjust. I think it would be most arbitrary and tyrannical, and I trust the Premier will not attempt to take such a course. A good many private members have introduced Bills, and each one thinks that his Bill is of great importance. If the Government are going to select any of these, let them take them up and carry them on as Government measures, but not select them as private members' Bills, and give them undue prominence for the sake of currying favour with those members who have introduced them. I do trust that the Government will deal fairly with private members.

Mr. GUINNESS.—I shall certainly support the amendment moved by the Hon. the Minister of Lands, because I take it that, while our Standing Orders remain as they are, it is useless for us to waste any more time debating these private members' Bills. The session must be brought to a close before the end of the year, at any rate; and I hope this is an indication on the part of the Government that it is the desire of the Government to finish the session before Christmas, for I shall do all in my power to assist them to do that. I say that, so long as our Standing Orders remain as they are at present, and enable members to talk out private members' Bills which they deem objectionable, we shall never get on with the business, and there is no chance of the Bills passing unless an alteration is made in the Standing Orders. For these reasons, I think the Government are acting wisely.

Major STEWARD.—I think it is a matter of special hardship that the honourable gentleman should not have given the House notice of his intention to ask for Thursday next. The notice on the Order Paper is not an unusual one at this period of the session; but the Government not only ask for Wednesdays, but desire Thursdays also, and I submit that that should have appeared on the Order Paper. I say so for one reason especially. The honourable member for Manawatu has a Bill which stands first on the Order Paper for Thursday evening, which must necessarily have come on, and could not by any possibility have been talked out, and which not only his district, but the district I have the honour to represent, and also the district of the honourable member for Ashburton, have the strongest possible interest in.

Mr. Samuel

The matter is one of remedying the very great injustice which we have been subjected to under the operation of the Hospitals and Charitable Institutions Act—an injustice, I say, because in the case of Waimate the county pays £600 a year more than it ought to be called upon to pay, and it was expected that the matter would be remedied this session in some manner. The Bill has passed its second reading, and would necessarily have come up for committal as the first order for Thursday evening. There have been petitions presented on both sides respecting it, and I believe it would pass through Committee in some form that would give relief. Had it been a local Bill it could not by any possibility have been shut out, but, because our remedy is necessarily by way of amending a public Act, we are obliged to proceed by a public Bill. I do therefore think that it is very hard lines that notice should not have been given, and that we should be thus shut out from our remedy. I would put it to the honourable gentleman opposite that, if he carries the motion with regard to taking Thursday, he should, at all events, seeing the importance of this Bill, and that it would necessarily have come on on Thursday evening, give us an opportunity of bringing the Bill on.

Mr. W. P. REEVES.—Before going to a vote on the amendment of the Minister of Lands I should like to ask the Premier a question. There is a special class of private Bills in which certain honourable gentlemen take a particular interest, and of those honourable gentlemen I am one. I understand from the Premier that he will probably allow a sort of expurgated list of private Bills to come on some day—a day he may fix. If the honourable gentleman will tell us that the Harbour Board Bills will not be included in the expurgated list—and amongst them I include the Opunake Harbour Bill—I shall be most happy to support the amendment of the Minister of Lands; and I think there are several other young and honourable members who will do the same thing.

Mr. HAMLIN.—I should certainly like to ask the Premier and the Minister of Lands their intention with reference to certain Bills on the Order Paper for Thursday. Is it their intention, immediately after the questions are asked, to call on the Government orders of the day; or is it their intention to allow certain local Bills down for that day to be considered? It would depend entirely upon the answer to that question as to how I should vote with reference to taking Thursday.

Mr. FELDWICK.—Sir, I am in the same position as the last speaker. One of my Bills is in the position of having been interrupted in its second reading, and I should like to know clearly from the Premier if he will allow my Bill an opportunity of coming on on Thursday, or, otherwise, if he will give us another and better opportunity than Thursday afternoon affords, this session. There is no doubt these local Bills stand in a very unfortunate position. Certain members of this House seem to think that the principal talent for a new member is that of stone-walling. The result has been that for the last two or three Thursdays Bills have been talked out. I do not think my Bill was intentionally talked out: I believe the Bill they wished talked out was about two Bills below mine. I appeal to members of this House to consider Harbour Bills and other Bills upon their merits. There may be good Harbour Bills as well as bad ones; and there is no doubt that many of these local Bills very seriously affect localities, and they are of far more importance than some of the private members' public Bills. The Premier knowing to what an extent local interests are affected by many of these Bills, I hope the honourable gentleman will give us an assurance that we shall have a fair opportunity of considering some of those Bills this session.

Mr. MILLS.—If there is one consideration more than another that would induce me to support the amendment it is the prospect of seeing no more of the Bills of the class to which the last speaker alluded. I sincerely hope that the Government will take away the private members' days, and so enable the House to get on with the business of the country. We have been told by the leader of the Opposition that he will not allow business to be hurried, and that we must sit on here until the business of the country is concluded, and that those of us who are anxious to get home did not give our constituents to understand, when seeking their support, that we should only be able to give two months to the business of the country. I make bold to say that, if members could appeal to the country now, they would find that there is but one feeling throughout the country, and that is a feeling of abhorrence at the great waste of time that has gone on, and the country would applaud the efforts of any honourable member who endeavoured to get the business of the country pushed through. It must be borne in mind that a good many of us have been devoting ourselves now practically for seven months to the business of the country; and really, I think, the only practical issue of our efforts for that time has been the carrying-through of the measure in connection with the Midland Railway the other day. That, Sir, is probably one of the most important pieces of legislation that have ever been carried through this House—important both on account of its own magnitude and of the effect it will have on the future of the country in the creation of a very large institution, to be followed, probably, by similar institutions in connection with the Otago Central and the North Island Trunk Railway; and yet it was carried through in one day. This House, by approving of that scheme, has initiated a new factor altogether in the management of the country's affairs. We did all that in one day, and that is the only piece of important business that we have done during the seven months since the beginning of last session. I hope the Government will carry this amendment.

Dr. FITCHETT.—I trust the Premier will reconsider his decision as to this proposed system of expurgated Order Papers. Some objections have already been raised to it, but the most serious of all has not yet been mentioned. To my mind it is a dangerous innovation, and will give to the Government an enormous power of patronage and favouritism. If this power of selection is exercised by the Government, then when such-and-such a private Bill appears at the top of the Order Paper the presumption will arise that the member so favoured has given the Government a consideration for the favour. Looking at it from that point of view, my opinion is that the innovation will not work for political righteousness.

Mr. HOBBS.—I am one of those who feel that they ought to have some consideration given them, and I rise to protest against the sweeping charge of the Premier that the House has been wasting time. If he had said some members, and gone a little further and said a certain party had wasted time, and gone a little further still and named certain honourable members as having wasted time, I should not have risen now to protest against the sweeping nature of the charge. I have sat patiently day after day and month after month, and now business is to go by the board, and my Bill, which is a very important one, is to have the same chance as the rest.

Mr. TAIWHANGA.—I think honourable members have to blame themselves for wasting time. If honourable members had followed my example and not made such long speeches there would have been plenty of time to get through the business. I shall not blame the Government if all these Bills have now to be slaughtered.

Mr. WALKER.—I should like to ask the Colonial Secretary, with reference to the Bill of the honourable member for Manawatu, whether the Government have considered the measure, and are now prepared to make certain amendments which the Colonial Secretary stated would meet the difficulty which he referred to when the Bill was last before the House. If the Government are able to assure us that they will take charge of the Bill, my honourable friends and myself will be perfectly satisfied. The measure is as important, perhaps, as many which the Government bring down; and I trust, therefore, that they will be prepared to state whether they will take that Bill up and treat it as a Bill of public importance.

Mr. TAYLOR.—I trust the Government will not deal specially with the Bill which has just been referred to. I hope the Government will stick to their colours and do what is right—take up all or none, and make no invidious distinctions.

Mr. HISLOP.—With reference to the Bill alluded to by the honourable member for Ashburton, I may state that the Government has not had sufficient time to consider fully the question which is dealt with by that Bill, but I have had sufficient information placed before me to convince me that it is impossible to deal with the Bill this session to the satisfaction of the honourable gentleman. With reference to the question generally, the Premier stated last week that probably he would ask for Thursday as well as Wednesday, and therefore it can hardly be said that the House is taken by surprise. As to private Bills, what the Premier stated was this: that, if the House showed an inclination to have any particular Bill brought forward which the Government considered of pressing importance, he would endeavour to give consideration to that Bill, but that it was better to devote the time at their disposal to the consideration of those measures which it is necessary to pass, instead of their passage being risked by discussions on Bills which could not possibly be got through this session.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES.—I am sorry at the attempt which is now being made to hurry through the business in the manner proposed. We are here to put the country in a proper state, and we ought to do so even if we have to come back here after Christmas. I have no Bill myself that I am particularly anxious about, but I am speaking in the interests of the majority of honourable members who have got Bills on the Order Paper, and who wish to see them carried through. It is all very well for the honourable member for Sydenham to say, "Put everything by the board." I do not believe in that for a moment.

Mr. TAYLOR.—What I said was, "None or all, not making invidious distinctions."

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES.—Then I misunderstood the honourable gentleman. I quite agree with the honourable member for Greymouth that the state of our Standing Orders prevents honourable members from getting their Bills brought on, and I think if fresh business were allowed to be brought forward after half-past twelve you would find that no Bills would be blocked, but that the business would go on just the same as ordinarily. I do not think that the Government is acting judiciously in forcing this proposal on private members. The honourable member for Port Chalmers complained of the waste of time there has been in the House. No doubt there has been a waste of time, but I do not think it is attributable to this side of the House; I am quite clear of that. I believe that if the Government had treated the House as it ought to have done the business would have gone on more satisfactorily. I protest against the proposal of the Government, and shall therefore vote against it.

Mr. FITZHERBERT.—I shall probably vote for the amendment, if the Premier will make a promise. The Premier mentioned that if we gave him our private day he would see that we got another private day for business, and that he would regulate the Order Paper. That is what I object to—the Government regulating the Order Paper. Honourable members have set down their Bills for certain days when it seemed to them they would have the best chance of coming on; and we should interfere with their privileges altogether if we put the discretion in the Premier's hands. I will support the amendment if the Premier assures us that, if we give up private members' days, he will allow private members' business to come on, when it does come on, in proper order.

Mr. TURNBULL.—I am afraid if the Premier makes a promise the House will prevent its having effect, because, if there are measures to come on objectionable to some honourable members, they will, as before, talk them out, and if the rule rendering that possible is suspended it will mean such long sittings that the man with the strongest constitution will stand the best chance of getting his Bills through. The general business of the country is of far more importance than that of any private member, and therefore I support the amendment unreservedly, and hope the Premier will give no promise.

Amendment to add "and Thursdays" agreed to.

Sir J. VOGEL.—I support the taking of Wednesday and Thursday for Government business, for this reason: that it seems to me the wish of the House that the session should be brought to a conclusion as early as possible; at any rate, within a fixed period, no matter what the state of public business may be. That being the case, it appears to me that, the Government business being by far the most important to the colony, it is our duty to give it every opportunity of being done. I shall have occasion to refer to the subject again, so I will merely briefly say now that, as to the waste of time which has taken place, it has been caused by the action of the Government itself, and because of its being incapable of properly leading the House. For my part, I think what has taken place lately—the constant resort, to put the thing plainly, to "talking out" measures—is an odious practice, and one that all sides of the House should join in discouraging; and I take it that, if it is allowed to go on, the effect will be retaliation on retaliation, until all parliamentary discipline and organization is swallowed up, and the very worst possible feeling will prevail amongst honourable members. If I can give any assistance to the Government at any time in stopping this practice I shall be only too glad to do so. As regards the business of private members which should be done, I hope the Government will find an opportunity of allowing local Bills to be dealt with. Next to Bills which affect the whole colony, are local Bills—measures which affect particular parts of the colony—and there is a great deal of expense incidental to bringing them on, and it is a very hard thing not to allow them to be considered during the session. As regards the remainder of the measures standing in the names of private members, there are three Bills which, in my opinion, are pre-eminently of importance, seeing the condition of the colony and the great want of employment and occupation which prevails throughout it. The first of these is the Otago Central Railway Bill; the next is the Kamo-Kawakawa Railway Bill—both of which, in my opinion, it is desirable the Government should take charge of. They are measures which would have the effect of opening large areas of the colony, and affording a very large amount of employment to great numbers of men. If the Bills are passed the negotiations and the business to be done under them will have to be carried out by the Government, and therefore it seems to me that these Bills are Bills which the Government should take charge of, so that they may be assured that the provisions of the measures are such as they can act upon. The third Bill also is a Bill promotive of local industry: it is the Law Practitioners Bill. That Bill is a measure which, if carried, would enable a number of young colonists to earn a respectable livelihood, which they are now prevented from doing in consequence of a trade monopoly. Therefore I trust that this Bill is one opening the door to a larger amount of employment; and, seeing what has notoriously taken place in regard to it, in its being "talked out"—a practice which has now become so established that every honourable member knows the meaning of the term—I say, Sir, that, seeing how two, at any rate, of the three particular Bills to which I have referred have been affected by that practice, I hope the Government will give opportunity for proceeding with these Bills: and it would be very easy to do so, as the Premier knows.

Sir G. GREY.—I wish to add one argument why the Law Practitioners Bill should be allowed to pass, and it is this: that I do not think vice ought to be allowed to walk triumphant in this House. I do not think the wrong attempts which were made the other night to prevent that Bill passing, and so to entail a great evil on the colony, ought to triumph. I do not think that some two or three selfish men in this House ought to be allowed to defeat the intentions of Parliament. One honourable member—the honourable member for Grey-mouth—has several successive years assisted in these attempts, and the honourable member for New Plymouth also has done so, and I hope this House at last will prevent a few tyrants of that kind from pressing down the talent of New Zealand. I am glad to join, therefore, with the honourable member for Christchurch North in his expression of opinion on that subject. Now I turn to another point. I believe that the one thing which is needful for New Zealand is to set the minds of some thousands of tenant farmers at rest. The deferred-payment settlers ought, without an hour's delay, to be relieved from disabilities under which they are now labouring. That is one thing. In the same way I think the village settlers who have been put on their settlements under such hard terms ought to be relieved from terms which certainly will oppress them. If honourable gentlemen saw some of the piteous letters I have had sent to me from all parts of the country I am sure they would feel that these two classes of men should have instantaneous relief. I think, therefore, the Fair Rent Bill ought certainly to be passed this session; and I think, also, that that Bill which would take off from the village settlers the hard conditions which now press them to the earth is a Bill which ought to be pressed through during the present session. I feel I am right in contending that this ought to be done.

Mr. SAMUEL.—I often have the misfortune to be the cause of bringing the honourable member for Auckland Central to his feet, and the honourable gentleman sometimes is the cause of bringing me to my feet, and—

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honourable member has exhausted his right to speak, and cannot speak again on this motion.

Mr. FISH.—I should like to say in corroboration of the honourable member for Auckland Central that there can be no doubt at all that the discussion which took place the other evening on the Bible-in-Schools Bill was a decided attempt on the part of three or four honourable members to prevent the Bill of the honourable member for Auckland Central from coming on—not so much by speaking themselves as by inciting other honourable members to speak, and holding themselves in reserve till all others were exhausted. It is amusing, too, to find that one honourable gentleman who took part in that course, in causing waste of time on that evening, is the same honourable gentleman who has on the Order Paper a motion to curtail the right of individual members to speak in this House. These little things show the inconsistency of the honourable gentlemen very markedly—they are capable of such action, and yet boast of their desire to shorten the debates in this House. It is notorious to the House, without mentioning names, who were the three or four members who made a determined and successful attempt on Friday evening to prevent the Bill of the honourable member for Auckland Central from coming on—a Bill which, if passed, would have the effect of interfering with their particular business.

Mr. MENTEATH.—To give some honourable gentlemen an opportunity of replying to certain accusations which have been made, and therefore to afford an opportunity of free discussion, which this House always desires, I move "the previous question."

Mr. W. P. REEVES.—Charges have been made this afternoon against some members of pursuing the pernicious practice of talking measures out. I have never had anything to do with talking measures out, but I consider that, so long as the custom of the House is what it is with regard to the way important measures are allowed to be carried through, the practice of talking out, far from being pernicious and far from being useless, is a practice of very great value to the country. So long as important Bills like Harbour Loan Bills, which inflict odious burdens of taxation on localities, are allowed to be brought in in the careless, reckless way in which they now are,—so long as a number of most important measures, inflicting most oppressive burdens on certain districts, are allowed, as a matter of course, to go through in one afternoon,—so long as votes are secured for these Bills for personal reasons, and so long as the information regarding them is so exceedingly scanty as it is now, so long do I think that honourable gentlemen who know the evil these Bills inflict on the country are justified in using every legitimate means in their power to prevent the country from being burdened and weighted by these abominable measures.

Mr. SAMUEL.—I am glad to have an opportunity of making the remarks I wish to make, and which I was debarred from making just now by the forms of the House. The honourable member for Auckland Central claims for himself, apparently, the monopoly of imputing wrong motives to honourable members. He is continually asserting that members are actuated by motives certainly the most unworthy and, I might almost say, corrupt. And the honourable member for Christchurch North lately—whether or not it is for the purpose of conciliating the honourable member for Auckland Central and forming a close alliance and friendship with him, or for some other reason—is following closely in the path of the honourable member for Auckland Central, and frequently imputes bad motives to certain honourable gentlemen—I mean to the members of the legal profession. A more baseless charge than that made by the honourable member for Auckland Central was never made in this House. On the occasion referred to the talking was not done by the members of the legal profession, but by members who did not belong to the legal profession; nay, a good many of those who spoke were strong supporters of the measure introduced by the honourable member for Auckland Central. If there was any plot at all it looked very much as if it had been originated by the honourable member for Auckland Central himself, and as if he had placed his Bill below the Bible-reading in Schools Bill for the purpose of gagging honourable members who happened to be lawyers, and preventing them from speaking. Honourable members laugh; but who would laugh if the honourable member for Auckland Central had said that? I would never impute anything corrupt or bad to the honourable gentleman—far from it; but I say he is blind to the importance of other honourable members' Bills, and has a most absurd veneration for his own. I say that some of his Bills have been the most mischievous that could be conceived, and that he has brought forward legislation in this country which has made thousands of people miserable. In abolishing the period of apprenticeship previously required for lawyers he has ruined many a home, and he will only increase that ruin by this measure. The honourable member for Christchurch North referred to litigation as an industry; but I venture to say that the people of this colony do not want an increase and encouragement of such industry. If the honourable member for Auckland Central will look at Hansard he will find that many columns are occupied in the reporting of speeches of honourable members who are not lawyers upon the Bible-reading-in-schools question the other evening; and, if the honourable gentleman will look at the few columns occupied by the lawyers, if he has got any sense of shame in him he will come down to this House and apologize for the baseless charge which he has made. It is perfectly true that I was pleased at seeing that his measure did not come on; but to say that it was through me or those who think as I do that the Bill was talked out is to say that which is absolutely not in accordance with fact. Considering the importance of the Bible-in-schools question, was it likely, simply because the honourable gentleman happened to have a Bill on the Order Paper close by, that I should permit myself to be debarred from speaking on the question? How many hours has the honourable gentleman occupied during this and past sessions in idle talk! I am surprised that the honourable gentleman should have the audacity to say that other honourable gentlemen should not say a word, simply because he has a Bill on the Order Paper. I shall not be tyrannized over like that. I am sorry to see that so many honourable members are carried away by their admiration and respect for the honourable gentleman, and are backing him up in the absurd opinions he holds as to the importance of his own Bills. Some time ago we had the honourable gentleman's Bill for the preservation of the lives of children by prohibiting the importation of lucifer-matches—a Bill introduced, no doubt, with the very best intention, but a Bill which he has since abandoned. We remember the scene which took place on that occasion. By his great eloquence and his prestige he carried the second reading of that Bill by a large majority. I venture to say that there were not five men in the House who really approved of the Bill, and yet the honourable gentleman carried the second reading. I will never be guilty of saying anything unworthy or wrong of the honourable member for Auckland Central, and I would scorn to use unworthy arguments towards him as he does to me, but the honourable gentleman makes a very great mistake if he thinks that so long as I retain my seat in this House he is going to make such charges as he has made uncontradicted. There are other members who are fond of making charges too. I am not going to reply to the honourable gentleman, who I consider made remarks to-day which he should not have made. I am not going to reply to the honourable member for Dunedin South on this occasion, nor on any other occasion. But the honourable member for Auckland Central holds such a high position that, to a gentleman of his standing and education, a gentleman who has such an honourable name in this colony as he has, I would say, "Be careful how you use the high position you have acquired for the purpose of doing damage to young men who have not gained the position which you have; be careful you use that eloquence aright; be careful to judge impartially and honestly, and do not impute corrupt motives to other people." I trust that the honourable gentleman will not in future be influenced by people who whisper mischievous things into his ears, and that he will not in future believe too readily—as he has done in the past—evil of his brother-members in this House.

Sir J. VOGEL.—I cannot submit to the honourable gentleman's statement that I am always making imputations on the legal profession. I do not think I have ever spoken on the question of the Law Practitioners Bill. I made reference the other night to the question in a very mild manner; but the honourable gentleman is so saturated with the question that whenever it is mentioned it brings him up, and he makes one of his stereotyped speeches on the subject. Since other honourable members have challenged my statement, I say that, to my mind, it is scandalous that a number of persons should have the control of the examinations, and arrange them in such a way that they can reduce or increase as they like the number of persons who will follow the legal profession. Take the case of England. A few years ago the qualification for a barrister was that he should be able to eat three substantial dinners. That qualification has been increased by the Inns of Court wishing to reduce the facilities with which persons can obtain introduction to the profession. I should like to know, in the case of a barrister, why there should be any legal examination or general-knowledge examination. If I had a case in which a scientific question was at issue I would sooner have a scientific man in charge of the case than the best lawyer in the colony. If I had a case which referred to some special subject, in the same way I should like an authority on that subject to take charge of the case. The opinion is gaining ground that persons who wish to be defended in Courts of law should be at liberty to employ whomever they think best for the purpose. There is no reason why there should be any obstacle; but an obstacle is raised by those in the profession. I asked a young gentleman the other day who had passed an examination in general knowledge in England what he had to go through. He said he was asked what books in Greek or Latin he was accustomed to study. He stated what those books were, and before he left the hall he was told he had passed. Let us contrast that with the system here. I know of two young gentlemen who, because they could not obtain accurate information as to how they were to be admitted to the profession, passed a wrong examination, and then they were told that it was of no use to them. Then, for five weeks these two young gentlemen were sent from pillar to post to inquire how they were going to be admitted, and then they were not able to obtain satisfactory information until some one made an application direct to the Chief Justice. Then, look at the mode in which it is carried out. As a preliminary, a subscription of £5 each has to be paid two months in advance of the examination. If anything happens to prevent a candidate from going up for examination, do you think the money is returned? No. If a candidate goes up again, he has to pay the same sum. This money is used to save lawyers in practice the expense of keeping up a proper law library.

They use the money of these young aspirants of the profession to meet the expenditure of increasing the law library. Here is another case: A gentleman came here with, it is not too much to say, the most brilliant of recommendations. If he had remained at Home he must inevitably have taken one of the very highest positions in the legal profession. What happened to this gentleman was this: He went up for the legal examination—a mere plaything to him—and they kept him six weeks before they allowed him to know whether he had passed or not. So disgusted was he that he left the colony. For six weeks he was kept idle. I do not say that the honourable member for New Plymouth has any personal motive in this matter—from all accounts, the honourable gentleman has more business than he can attend to: but I say the present system means a hedging-round of the profession, and prevents many from entering it. The honourable gentleman says that it is not an industry. Let me tell him that the lawyer who is most distinguished is he who stops most litigation. In the same way a surgeon is the most distinguished who saves most operations, instead of performing them. The legal profession should be open to the youth of the colony. As to saying that there is no room for others, the general impression is that it is a very remunerative profession. I have long wished to have an opportunity of saying what I have now said, and of saying a great deal more, but I am not disposed to take up the time of the House further.

Mr. SEDDON.—If I were to tell the Government that they were, by their action, swelling the ranks of the unemployed in the colony,—if I were to tell them that in not dealing with one question on the Order Paper they were causing large numbers of our miners to leave our shores, I should only be telling them what is absolutely true. I charge this Government and the late Government with knowingly admitting Chinese into the colony without paying the poll-tax as provided by law, and these persons are coming here by the score. I have been told that permits are given to the Chinese to return to the colony, to be used by other Chinese; and it is a fact that a steamer can come alongside the Wellington wharf, and may have on board a number of Chinese, and they are allowed to land on the wharf and go to the Chinese dens in Wellington, and to swell the number of Chinese in the colony, without any supervision. With regard to the evasion of the Customs dues, we know very well that that is carried on to a very large extent. Some check, it is true, is employed in regard to that, but with reference to the introduction of Chinese there is no check whatever; and this is doing a serious wrong to the colony. In connection with the furniture trade the Chinese are driving bonâ fide tradesmen out of the trade. I refer to Auckland in particular. In this town of Wellington also the same thing prevails at the present moment. I contend that by this the Government and the Parliament are conniving at the introduction into this colony of the fell diseases of leprosy and small-pox. We know that sooner or later we shall have these diseases amongst us. It is only the other day that a steamer came to Wellington with a number of Chinese on board, having come from a steamer that had small-pox on board, and, in addition to their paying no poll-tax, the Chinese got away to the West Coast without supervision, and the Government had to send detectives after them, but they only found five out of the ten Chinese who had come by the steamer. Suppose small-pox had broken out at Greymouth, who would have been to blame? We find that in the neighbouring colony of Victoria recently the quarantine regulations were enforced, and at the time persons were coming from Victoria to Tasmania, while we were admitting vessels free coming from Tasmania to New Zealand. Who is responsible for that? This is what is being done, and it is bad enough in all truth. I am, perhaps, speaking very strongly on this matter; but I know, and the Premier knows, that it is in his power to have the matter tested by inquiring of the detectives of Wellington the number of young girls who are visiting at the present time these Chinese dens in Te Aro. I have a list, taken by a person interested in this matter, and from this it appears that there are over twenty-five girls, of from eleven to sixteen years of age, who are frequently in those dens, and there is no doubt whatever that serious immorality exists. And there is not a word said about it. The Government must know something about it, because they could ask the detectives of this city what is the state of these dens, who frequent them, and whether the charge is true which I now make that they are frequented by girls of tender years. If so, I say that those who encourage them there should be at once taken to justice. Are we to go on like this? Are we to have them increased by the hundred? I, for one, protest. In the West Coast goldfields the Chinese are taking ground that Europeans could work, and the Chinese there are in large numbers and have acquired the water-rights, and they thus command these gullies to the detriment of the European population. I only need to point out to the Government and Parliament what is taking place with regard to the Chinese in Victoria, New South Wales, and South Australia. There they have passed restrictive legislation, and unless this Parliament follows suit we shall have New Zealand a happy hunting-ground for the whole of the Chinese. That means that, bad as we are now, we shall then be considerably worse. Victoria has refused to grant any more letters of naturalisation to Chinese, and has also refused to grant any further permits to the Chinese; and it devolves on this Parliament, before the adjournment takes place, that legislation on this point should be effected. I undertake to say that if the Government will have a return prepared of the number of Chinese that have come to the colony during the last year they will find that not one Chinaman in ten has paid the tax, and they will also find that the permits issued have been used by different Chinamen over and over again. And if they inquire into what is being done in these dens they will come to the conclusion that a measure of the kind to which I have referred ought to be passed. I do not wish to claim any special consideration for myself, but I wish to save New Zealand from being dragged down to the same position as other colonies in respect to the Chinese, and I, in the interest of the welfare of New Zealand, demand that the Parliament legislate on the subject this session.

Mr. FISH.—While I am unwilling to detain the House on this question, I do not care to allow the remarks of the honourable member for New Plymouth to pass without a word or two of comment. That honourable member started his remarks by deprecating the bad habit of the honourable members for Christchurch North and Auckland Central, in imputing bad motives. He had scarcely got that out of his mouth when he himself charged those very gentlemen with all sorts of bad motives. He told the House that a large proportion of its members were neither more nor less than idiots, inasmuch as he said the Law Practitioners Bill was a most mischievous measure; and yet, if I recollect aright, it was passed by fifty or sixty members to a very small number on the other side, and therefore, if it is a most mischievous measure, there must be a large proportion of this House who were idiots to pass the measure. And he goes on to tell us that, although the Bill was carried by such a large majority, there was not one member in the House who voted for the Bill who really believed in it. In using language of this kind he is really insulting those members who voted for this Bill, of whom I was one. Those who have had the pleasure of the honourable gentleman's acquaintance in the House must have noticed that he has always seemed to assume a dominating position, and a greater knowledge than any other member on any subject under the sun, and he would have you believe that he is brim-full of common-sense and intelligence and argument. But I think he will find that honourable members will get very tired of him. Whilst he himself and one or two other members of the legal profession—and I do not by any means include the whole of the members of the legal profession in this House in what I say—incited a large number of members to speak on that debate, one would have imagined, from the virtuous indignation he assumed, that it was quite foreign to his nature to do anything of that kind. That kind of thing has been done before and will be done again; but when we find him getting up and talking in tones of righteous indignation about the impossibility of his doing it, it becomes ludicrous in the extreme.

Major ATKINSON.—I should like to say, in regard to the remarks of the honourable member for Kumara, that the question he has raised is no doubt one of very great importance. However, the Government have the matter under their consideration, and we are in communication with Melbourne and Sydney on the subject. I am of opinion that it is a question whether the time has not arrived when we should effect similar legislation to that enacted in the other colonies.

Mr. SEDDON.—On this point I should like to add that I shall be happy to give the Minister of Justice the list of names I have referred to that has been supplied to me of young girls who have visited the places in question, and I think he will find, on reference to the detective department, that it is correct. If the Minister will follow the example of the other colonies in this matter he will be doing a just thing to all concerned.

"Previous question" agreed to.

CUSTOMS TARIFF.

Major ATKINSON.—Sir, under the circumstances, it will not be necessary for me to say more than a few words in moving the resolution of which I have given notice. There appears to be a difference of opinion as to whether it is the desire of this House that there should be a revision of the tariff this session. Some honourable members appear to think that it is possible and desirable; but the Government, after careful consideration, have come to the conclusion that it is impossible satisfactorily to revise the tariff this session. It must also be clear to the House that no Government could submit to have a tariff proposed by somebody else for their adoption. It therefore seemed to the Government, under the circumstances, desirable, there being so short a time left for the transaction of business, that this question should be settled once for all. I may say that, personally, I very much desired to revise the tariff this session. I thought over the matter before I came into the Government, and I have given it very careful consideration since, and I give it as my deliberate opinion that there is no man capable of satisfactorily revising the tariff during the time which the House can now devote to the matter. I would further point out that if we were to adopt the course which some honourable gentlemen seem to think right,—if we were to adjourn the House for a couple of months, and then meet again, knowing that it would be impossible to give due attention to the reorganization of the Civil Service, which the House has determined on as the first step towards placing the finances of the country on a proper basis—I say it would be impossible in two months to do both that and revise the tariff in a satisfactory manner. I am quite sure that it is only a moderate time to take till next session for those purposes. That is the deliberate opinion of the Government, and therefore we have felt that it is our duty, in order that we may get on with the retrenchment which the House has determined on, and after what occurred last week, to have this question decided at once. I must also tell the House once more what I have already told it: that every day we sit here renders retrenchment more and more impossible within the time we proposed. When we told the House that we proposed to make a certain amount of retrenchment within the year, we hoped that the House would have risen by the beginning of December. It is impossible to effect those retrenchments without devoting considerable time to them. The machinery is too large to be set in motion in a short time. To set it in motion before we can direct the lines on which it shall run would be impossible. It would be quite easy to cut off a salary here and there, and turn this officer and that away; but that is not what the House wants. It wants the Service to be properly carried out, and at a less cost than hitherto; and sufficient time must be given to us to do that. I venture to say, after considerable experience, that I am not capable, and would not pretend, to do these two great works this session. I hope the House will agree to the motion, and then the Government will be pledged to effect retrenchment as soon as possible, and to bring in a revision of the tariff next session.

Sir G. GREY.—I should like the honourable gentleman to give us one piece of information before he sits down, and that is, to explain the meaning of the words "a thorough revision of the tariff." Does he intend by his motion that, if an honourable member thought it would be advisable and in the immediate interest of the country to make one alteration in the tariff, such a motion could not be put to the House and discussed?

Major ATKINSON.—Yes; that is the meaning of the resolution. The Government are not prepared to permit any alteration of the tariff this session. I say that, however much they may regret it, they feel that it would not be right to revise the tariff this session.

Sir G. GREY.—Will it prevent any motion from being made by an honourable member? If we pass this resolution will it close our mouths as to any alteration whatever in the tariff? Is that what we are to understand by the words "thorough revision of the tariff"?

Major ATKINSON.—It would entirely depend on the motion brought forward. If it were a motion dealing with the tariff, the Government would have to treat it as a vote of want of confidence.

Sir G. GREY.—I mean, can we still bring a motion forward if we choose?

Major ATKINSON.—Undoubtedly.

Mr. SEDDON.—Will the honourable member consider one point—that is, with regard to the importation of flour into New Zealand? By a statement published the other day, I saw that it could be imported at £6 10s. a ton; while New Zealand has now more than six months' supply in hand. I should like to know whether the honourable gentleman would take a motion on a matter of that kind as one of want of confidence. I seriously put this question in the interest of the people of New Zealand.

Major ATKINSON.—Of course I cannot say what the Government would do until the motion is brought forward. It would be my duty to give it careful consideration; but, speaking generally, if the House passes any motion generally revising the tariff, I should regard it as a no-confidence motion. I shall consider further what should be done if any motion is brought forward.

Motion made, and question proposed, "(1.) That, in the opinion of this House, the imperative demand by the colony that the public expenditure should be brought within the revenue, and the necessity, in order to prevent serious embarrassment, that that object should be effected without delay, renders it the first duty of the Government to press on the necessary financial measures. (2.) That the time to be devoted to these measures renders it impracticable to give sufficient consideration in the present session to such a thorough revision of the Customs tariff as is required, and therefore such revision should not be now attempted, but should be undertaken during the recess, and submitted to Parliament at the beginning of next session."—(Major Atkinson.)

Sir J. VOGEL.—I think the answer to the question put by the honourable member for Auckland Central may be found in the terms of the resolution itself. We have not to do with what was the intention of the honourable member at the head of the Government. No doubt he stated that last week; but he has not been very happy in giving effect to it. As the resolution stands, it says there shall not be a "thorough revision;" therefore it is open to any honourable member to bring down a motion with regard to any item of the tariff, so long as he does not go through the whole tariff, so as to bring it under the designation of "thorough." However, that question is not of much importance, for there is no doubt the Government wishes to take the view of the House as to whether there should be a revision of the tariff this session or not. Before discussing the resolution itself I should like to refer to the circumstances under which it has been brought down. About a week ago I proposed to ask the Government to fix a day for discussing the question of a new tariff. I did not consider that the question raised by the motion of the honourable member for Parnell, as to whether a certain petition should be referred to the Government, as recommended by the Public Petitions Committee, or whether it should be dealt with by the House, was a sufficiently direct way of raising the issue as to revising the Customs tariff. The indignation of the honourable member for Egmont, I may tell honourable members who are new to exhibitions of that kind, was a mere piece of strategy. That the honourable gentleman really objected to one in my position asking him in the most courteous and conciliatory manner for facilities to consider such a question cannot but be doubted when we actually know that not very long since—about five or six years ago—he subsisted under a notice by the leader of the Opposition of a motion of want of confidence, and by a series of tactics, of a kind I hesitate to describe lest you, Sir, should stop me, prevented that motion from being brought on until he managed to arrange with four members to go over to the Government side. The memory of that must pass away from the present generation before we can believe in exhibitions of indignation of the kind we had last week. And then, as pointing the charge which the honourable gentleman tries to raise against me of wasting the time of the House and preventing it from going on with business, we have, ever since Monday or Tuesday last—some five days—been going on with all kinds of business, although, after that exhibition of indignation, he asked for twenty-four hours because he refused to proceed with business, and yet only now brings down this motion. On that day the honourable member for Wellington East and the honourable member for Egmont were very ready to attack me, because I had exhausted my opportunity of reply. That is what they have done on previous occasions when I had no opportunity of speaking; but when there was a contingency of my following them they remained perfectly silent. I hope I shall not be exceeding the limits of parliamentary phraseology when I say that it seems to me a piece of the grossest presumption—is that parliamentary, Sir?—that the honourable gentleman who is at the head of the Education Department should presume to tell me that I am wasting the time of the House. In my opinion many years must elapse before the country considers that, whether I am in opposition or in the Government, my services are worth less than those of the honourable gentleman. I have been seventeen years in this House, and the honourable gentleman's parliamentary experience is confined to three years—the first session he was returned he was too ill to take part in the business of the House. The honourable gentleman referred to my conduct last session, and he also referred to my conduct last week. With regard to that point, I have to say that, whilst honourable members on different sides of the House have begged me not to bring that incident up again, the conduct of the honourable member in referring to it may be interpreted by honourable members as rendering it necessary for me to do so. If he did not desire that, he should have had more control over his temper. As to my conduct last session, I will give one little instance by way of contrast to his conduct. During the three years that the honourable gentleman has been in Parliament he has been in the habit of immediately following Ministers of the Crown or one of those speakers whose remarks are considered of special importance. He thought he thereby assumed to himself the position and dignity of being called upon to reply to the remarks of those honourable gentlemen. Last year he made a very long speech—a speech which very few people listened to, and certainly very few people read. It was full of figures, and on two occasions during the course of its delivery he solemnly declared that every figure he quoted was correct. Under ordinary circumstances those figures would have passed without revision, and nothing could be safer than for the honourable gentleman to declare that they were absolutely correct; but after the session he published his speech, sent it round, and said that every man and woman in Wellington should read it. By accident I did read it, and I can say that it was one mass of misstatements, misrepresentations, and falsehoods from beginning to end. I had to speak before a Wellington audience, and I turned the speech inside out, and showed how utterly unreliable it was, notwithstanding the statement of the honourable gentleman. The papers published in Wellington have not facilities sufficient to enable them to report at length, and, luckily for the honourable gentleman, what I said was not reported, and the public did not have full knowledge of that honourable gentleman's inaccuracy; but, so far as I am concerned, I may say that I shall not feel justified in the future in taking any figures brought down by the honourable gentleman, no matter how solemnly they are stated by him, unless I am able to verify them. As regards the charge of wasting time made against me by the honourable member for Egmont, his remarks are entitled to greater consideration; but I will say this: I have been seventeen years in Parliament, and I have never spoken less than I have during the present session. I have frequently avoided speaking. I have spoken three times upon questions of policy, once when the honourable gentleman wanted to adjourn the House for a fortnight, once upon the Financial Statement, and once when I goaded the Government into bringing down their policy Bills, which they were disposed to keep back. Those are the only three times that I have spoken on policy questions. The charge of the honourable gentleman, that I have wasted time, I throw back upon himself. The honourable gentleman is said to be an astute tactician; but one thing is very certain, this: that the honourable gentleman has lost his control over the House, or he has, for some reason of his own, wished to keep the business of this House back; for a more miserably-managed session than this since we have been here I have never seen in the course of my long experience, and I think I may appeal to honourable gentlemen who have been long in the House to agree with me in what I have said. I give the honourable gentleman his choice between either a concealed intention or partial imbecility, and he may take his choice. Now, it is quite true that, in my opinion, the convenience of honourable members should have no place in the consideration of the question as to how long they should sit. Therefore I myself did not convert Christmas into a landmark beyond which the session of the House should not extend; but, as I have said, I have no wish to prolong the session; and I am able to say this: that I believe that the feeling in the House—at any rate, of those honourable gentlemen who are kind enough to act with me—is in favour of the session ending by Christmas. So much in reference to the way in which these resolutions come before us. Now as regards the question of an alteration of the Customs tariff. The honourable gentleman's statement, that it is impossible for us to deal with it before Christmas, is quite a puerile one. To show that this is so I will just refer to a few items in the tariff—not many of them, but just a few—to show how much there is in the honourable gentleman's contention. The first item of alteration would be in respect of those goods which are now subject to an ad valorem duty of 15 per cent. These articles have been all grouped together for a long time, so that there could be no possible difficulty in deciding whether or not the duty on them should be increased 3, 4, or 5 per cent. There is no necessity to regroup them. As they stand they cover quite a number of articles, the increase on which would in some cases be purely for revenue, whilst in others the increase would yield revenue, and at the same time afford encouragement to local industry. There is another grouping—a very important grouping, no doubt, but about which honourable members are quite prepared to express an opinion—that is, as to whether there should be an increase of duty on boots and shoes. Then, there is the question of ironwork. That is a question which is of importance not only to the local industries of the colony, but also to the consumers, because it has been well shown that, while these small items, or, for that matter, large items, are imported under conditions owing to which local industries are unable to compete, no sooner is a small protective duty imposed, and the local manufacturer able to get to work, than the importers are no longer able to charge those large prices which have affected the consumers to an enormous extent. I will give a short example to show this. In an admirable paper, read before the Industrial Association of Auckland by Mr. William Leys, this point is suggestively touched on, and he says,—

“But to show how difficult it sometimes is to establish any industry in the colonies, and how the importers endeavour to crush out of existence any article that competes with them, I will give a simple illustration. The other day I required a small gate-fastener, and entered the shop of one of our largest Queen Street ironmongers. I was shown one, sold for 1s. In the course of the purchase the shopman stated that their old price for the same article was 2s. 6d. I replied, ‘Then, how is it you now charge only 1s.?’ ‘Because a local blacksmith started to produce them at that price, and we were compelled to reduce our price accordingly.’ That is an absolute fact. If, therefore, this local blacksmith had not started his industry, the public would still be paying the importer 2s. 6d. for that which can now be purchased for 1s.”

That is one of numberless examples that could be shown to prove that, if you do not give a fair chance to the initiation of local industries, the consumers of the colony must be made to suffer by the heavy prices charged by importers. As regards steam-engines of every kind for various purposes, nothing can be more desirable than to teach the colonists how to make large machinery of this description, and so to render themselves independent of the chances that may intervene between our obtaining such goods from places thousands of miles distant. Then, there is another line of importance with which it is not difficult to deal. I refer to sweetened and perfumed spirits—spirits under proof. Importers were informed, in May last, that an increased duty would be charged upon those spirits. Is there any reason in the world why we should lose £12,000 a year, £1,000 a month, on that item because the honourable gentleman has not the courage to bring down a Bill to impose this duty, or, rather, to alter the duty, on this article? That is purely a waste of money, to be charged to the account of the honourable gentleman. Now I come to another important article—plain galvanised iron. That is admitted free of duty, but 2s. is charged upon corrugated iron. I may explain that this is a question of both Free-trade and Protection, and also of revenue. It does not merely come under the head of Protection—just the contrary. In this case some trifling inexpensive machinery is used to convert plain galvanised iron into corrugated iron, something like what washerwomen use for what is termed “goffering” frills. And on account of the plain iron coming in free we lose many thousands of pounds of revenue upon the corrugated sheet-iron, which is charged 2s. per cwt. It is admitted that this is money purely thrown away, for a differentiation of 6d. would be quite sufficient to protect the interests of the local corrugators, and a duty of 1s. 6d. might very fairly be charged upon the plain sheet-iron. Then, there is the item of preserved fish. The quality of the mullet which is preserved in Auckland is, of course, a matter of taste. I can only say this: that I myself, and a great many of my friends, consider it nicer than the salmon which is imported from America. Many thousand of tins of the latter are brought in from America, though quite as good an article can be efficiently supplied in the colony. Then, there is another article—cement. That article is being made of great excellence in the colony, and a little assistance would establish an industry of a most important character—important not only to those persons engaged in it, but important to the colony at large, as tending to facilitate the cheaper execution of works in which cement is largely used. Then, a duty might very well be put on an article with the taxation of which the honourable member for Kumara would heartily sympathize—rice. It would yield a large revenue, and would secure a considerable amount from a class of people who at present do not contribute their fair share to the taxation of the colony. I shall not go into other items, but I think I have said enough to show honourable members that the difficulty of a partial revision of the tariff has been exaggerated, as certain alterations might at once be made with great advantage to the colony. Now, as to the resolutions proposed by the honourable gentleman, and which have been read by you, Sir, I may say, as regards the first one, that it seems to me to cover what is not the case, for the

“necessary financial measures” are not before us. It is meant in this resolution to say that retrenchment should be brought forward before any other measure. I ask honourable members, has the honourable gentleman allowed us to consider the question of retrenchment? Has he not attempted to conceal from us his measures of retrenchment? Has he not stated that he will not allow us to deal with that question? It was for the honourable gentleman to have come down and said, “We propose to retrench in this way and that way, in this shape and that shape. I ask honourable members to have the courage of their opinions, not to fear the disagreeable duties they have now to perform, but to help the Government in making the proposed retrenchments.” Instead of which the honourable gentleman came down and declined to allow the House to express any opinion on the question of retrenchment, or the manner in which retrenchment is to be carried out. He treated as a want-of-confidence motion a question put upon the Order Paper by the honourable member for Wanganui asking for details of the Government scheme of retrenchment, so far as they had been arrived at. The honourable gentlemen on those benches propose to deal in a drastic way with the public service of this colony—to turn things upside down, as the Minister of Education elegantly put it, with reference to the Government Buildings; and they propose to do it without the sanction of the House—without taking honourable members into their confidence. The only measures that are before us, and which by this first resolution we are asked to declare are so important that we cannot consider the tariff, are those relating to a reduction of salaries to be paid to the Governor and to Ministers, and of the honorarium paid to members of both Houses. These are the only financial measures before us which deal with the question of retrenchment; and am I to be told that these few Bills are so difficult to deal with that all other questions must be put on one side? There is another measure that the honourable gentleman may possibly consider a great financial measure; and—to the extent to which it is important as a financial measure—I am sorry to say it is terribly mischievous. So far as I am able to judge, the Land Bill to which I refer is simply a Bill to enable the lands yet remaining to the colony to be snapped up by capitalists without the merest suspicion of control in the way of safeguarding settlement. It appears to me that the honourable gentleman proposes to try and sell, really for what they will fetch, all the Crown lands of the colony, and to obtain a revenue in that manner. If I am right in that suspicion, then we may add the Land Bill to the measures referred to in this first paragraph; but, to the extent that we are able to add it, to such an extent is the Bill opposed to all the sympathies of the majority of the colony, and to the work not only of the late Government, but to that of the Government which preceded it, and of which the honourable gentleman was the head. Then, as regards the second resolution, it is a resolution to the effect that there should not be a thorough revision of the tariff. But, as regards both resolutions, this is to be remarked: that it is an innovation on previous practice. It is borrowing from the French custom, of a Government moving a vote of confidence in itself. As far as I am aware, such a practice is not adopted in Great Britain, except in the case of the House of Lords having passed a vote of want of confidence, when it is held constitutional that the Lower House—the House of Commons—should declare a vote of confidence in the Government. Otherwise, as I say, it is an innovation. And so keenly do we feel the mischievousness of this innovation that this resolution has been arrived at by a number of honourable gentlemen; and, as I think it will be of interest to the House, I will read it:—

“That, in the opinion of this meeting, it is not desirable to debate Major Atkinson’s proposition: Sir Julius Vogel to state, on behalf of the party, that he considers the proposition unconstitutional, useless, and a waste of time; that the Opposition have therefore determined neither to debate the question nor to vote upon it.”

But, Sir, if it is a new precedent, I may say that it is also a very unkind thing on the part of the honourable member to his supporters from the Auckland District. Let me recall to the House what has taken place with respect to this. A number of Auckland members said to members on this side of the House, “Will you come and attend a meeting in order to put pressure upon the Government to get a revision of the tariff this session?” A meeting was held, a deputation appointed duly waited upon the Premier, and he gave it to be understood that unless he could be assured that the Protectionists would support him in everything he was not to be “had.” Some of the Auckland gentlemen were satisfied with what took place, and did not attend the next meeting. Others did, and a resolution was carried to the effect that the action of the Government, or the answer of the Government, was exceedingly unsatisfactory; and that seems to be the opinion of the people of Auckland and of a portion of the Auckland Press. I was struck by an article in one of the papers—the Auckland Evening Star, which said that it was positively cruel of the Government to ask the Auckland members to vote in a direction so opposed to their pledges and to their expressed opinions. The honourable gentleman is not generous. He reminds me of an exhibition I saw years ago—an exhibition which is not uncommon now; an exhibition which Professor Rarey started, but has had many followers since—in which fine young colts, unbroken, are brought upon the stage. The professor, after a series of manipulations, gets the horse down, kneels upon his head, and kisses his hand to the audience. But there is a still further exhibition humiliating to the noble animal. The professor puts his foot on the animal’s head, and waves an umbrella up and down. Now, it seems to me that that is what the honourable gentleman is doing to the Auckland members. Not content with having “Rarey-fied” them—broken them in—he is determined that they shall thank him for making them false to the assurances which they have given to their constituents. From the Auckland address to which I have referred before, I should like, especially for the benefit of the Minister who presides over the public works, to read a little paragraph. Mr. Leys seems to be a very wise man, and I may say so although he opposes me, because he seems to consider what candidates ought to do. He says,—

“Then, you have the great financial reform politician, who will tell you that the main cause of the depression is the extravagant expenditure in the various Government departments, and endeavour to show that by reducing the annual cost of these departments prosperity would at once arise. This is a strange way of proposing to revive trade and restore prosperity. If such a line of policy were carried into effect a greater state of depression would exist; for it simply means the discharge of a large number of Government employés, thereby increasing the ranks of the unemployed. Then, we have the bland politician, who will tell the working-man that he is in favour of encouraging colonial industry, that we have great mineral resources and natural products that require developing, and that he will do all in his power to assist these if elected, but when elected will never be found to have opened his mouth in Parliament in support of those promises. These gentry are your worst enemies, and should be made an example of.”

Sir, is it right that the honourable gentleman should, if I may use the expression, ram this resolution down the throats of those to whom he knows it is most distasteful? Now I shall come to the question of the position of the Government, and what we mean to do with regard to it. Perhaps I might describe it in three ways, the first two of which are not particularly refined, but I shall endeavour in the third to make up for that. First, our idea is, that if we give the Government rope enough a very sure result of a familiar character will follow; next, we are of opinion that it is not undesirable the Government should stew in its own juice; and, thirdly, we shall leave the honourable gentleman at the head of the Government—and now I am going to borrow from mythological history, and the honourable member at the head of the Education Department will doubtless explain the meaning to his colleagues—we shall leave the honourable gentleman at the head of the Government to the fate of that gentleman in mythological history who inadvertently happened, in a walk he was taking, to invade the precincts of a quiet lake where some ladies were bathing. I will leave the honourable gentleman to explain who was the person and what was the fate that overtook him. Now, as regards the honourable members who are associated with me, we shall endeavour to shorten the session, and shall not speak at more length than we consider our duty obliges us to do; but I must not lead the honourable gentleman to suppose that we will permit measures that we disapprove of to pass without reasonable opposition. But generally he will find us inclined to help him in pushing on the work of the session. Now, as regards the position of the Government, I should like to say this: that I disclaim desiring to give any personal offence if I speak of the desire of the Government to cling to office. I wish it to be clearly understood that I am not referring to any sordid reasons. Indeed, the Bill that has been brought down by the honourable gentlemen in relation to their salaries speaks for itself as to their not being wanting in generosity or disinterestedness. But surely it is a great position for six men in the community to be selected from their fellows to govern the State, and surely such a position has attractions sufficient to enable us to refer to an anxiety to retain office without imputing sordid motives. Therefore I trust the honourable members of the Government will accept this assurance once for all when we take exception to their desire to retain office; for, as far as I can see, their only desire this session is to retain office, and their only plan of doing so is by mollifying their supporters who hold different views. The honourable member at the head of the Government, I am sorry to say, appears to me to have lost all his old power, to have fallen away enormously in ability, whilst, unfortunately, his faults have survived, and stand therefore exposed in cruel prominence—those faults of arrogance and a disposition to coercion, for which the honourable gentleman was famed in former times, and which positively make honourable members on this side of the House fearful of rising to express their opinions. And, Sir, he is utterly wanting in knowledge of the condition of the colony, and has no conception of what is required to retrieve it. He has hold of papers showing that retrenchment was most spoken of during the elections, and his idea is that if he can retrench he will do sufficient without going into the question at all of what is required under the very difficult circumstances in which a very large number of colonists are placed owing to the decrease of industrial enterprise. Now, I say this, and I say it with all seriousness and all solemnity: that the honourable gentleman principally owes his seat to the personal hostility he has contrived to raise against me, and that this will prove a most disastrous thing to the colony. I am prepared, having studied and carefully thought over the circumstances of the colony, and the remedies which have been applied to meet its conditions I am prepared, and I state so solemnly to the country and to the House, to bring down proposals which would enable us to reduce taxation, to abstain from placing further loans on the London market for years to come, and to proceed with the railways now under construction at a moderate rate of progress. I am prepared, Sir, to bring down proposals of that kind, and I dare not do so, for such is the state of the House with regard to myself, owing to the action of the honourable gentleman, that to bring down proposals of that kind would simply lead to my being subjected to jeers and insults. Sir, on that honourable gentleman rests the responsibility that these proposals have now to be postponed. The honourable gentleman laughs.

Proud bird of Mount Egmont, thy plumes shall be torn.

Sir, it is safe for the honourable gentleman to laugh now; the time will come when the colony will call upon him to account for what I have stated. I could not have a better proof of what I have said than the very fact that the mere stating that I have such proposals to make is met by jeers and insults on the part of the honourable gentleman—that I, I who brought down the public-works policy, I who took that honourable member into the Government at a very critical time, and made a great mistake in doing so—there was a choice between two gentlemen, and I did not select wisely—that I, when I say I have such proposals to make, should be met by jeers and laughter on the part of the honourable gentleman. Sir, I pledged myself in 1884 that I would not increase the taxation, notwithstanding the large deficit left by the honourable member and the fact that the expenditure was some quarter of a million over the revenue. I knew the means by which it would not be necessary to impose the large increased taxation which the country dreaded. I carried that proposal out. The honourable member for Egmont opposed it on every occasion, and now that he has come into office he is glad to take advantage of it. The proposals I have now are of a different character, suited to the very different condition of the colony—the difference being that, whereas in 1870 we had not prepared the colony to be the home of the thousands within it, to whom it ought to have offered attractions, we have now gone in excess of the requirements of the population, and require to take a new course. That course I indicate by saying that it is one which will mean reduced taxation, refraining from introducing loans to the English money-market for years, and proceeding at a reasonable rate with the railways now under construction, instead of paralysing the country by the inaction which the honourable gentleman either has in view or has left us to suppose he has, under a mistake or misapprehension. I must add this: that whilst I have spoken of those advantages, honourable members must not suppose that I am insensible to the question of a radical retrenchment. I have pledged myself that I would move and aid in the matter, and, no matter how disagreeable action of the kind may be, I am prepared to have the courage of my opinions, and to assist in bringing into effect a large and radical retrenchment. And I feel ashamed of honourable members who have the fear of unpopularity, who, from no other cause, are allowing the Government to say to them: “We will do this dirty work. Leave it to us, and we will save you from the odium and disagreeableness associated with it." Those who have the courage of their opinions ought to say: "We will not submit to reductions, to retrenchments, without knowing what they are; and if we approve of them we will support you, no matter how unpopular they may prove to be." The honourable gentleman's policy, in my opinion, is a spurious retrenchment. I do not believe it is his intention to carry out any real retrenchment. I think, Sir, he is amusing us or himself, as the case may be, and is shutting out from us any consideration of what we may or might do to relieve the difficulties under which the colony labours. Meanwhile, Sir, although it is stated in the resolution that the revenue should meet the expenditure, although he has the audacity to state that his policy is that the revenue should meet the expenditure, the honourable gentleman comes down with proposals to the effect that, whatever deficiency there may be, it should be recouped by deficiency bills or Treasury bills; in fact, that, instead of the revenue meeting the expenditure, the revenue should be made up to such an extent as may be necessary out of borrowed money. I do not like to take to prophecy. I will only say that I fear, if this policy is pursued, and no steps are taken to equalise the revenue with the expenditure, we shall find that our stocks at Home will further suffer—and they have gone down  $8\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. since the honourable gentleman made his Financial Statement. And that, Sir, may not even be the worst, for I greatly fear that unless the credit of the colony is improved it may stand in the way of obtaining money for other industrial enterprises, such as the Midland Railway, the Otago Central Railway, and other works for which capital should be so readily provided from Home. I have explained the circumstances under which the resolution has been brought down, our past action, and our intention not to discuss or vote upon this resolution. We shall at once walk out of the House, and leave those honourable gentlemen to take what course they may. My honourable friends from Auckland, who remain, will be safe in voting, without any danger of turning the Government out; they will have the luxury of voting as they like without imperilling the Government position. We shall leave the Government the luxury of dealing with its own friends, and I think they will have a great deal of such luxury also in the future. But I wish to emphatically declare before we go,—before I conclude my remarks,—that if those honourable gentlemen for whom I am speaking, and I myself, thought that there was by any possibility a means of forcing the Government into revising the tariff during the present session, we would not take the action we are now about to do. We take that action, Sir, as a protest against the resolutions of the honourable gentleman. We take that action because we do not approve the nature of the resolutions and the new practice they introduce. And we see no reason why we should not take that action, because it is obvious to us that it is not in our power to force on a revision of the tariff; although we know that if the country were polled three-fourths of the people in it would proclaim, in as earnest a manner as possible, the necessity of making such a revision.

Sir J. VOGEL and other honourable members here withdrew.

Major ATKINSON.—Yes; I should clear out at once, because you will hear some unpleasant truths.

Mr. FISHER.—Ta-ran-ta-ra!

Mr. FELDWICK.—Sir, before you put the question I merely wish to say that I intend to demand a division. I do not know whether you are going to put the question in one or two parts; but, in any case, it is my intention to demand a division. I pledged myself to the electors that, if no one else moved a vote in favour of the tariff being dealt with this session, I should do so. I intend to vote against the second part of the resolution, and to call for a division. I do so purely as an independent member. I am neither a supporter of Sir Julius Vogel nor of Major Atkinson, and I wish to state that what I am doing now I am doing as an absolutely independent member. I intend to call for a division because I do not believe that the statement is correct that the tariff cannot be revised this session. I am confident it could be done in seven or eight hours, if the Government wished to do it. There is no doubt about it that many industries in the country require that the tariff should be revised. I have received several letters—which I shall be glad to hand over to the Colonial Treasurer—asking that certain items in the tariff shall be dealt with this session. I have one asking that the tariff should be revised in the direction of keeping out all fruit that can be grown in the colony, and also asking that steps should be taken to deal with the large quantities of pulp-fruit that are introduced to the colony, some of it in a very bad condition. I have also been asked to move in the direction of procuring encouragement for several other industries. However, I am powerless in the matter, and, having explained my position and what I intend to do, I now beg to say that, after the Premier has replied, I shall call for a division.

Mr. O'CONNOR.—Before the reply is made, I want to indicate why I neither walk out of the House nor oppose the resolution. I look upon it as quite an absurdity for this House to pretend to do any more work between now and the end of the year than the Government propose to deal with; and I believe this House is not serious in pretending that it wishes to remain over that time. I look at the time that has been spent since we met, and I say that we have done absolutely nothing, and we know now that we are bordering on the first day of December, and it is beyond all reason to expect that we could do anything more than adjust the finances, pass whatever Bills are necessary, and get ready for an early session next year. That appears to me to be a far more reasonable proposition; and, in the interests of the country, I do not see why the Government should be disturbed in their arrangements. It is my object rather to facilitate them in order that they may have a full opportunity for considering their proposals, and, when I see what changes they intend to make, I shall then see on which side I shall vote. In the meantime I take the attitude of one who independently watches over the interests of the country, and I think it is best to leave those honourable gentlemen to have a fair chance with their measures. But I say I do not agree with many of their proposals. I think the proposal of the Premier to take from the subsidies of the outlying country districts an unwise one. To terminate railways and roadworks seems to me a great mistake. When I heard the honourable member for Christchurch North it struck me very much that that honourable gentleman had running in his mind some of the thoughts I have freely enunciated. I think that, as colonial works, the railways should be put a stop to, and that their construction should be handed over to private companies, the same as the Manawatu, the Midland, and the Otago Central. But discontinue the central railway in this Island, and all other lines of that kind, and hand them over to private companies. Devote the money thus placed at your disposal to the opening-up of land for settlement in the outlying districts. Surely every honourable member must know that it is by the railways that we have been brought to our present position. It is by making railways to compete with sea-carriage, which they can never hope to succeed in, that we have been brought to the position of having a revenue which does not meet our expenditure and the more railways are built the more we shall sink in that position. That must be so, for the products of the country are such, and the conformation of the country is such, that of necessity the railways must depend almost entirely on their passenger traffic. There are no great quantities of products to send to any one central portion of the colony. All we require, and all we ever did require, are short lines to connect the interior with the ports. But, instead of that, we have gone in for magnificent schemes of railway communication, going from end to end of each Island, with many branches from them, and made quite regardless of the physical difficulties to be met with. And now we are paying the penalty for this, and the more railways we make the greater will the penalty be, partly for the reason I have stated, and partly because our railways are governed by political influence, and not on a commercial basis. Excuses are always being found for reducing the charges for railway-carriage—whenever there is an influential community to be served, pressure is applied to reduce the charges—and therefore it is impossible for our railways to pay as they should. I hope the Government will study the views that have been expressed in this House, so that when we meet here again they will submit to us proposals calculated to meet the requirements of the country; and in that hope I intend to support these resolutions.

Mr. O'Connor

Mr. WARD.—The unique distinction of being able to take part in debating a vote of confidence in the Government moved by themselves is a privilege I am anxious not to lose the pleasure of. The two resolutions are of such a nature that I am put in a predicament. If they are put together I must walk out without voting, though I do not wish it to be understood I am doing so as a follower of the honourable member for Christchurch North; but if they are put singly I shall vote for the first and against the second. Sir, I hope the question will be quickly decided one way or the other, and that we shall then set ourselves to the business of the country, because I am painfully sensible of the fact that up to the present there has been a great waste of time, and it seems to me that the time is so limited that there should be a united effort on both sides to get to dealing with the measures the Government desire to place before the country.

Mr. SAMUEL.—As one opposed to the present Government during the past four sessions, and now an independent member, and as one who believes that the tariff should be arranged with a due regard to Protection, I have felt in doubt as to how I should vote on this question. But it seems to me that, the Government having been placed in office to carry out one task of primary importance—that is, to effect retrenchment and economy—we should not fetter their hands by compelling them to take such another large task as revising the tariff this session. They have got the great task of retrenchment to discharge, and they are in office to undertake it, and I think it is a very good job that they will not have the extra revenue that a revised tariff would bring them, or they would have one incentive less to effect that rigid economy which the country desires. For that reason I shall vote for both of these motions.

Mr. GRIMMOND.—Sir, as a Free-trader I can see no chance of the alteration of the tariff in the present financial position of the colony resulting in a reduction of the amount to be collected at the Customs, and I shall therefore vote for the resolution before the House.

Mr. FITZHERBERT.—I, like some other honourable members, intend to have a division on this question, so that we may see who will vote with the Government and who will not. I was not returned either as a Protectionist or as a Free-trader; I was returned here unpledged, an entirely independent member, to vote as I think fit. I did not advocate Protection on the hustings, because I saw it would be impossible to adopt such a scheme—that the colony could not possibly do without the £1,400,000 it derives every year from the import duties, and so it could not do with Protection. It would have been an absurdity to carry out the tariff proposed last year, which put taxation on articles required for ordinary use, and which would have put a heavy impost on many articles of general consumption. Out of the proposed increased duties, £110,000 of the total of £180,000 was on cotton goods, and, as we have no cotton production or cotton-mills here, and cotton is required in every-day life—even the wrappers in which we send away our frozen mutton are of cotton—that increase would have been most severely felt, and would even have checked industry. Therefore, during my election I declared that I was opposed to absolute Protection, and I also declared that I was opposed to an absolute Free-trade policy. What I advocated was, that we should so foster and encourage local industries as to enable goods which are manufactured, or can be manufactured, in the colony to be sold at a fair profit; and beyond that I would not go. Now, as to the position of this Government with regard to the tariff, there can be no doubt the last Government were defeated on their tariff proposals; and, no doubt, that was the main question before the country when we went to the electors; and, of course, every member now sitting on the Government benches believed that the tariff would be revised this session, and must have come to a conclusion in his own mind as to what increases of duties there should be; and I say, that being so, the Government should have brought in tariff proposals this session. I did not hear the Financial Statement read in this House, being away in a distant part of the country for the benefit of my health; but when I read it I was astonished to find it did not state that a revised tariff would be submitted this session. I was also surprised at some other features in the Financial Statement; but I am not going to deal with that subject now, and will merely say that I shall remain to vote on this question, and shall vote against the resolutions of the Premier.

Mr. KERR.—Sir, I hold that when we went to the country it was entirely on the tariff question.—(No.)—Yes, it was. Retrenchment was agreed on by both sides, and the late Government was retrenching, and had been all along. The tariff was the question of the day; and when the late Government brought down their tariff it was rejected, and we went to the country on it. In my election the whole thing was fought on that. My opponent was for retrenchment right through, and was not for Protection at all, and he did not want the tariff touched. While he was for retrenchment I declared myself for an increased tariff, and the country upheld me, considering that it was not fair to put the whole of the increased taxation on land alone; that the farmers should not be made to bear more than their fair share of the burden, but that all alike should be taxed fairly. I was elected by a large majority because I pledged myself, as far as in me lay, to get a better tariff at the same time as a tax on land—to increase the Customs duties so far that the farmers should not be compelled to bear the whole burden. That is the reason why I have tried my best to get the tariff raised this session. I may state that I am just as independent as any member in this House. I have no leader; but I pledged myself, if I came back to the House, to compel any Government to bring down a better tariff this session, and I am satisfied that, as surely as I stand here, honourable members will deeply regret that they have not compelled the Government to alter the tariff this session, for I am certain that the Government will not deal satisfactorily with the question next session. I believe that the Government are really deterred from bringing down a tariff through fear of losing their seats on these benches, though if they had brought one down I should have helped them whether they stood or fell by it.

Major ATKINSON.—I am very sorry to have to make a speech on this occasion, but some of the statements made by the honourable gentleman opposite I am bound to answer. Sir, we have very good evidence of the honourable gentleman's courage and his courtesy in the course he has chosen to follow this afternoon. I am not going to grumble at it. It is what we might reasonably have expected from his proceedings this session. The Government have treated the honourable gentleman with exceptional consideration, and this is the result. Well, the honourable gentleman may understand that he will have no more of that consideration for the rest of the session. I want that distinctly understood. I say we have treated him with every and great consideration, and this is the result. And what, Sir, is the result due to? Fear, simply fear. The honourable gentleman is afraid to face the storm he has raised himself. He challenged the Government, and then he pretended that the resolution he proposed to bring down insisting on the tariff being revised this session was intended for the purpose of assisting the Government. Sir, was ever a greater sham attempted to be imposed on this House? And, I say, the honourable gentleman knows it was a sham, and so do some honourable gentlemen opposite, though I admit that there are some other gentlemen opposite who do not and cannot comprehend such action. And, Sir, we have just heard some more sham. The honourable gentleman who has just told us that he has no leader is, at all events, a faithful follower, for never does the member for Christchurch North go into a lobby but he is followed by the honourable member for Motueka. I say, away with such pretences at independence as that, and also that of the honourable member for the Hutt! It is simply pretence, and very weak pretence at that. Honourable gentlemen who make these declarations are simply ashamed of their champion—they would vote with him, but they are ashamed of him. There can be no doubt whatever that the conduct of the honourable gentleman this session has been such as to disturb the equanimity of his followers. Mistake after mistake—to use the mildest possible term—has been made by him; and his last and greatest mistake was when he challenged the Government on this question, and asserted positively that a majority of this House were determined to have, this session, a revision of the tariff. Now, with regard to the alleged unconstitutional action, as declared in that wonderful resolution which was carried by some half-dozen honourable members—the rest would not go to the meeting,—those who declared the Government's action to be unconstitutional know as little about what is constitutional as some of them care. The honourable gentleman opposite wants to be very constitutional, and says I do not meet him constitutionally. How am I to meet him? He alleges positively that this House wants a revised tariff this session; yet he has not the courage to put the question to the House. He has not the courage to ask the House whether it is so or not, though he himself declares that it is. How am I to answer him?

Mr. KERR.—He wants to help you.

Major ATKINSON.—Help me! This is not a case of helping a lame dog over a stile. When I want help of the honourable gentleman I will ask him; but it will be a very long time before I do.

Mr. KERR.—It appears to me you are not answering the question.

Major ATKINSON.—I am going to answer it in my own way, and not in the way which the honourable member for Waimea thinks I should. We have had an exhibition of the patriotism of the honourable member for Christchurch North, as well as of his courage. What is the extraordinary position he has taken up before the country and the House? I hope the country and the House will mark it. What is the position the honourable gentleman dares to take up in the face of the House and the country? He has a scheme which would raise us out of our difficulties—a scheme which would avoid borrowing, and which would make all local industries prosper, and enable us to go on with our railways; and what is the reason he does not bring it forward? It is, that the honourable gentleman has not got such a scheme: that is the reason. He has, foolishly, now placed himself in the position of a man who has a scheme, and yet he says that it is my power in this House which prevents his submitting the scheme to the country. If we are to believe that the honourable gentleman has such a scheme, there is not one of his followers, who have so ignominiously walked out with their tails between their legs, who would not instantly have demanded it from the honourable gentleman. As a patriot, he was bound to produce it for the benefit of the House and of the country. I will go further. He says that I am utterly incompetent, and that the Government only occupies its position on sufferance; and yet he alleges I have power over this House such as he describes. What must be the condition of honourable members of this House if that is true? I say it is a nice compliment to members of this House, that, because I laughed, a scheme that would regenerate the country is to disappear. It is preposterous. We have had enough of the honourable gentleman's schemes. We had his scheme of 1884, and it has landed us exactly in the position we foretold at that date. In regard to the seizure of the Sinking Fund, did the honourable gentleman not tell the House that directly it was taken it would do away with borrowing for unproductive works? The result, however, has been quite the opposite. Here we are, every nest-egg gone. And last session the honourable gentleman was going to redeem us by borrowing, and by a tariff, which was instantly laughed out of the House. This year he tells us that borrowing must cease—that we cannot afford to borrow. How can we believe any honourable gentleman who shifts round all the points of the compass just to suit the times? The honourable gentleman talked of 1874. I am not going into that question now, but some day I will expose the state of the finance left by the honourable gentleman when he left office, and I venture to say that he will not come out the best. I say that never were the finances of the country in a more shameful state than when that honourable gentleman left office. Then, the honourable gentleman tells us that in 1879 I was a member of a Government which kept back a motion of want of confidence which was hanging over us for a time. That is true in one sense; but it is not true in the way in which he wanted the House to believe it true. I am not going into the circumstances of that matter, but I must answer the honourable gentleman. The Government of Sir George Grey had been defeated and another Government had been installed, and before that Government had time to examine the finances or make any statement to the House a notice of want of confidence was tabled. What did the Government do? The Opposition, not being quite up to the forms of the House, put the notice of motion in a form in which they could not get it on without the consent of the Government; and what did the Government do? They did what they were bound to do in justice to the country and itself, for they said, "We want seven days to make our statement in. As soon as we have that time we will bring up your notice of motion at once." "No," said the Opposition; "we will have it up at once." Then I said, "Get it up at once if you can." They said, "All right; we will get it up at once." They did not succeed in getting it up. We made our statement to the House, and as soon as we did so we were in a majority. The truth is this: that our Government had a good case. It was only petulance on my part, says the honourable gentleman, that I moved this resolution the other night. Only petulance! Yes, it may have been petulance, but I venture to say that if it had been that honourable gentleman who was on these benches the motion would have been the height of wisdom. The result has been that those honourable gentlemen dare not face us. Where are they? They have sneaked out of the House. They are not going to discuss the question. The honourable gentleman makes a most violent speech of an hour and a half, and then stumps out of the House. I saw shame on the faces of his followers. I saw how much they felt that the honourable gentleman had failed in every course he had recommended to the party. They went out with shame on their faces. Only eight went out with him, I noticed, and I see a good sprinkling of the honourable gentleman's followers present now.

Mr. KERR.—There was no shame.

Major ATKINSON.—There are some honourable gentlemen who cannot feel shame; I am talking of those honourable gentlemen who can feel shame, and who occasionally do show it. The honourable member for Waimea seems very unhappy.

Mr. KERR.—I see what you want to do.

Mr. SEDDON.—You are talking against time.

Major ATKINSON.—Perhaps it would not take five minutes to reply to the honourable gentleman, although he spoke for an hour and a half, but I do propose to say a few words with the permission of the honourable member for Waimea. If I have not finished at half-past five I shall do myself the pleasure of resuming the debate at half-past seven. Well, then, we come to the attack the honourable gentleman made on the Minister of Education. First of all, he tells us that the House and the country think very little of the Minister of Education; that all his figures are wrong, and that he does not know however he is going to answer. I notice, however, this peculiarity: that, although the honourable gentleman is always telling us when he speaks that my honourable colleague ought not to be considered, the honourable member for Christchurch North invariably picks him out to spend twenty minutes or half an hour upon. I would advise the honourable member for Christchurch North not to be so sure of the insignificance of the honourable gentleman. I venture to think that my honourable colleague will hold his own against even so great a man as the honourable member for Christchurch North. "Puerile," says the honourable gentleman—he is very fond of strong words when he has very little argument; the honourable gentleman says it is puerile to deal with this question in this way. A great authority the honourable gentleman is on tariffs, is he not? We have had a great deal of experience of the honourable gentleman and his tariffs. The honourable gentleman has produced two tariffs after having had a year's time to consider each. In one case he had two years. What were they when they were brought down? My honourable friend says that one was the "banana" tariff. Many honourable members suppose that the proposal was to put a penny on preserved bananas; but it seems it was really to take a penny off. A "banana" tariff! On the strength of such tariffs as those the honourable gentleman can speak with great authority on tariffs. The honourable member for Invercargill says he could prepare a tariff in seven or eight hours. It would not take the House seven or eight hours to deal with it. I can assure the House that the present Government have no idea of bringing in a tariff which is going to be treated as the honourable gentleman's tariff opposite was treated. We are going to stand or fall by it. An honourable gentleman says, Put 5 or 10 per cent. on ad valorem duties. We have had experience of putting a duty on that class of goods. In 1879 the tariff was revised hastily. We increased the tariff in that year very largely, and the ad valorem duties were raised 10 or 15 per cent., and we did not get a single half penny additional revenue. The tariff, if it is to be revised at all—and the Government have said distinctly that it is to be revised—I say must be revised with great care and consideration; and I say there is no man here who can pretend to say what revenue we can necessarily raise by the tariff next year. The honourable member for New Plymouth referred to a point which it is very important for the House to consider—that is, giving increased taxation until we have seen the greatest retrenchment which can possibly be made. That is the stand the Opposition took last session. They said, "We will not vote any additional taxation until we are certain that the public expenditure has been reduced to the lowest possible amount." I say this House, if it is wise, will adhere to the same rule. The people of New Zealand will not object to the taxation necessary to carry on the services economically; but the vast majority of the taxpayers of this colony are not prepared haphazard, for any purpose whatever, to give a greater revenue to the Government than at present until they are satisfied that the utmost retrenchment has taken place. I say that is an important principle.

Mr. SEDDON.—Why did you increase the property-tax?

Major ATKINSON.—Why did we increase the property-tax?

HOUSE RESUMED.

The House resumed at half-past seven o'clock.

Major ATKINSON.—When the House rose at half-past five o'clock I was referring to the amendment of the tariff which the honourable member for Christchurch North had alluded to. The honourable member went on to tell us that it was not a question of Protection that we had to deal with now, but simply a matter of revenue. The whole tenor of his speech showed that he was not considering the question of revenue at all, but was trying to excite in the minds of honourable members a fear of their constituents. I am happy to say that the members of this House, at any rate those who are supporting the Government, know very well what is the real feeling of their constituents, and they know very well that they are giving effect to what their constituents desire in the action they are now taking. They are not to be led away by the device of the honourable gentleman into doing what they know is an impossibility. What their constituents desire is not that galvanised iron should have a special duty put upon it this session, but that the tariff should receive a general revision. That it is what they desire; and I venture to think—and the action of the honourable gentleman shows that he thinks so also, although he told us the exact opposite the other day—the opinion of the House is that the tariff cannot be revised during the present session. So much, then, for the tariff. Then, the honourable gentleman goes on to say, “I accuse the Government of keeping their retrenchment proposals back.” I do not know what the honourable gentleman means. How any honourable member can make such a statement as that, with the facts before him, I am at a loss to understand; because it is contrary to the facts of the case. And it is contrary to the facts which the honourable gentleman accepted himself. The honourable gentleman accepted the Financial Statement as a statement of the policy of the Government. He asked time to consider that Statement, and was not ready to go on with it on the Friday, the Statement having been delivered on the previous Tuesday. It took him to the following Tuesday to get ready to discuss the policy of the Government. The Government gave him that time. He accepted the Statement and the House and the country looked upon the Statement as a clear exposition of the policy of the Government in regard to retrenchment and other matters. And I say that a full scheme of retrenchment is contained in that Statement and the Bills we have brought down since. And I say that the honourable gentleman accepted it, and it was not until he made that wretched speech—that abortive failure, which occupied two hours and a half, in which he told us absolutely nothing, and controverted not a single point in the Statement—it was not till then that he found there was no policy in the Statement. The honourable gentleman thought of upsetting the Statement by a speech which took a week to prepare, and which fell as flat as possible on the House; and one after another of his own supporters in the Press of the country has declared that not one point of the Statement has been shaken. Notoriety seems to be the life of the honourable gentleman. It does not matter what it is, he must have notoriety or he feels that, having failed politically, he will disappear altogether from the thoughts of the people of this country. He tells us to-night—and I was astonished at his temerity—that the promises he made in 1884 he has carried out. This is insulting the intelligence of this House. I say that not one single promise which the honourable gentleman made in 1884 has been given effect to, except this: that he would take the Sinking Fund; and he has now landed us in as great a debt as when he borrowed it. That he has accomplished, to our sorrow, and it is to-day we have to meet the difficulty face to face. And it is in consequence of the terrible muddle and the utter failure of the honourable gentleman's promises to relieve us of taxation, or give us retrenchment, or restore us to prosperity by “leaps and bounds”—it is this failure, I say, that has rendered these drastic proposals of the Government absolutely necessary. And yet the honourable gentleman, at this eleventh hour, comes down with a scheme—no; I beg his pardon; he does not come down with it; he has got it in his breast, and, for fear it should be laughed out of the House, he proposes to keep it there. The members of this House and the country will be able to value such a statement as that at its true worth. I should like to ask the honourable gentleman when he hatched this new scheme,—when he devised it. A regular practitioner who had a patent medicine, a universal medicine with which he could cure everybody, and yet who followed the old lines of the profession, I venture to say would be called a great charlatan. As the words are not allowable in this House, I am not going to apply them to the honourable gentleman; but I was going to ask, where is the patriotism of this honourable gentleman, this saviour of the country? The honourable gentleman came into Parliament to restore prosperity by “leaps and bounds.” He pledged himself to do it, and he tells us he has done it; that every one of his pledges has been fulfilled. Still, I ask how his supporters would feel when they heard the honourable gentleman make such a boast as that. Then, again, I come back and I ask him when it was that he conceived this great scheme. How long ago was it, and under what circumstances? Last session he told us, in the boldest possible language, that retrenchment was all a sham; that it could not be made; that there was no possibility of doing it, and that we must immediately put on taxation to the extent of a quarter of a million. This he told us was absolutely necessary, and he threatened if we would not accept it he would go to the country, and that the country would very soon send us, who disbelieved in that mode of business, about our business. But what answer did the country return? That the honourable gentleman was unfit to govern us. The answer of the country is that it will not trust the honourable gentleman, and will not have him here at all. What has been the action of the honourable gentleman ever since the vote of the country has been taken? Has it not been a constant endeavour to obtain coalition with my side of the House? That is what he has been working for silently and publicly. He says, after the elections, I was bound to go to him. But, when I heard the honourable gentleman declare last session that retrenchment was a sham, all possibility of attaining the object of the honourable gentleman was out of the question. I felt that a coalition, or a proposition of that sort, would have been treacherous to the country, and I made up my mind that under no circumstances would I coalesce with the honourable gentleman, because I felt, as every member on our side of the House felt, that the honourable gentleman meant to go in for extravagance, and spending money merely to keep him in office, and after him would come the flood. Then, the honourable gentleman declares in his place in Parliament that he raised me into office. Then, I ask him, if he believes me to be what he has represented me to be—which I doubt—I ask, to what depth must the honourable gentleman have fallen to be excluded from the position he desires! If what he describes be true, at any rate my friends have had the strength to eject him from office by the will of the country, and I venture to say that the will of the country is that the honourable gentleman should be precluded from ever again taking a place on these benches. And this office I now hold is no seeking of mine, as all my friends know, every one of them; and it is within the knowledge of the honourable member for Auckland Central, who has gone against the Government, that I was perfectly willing to stand aside entirely, and support any Government that would support retrenchment. Then, I ask, what does the honourable gentleman mean by telling us he has this scheme? What does he mean? Is he a patriot? Why does he not divulge his scheme, if he has one? His talk is as idle and inaccurate as it was when the country had confidence in him, and returned him, in 1884, to lead us into this terrible state of financial difficulties which we have to face now. He says, "Look at the securities of the colony; see how they have gone down since the present Government took office." It is true they have gone down, and, if I judge the times aright, they will go down more. And why is it? Not because this Government is in office, but because the English market knows now what is the real state of the colony, the state to which the honourable gentleman opposite has brought it by his wretched financing. Never were the finances of the colony, not even in 1874, when they were bad enough, so bad as they have been for the last three or four years. Well, to come back to the statement of retrenchment, he says we have not put our scheme before the country. I say that we have, and fully, and I say that the further particulars which the honourable gentleman asks for were told in the Statement. We have told him in the debate that we were willing to give every possible explanation, as far as explanation could be given; but to ask this House to go into the question of reorganization is to show an utter recklessness or an ignorance of the subject on which the honourable gentleman is speaking. The House could no more go into the question of the reorganization of the Civil Service than it could fly. After the session, and the Government had reorganized the Service, the House could say whether it was reorganization of which it approves. If the House sees fit it might determine the salaries, the highest and the lowest; but to pretend to say that the House was to determine the number of officers in any department, or the work of that department, is to show an utter ignorance of the question. We should have been at the particulars of this retrenchment but for the waste of time by the honourable gentleman opposite. He has always been in this position: that he has always been looking out for a coalition. He has been intriguing for a coalition; he has been doing everything possible to bring about a coalition; and, having utterly failed in that, he has turned round upon the Government and accuses it of bringing him into disrepute. But it is just the reverse. The Government have treated him with the utmost leniency. They have given him every opportunity, and he has made the mistake—as many a man has done before him—of looking at the attitude of forbearance which we, under the circumstances, have extended to him, as a sign of weakness in us. But he will find now that it is not weakness on the part of the Government. We have been ready to make every allowance for the honourable gentleman. But I say that his speech to-day and his action on several other occasions have put him out of court entirely; and I say no more forbearance is the Government prepared to extend to the honourable gentleman from this day forth. We will treat him with all due respect as the leader of the Opposition; but further than that I, for one, at any rate, shall not be prepared to go. Then, the honourable gentleman told us he is going to give the Government rope enough. Well, is not that kind! Think of the kindness of the honourable gentleman, with eight or ten followers—I do not know that he has more: I know there are more than that in opposition to the Government, but I do not believe that more follow the honourable gentleman. Fancy, with that following, he is going to give us rope!—

Mr. SEDDON.—He might as well give you the tree, at the same time, to put the rope across.

Major ATKINSON.—Yes; but I fancy he has not found it yet. Indeed, I am afraid it has not yet grown, for, if I mistake not, the life of this Government is going to be a pretty long one. I remember very well that in 1879, when we came into power, it was foretold that we should last a day, then it was to be a fortnight, then it was to be till the next session, then it was to be till the next year, and so it went on and on; and then the rope got long enough and the Ministry had to go. I fancy the chances are very much against the honourable gentleman being in at the death on this occasion. In my opinion he is neither giving us rope nor pulling us in, for, under the present circumstances, he is utterly unable to do either. Therefore the threats of the honourable gentleman may be treated as idle boasting: especially may that be the case with the honourable gentleman's statement the other day that a majority of the House was determined to have this question settled and would have it. Now what do we see? We see the honourable gentleman himself is away in the lobbies. Then, we are described by the honourable gentleman, in very elegant language, as being allowed to "stew in our own juice." I wish it were that, with all my heart; but it is the muddle and confusion and the terribly wretched administration of the late Government that we have to stew in. That is our unfortunate position—we have to retrieve the position which he has left behind to us. And he has never yet gone out of office without leaving a position of that kind behind him. It is not in a condition of our own making that we are to stew, as the honourable gentleman tells us; but we have to get the country out of difficulties arising from the wretched government and the wretched finance of the honourable gentleman. And, Sir, just let us follow out the simile. I venture to say that, after we have stewed a little, we shall turn out a very nice dish.

Mr. SEDDON.—Sauerkraut.

Major ATKINSON.—We shall see. Sauerkraut requires fermentation; but we are not going to ferment. Then, we have that classical allusion made, not to the Government, but to me personally. I do not know what portion of the legend he was alluding to, but I suppose it was that portion where the gentleman saw the ladies bathing, and for that was turned into a stag and eaten by his own dogs. Well, that may be my fate, but I do not think it will be, because I am not at all likely to be spying about where I ought not to look, in the first place, and, in the second, I venture to think that the gentlemen with whom I am working are not in the least likely to eat me. I have had a little experience in parliamentary life, and I am happy to say that the gentlemen who work with me worked with me twenty years ago, and it has been my fortune to be connected with the side which was always able to maintain its true members. There are always floating members, or a Government would not be turned out; and I am not going to blame members who change their opinions—it is right they should do so if their conscience renders it necessary; but I say, if I were to change from Free-trade to Protection, from leaps and bounds of prosperity to larger taxation, to no retrenchment, to a scheme of no borrowing but carrying on our railways reasonably and encouraging local industries, and so reducing taxation,—I venture to say that if I made changes like that, from month to month, from one side to the other, those honourable members who have hitherto supported me would turn round and devour me, as the friends of the honourable gentleman have already eaten him. The honourable gentleman is very fond of telling the House that I have no idea of the state of the country, that I have lost all my power, and I do not know what else, and that the members opposite were afraid of me. It is a most confused statement; I have lost my power, have no idea of the state of the country, and yet the members opposite are afraid to speak. It seems very extraordinary. I think I have seen several honourable gentlemen who are not afraid to speak. I have yet to find who are those who are afraid to speak. The honourable member for Kumara is one on the other side with the honourable member for Christchurch North. They have constantly got up one after the other. All others may have deserted them, but there are still left the honourable member for Christchurch North and the honourable member for Kumara, and it is ridiculous for the honourable gentleman to say that the honourable member for Kumara is likely to be afraid to speak. But I think I can leave that part of the argument alone. It shows what straits the honourable gentleman has got to when he is obliged to talk such—as we should call it outside—nonsense; but I will not use the term, as it might be unparliamentary. I have notes of a great many other points on which I might dwell, but I will not trouble the House with them. As my speech has been broken up a little, I will summarise the position of the honourable gentleman—the extraordinary position which he has taken up. He is now posing as a patriot, as a constitutionalist, and as a person far above all the tactics of parliamentary life. But consider his position: he deliberately makes a most violent attack on me, not only as a member of the Government, but also as member for Egmont. He accuses me of having for a considerable time done nothing but spread distrust of him. I call upon any of my friends, I call upon any honourable member on the opposite side of the House, to say whether I have ever said an unkind word about the honourable gentleman since this Parliament was elected or before it. I have done quite the reverse. I have even offended my friends, and I think, reasonably, by the way I have acted towards him, and by the lenient way in which I have submitted to his actions. And yet the honourable gentleman, as I say, accuses me of having spread this distrust in him! If I were the person he describes me to be it would be possible for me to do so. I might have done it, but I did not think it right, in the state of the country or in the state of the honourable gentleman, to take any such action. But I felt that what the honourable gentleman desired—coalition—was impossible, and would be a great risk to the country. So much did I feel that that was the case that directly His Excellency did me the honour to send for me and asked me if I would undertake to form a Ministry, I told him then and there that it would be absolutely impossible that any coalition between myself and Sir Julius Vogel could be formed. In saying that, I treated him with the highest respect; and I told all my friends and all the honourable gentlemen who were returned to oppose the late Government the same thing; but I did not in any possible way or form, by act or word, attempt to produce distrust in the honourable gentleman. Well, Sir, he has been talking to us this afternoon about courtesy; and now look at the courtesy which he displays! He points to me and directs against me a speech of an hour's or an hour and a half's duration, in which he accuses me of all sorts of crimes and misdemeanours, and then he has the courtesy to walk out of the House. Is that parliamentary? I have no objection to his going out to represent the feelings of his party; but I tell him if he goes on as he is doing now his seat will be an empty one and his vote useless. If he desires to occupy that position it is not for me to object; but I venture to say that he will occupy it, if he goes on as he has done to-day. Then, as to his courage, he is afraid to remain here and hear what his opponents have to say. He pretends that it is on constitutional grounds that he walks out; but I ask him to consider the position of a distinguished member of the House who has a scheme to lift the colony out of its difficulties—a scheme totally different from that which he proposed in 1884—a scheme under which he is to carry on our railways reasonably, to reduce taxation, to give us a large share of retrenchment, to raise our local industries to a state of prosperity, and save us from borrowing in the London money-market for years;—I ask him to consider the position of an honourable member who has such a scheme in his breast, and yet—I will not say sneaks, but—marches out of the House and declines to produce this great scheme because he is afraid I should laugh it out of the House. That is the position taken up by an honourable gentleman who tells us that he came back three years ago not intending to remain here, but was persuaded to stay for a few months to get the colony out of its difficulties. Does this House believe it? Does the country believe it? The time is past for such idle boasting. If the honourable gentleman believes his own statement, and if his party believe it, they are bound to make the honourable gentleman bring down his scheme to-morrow, for it must be all out and dry; and I venture to say that if there is any honourable member here who has such a scheme the House will rise as one man and give effect to it. I would myself. I say that if the honourable member has any such scheme he is bound, in common honesty to his constituents, let alone any higher consideration, to bring forward that scheme. I venture to say that any man who professes to have such a scheme, and does not bring it down simply because I should laugh at him, is not a fit man to have a seat in this House; and I believe the country would say the same. I am sorry to have troubled the House at this length, but I was obliged to answer some of the statements of the honourable gentleman. And now, in conclusion, I ask that, having had this debate, if we may call it a debate—at any rate, after the vote; for we are to have a vote, I understand, as some honourable gentlemen will not follow the honourable member for Christchurch North out of the chamber—we shall address ourselves to the business now before us, namely, the necessary retrenchment measures. I am not one of those who say that this Parliament has not done any great work. In my opinion it has done a great work. It has displaced the late Government, and I hold that one of the greatest functions of Parliament is to select a fit and proper Government, and to keep them on these benches; and if Parliament does that it can never be said that the session has been wasted. The government of the country by efficient Ministers is of first-rate importance, far more important, in my opinion, than a large portion of the legislation which takes place in this House.

GOVERNOR'S SALARY AND ALLOWANCES BILL.

Major ATKINSON.—Sir, in moving the second reading of this Bill, the House will not expect a lengthy speech from me. But I should like to anticipate what I suppose will be the chief objection to it—namely, that by reducing the salary of the Governor we shall lose standing with the Home Government. All the colonies having Governors with a salary of £5,000 a year are classed as first-class colonies, and are supposed, therefore, to receive most experienced and competent Governors; and there is no doubt that it is very desirable that we should receive the most experienced men that we can get. But under the proposal of the Government we shall still retain our position, because the salary is to remain at what it is now—£5,000 a year. Some honourable gentlemen object that, if we keep the salary at £5,000, and do not make any provision for allowance specially, the Governor may not consider it his duty to travel. At present, as honourable gentlemen are aware, the salary is £5,000, and the Governor receives £1,000 a year for travelling allowances, and £1,500 a year for the maintenance of what is called his “establishment;” out of which he has to pay the Clerk to the Executive Council, besides his Aide-de-camp and his Private Secretary. The Government had this matter under consideration, and at first they were disposed to make an allowance for what is termed establishment and travelling allowances, and reduce the salary, they being of opinion that the total cost to the colony of a Governor and establishment and travelling should not exceed £5,000. But, upon considering the matter and looking at the precedent of Tasmania, it was determined that we should get what we want—that is, a reduction of £2,500 a year from the present cost of the Governor and establishment—and that we should get that by taking the salary at £5,000, as is done in Tasmania, and saying that that includes travelling expenses and the allowance for the Governor's establishment. The objection that we shall not get a first-class Governor has fallen to the ground, as we shall retain the salary at the amount which keeps us at the Colonial Office as a first-class colony. But I would go further and say that, looking at the present position of affairs, it would be far better to be classed as second-class or any other class, so far as the Governor is concerned, as long as we show to the world that we mean to pay our way. That seems to be our first duty, and I believe there is a determination on the part of the people of the colony to do that. Still, it seems desirable to the Government to submit the Bill as we have done; for I do not think that, in the present position of the colony, it matters much whether we are classed as a first-class colony or not. In the early days it did matter, because our means of communication with the Home country was practically only through our Governor; but since then the colonies have become established, and we communicate, as it were, direct, and not through the Governor, and are heard in a way that we were not heard before. But, as I say, our first duty is to look to ourselves, and to say what we can afford to pay; and, looking at the necessity for retrenchment, and the desire that exists to return to a more simple mode of life, I venture to say that £5,000 a year is ample for all the services of the Governor, including the allowance for travelling and for establishment. That being so, the Government have fixed the amount I have named.

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—This is a Bill with the general principles of which, I fancy, the House will agree. But there are two or three points which will require consideration, and I would direct the Premier's attention to the provisions of section 10 of "The Governor's Salary and Allowances Act, 1873." As I understand that Act, if the Governor absents himself from the colony the person administering the colony—that is, his locum tenens—is entitled to half salary. Section 10 provides that "the officer so administering the Government shall be entitled to the full establishment allowance to the Governor, and to the full travelling allowance, if money is available for travelling-expenses." Now, the point is this: What is the position of the person administering the government of the colony during the absence of the Governor? Is he to receive half salary plus the travelling-allowance, and the other allowances provided by section 10? Under the provisions of the Act it seems to me that a person occupying the position of Governor would get his full pay of £5,000, and also his proportionate part of the travelling-allowance and establishment-allowance, within the meaning of this section. I do not know whether that is the meaning of this Bill; but, it seems to me that, as it is at present drawn, it would entitle the locum tenens of the Governor not only to half-pay, but to travelling and establishment-allowance. I think the Premier should look into this. I have only had an opportunity of looking somewhat hurriedly through the Bill, but I think there is a serious doubt concerning the matter; and not only is there a doubt, but, so far as I can see, if the Bill passed as at present it would entitle the party administering the government to be in a better position than the Governor himself. The other provisions of the Bill seem to be very much in accord with the general opinion throughout the colony as expressed during the general election, that the salary of the Governor should be reduced.

Major Atkinson

Mr. SEDDON.—With some diffidence, I ask the Premier whether he will accept an amendment to the effect that all the words after "That" be omitted, with a view to inserting the following: "the debate on this Bill be adjourned until some conclusion has been arrived at upon the financial proposals of the Government." I scarcely think it is a usual custom to go on with the details of Bills whilst no opinion has been expressed by the House itself upon the proposals as a whole. It is rather an unusual course that is proposed, and perhaps some explanation might be given. As that may be so, I will refrain from moving my amendment till I have that explanation. I do think it would be more regular, more convenient, and in every way preferable for us to conclude the debate on the financial proposals of the Government before discussing the details of the Bills. Perhaps the explanation that may be given will prevent the necessity for my moving the amendment. Will the honourable gentleman give his explanation?

Major ATKINSON.—I should be very glad to do it, but I should be out of order.

Mr. SEDDON.—The explanation might prevent my moving an amendment.

Major ATKINSON.—I have no objection to give it at all; but to give the reasons might introduce debatable matter. The Government brought on the Bills because the Opposition declared that they wanted details of the scheme, and that there was nothing in the Financial Statement to discuss. That statement was made by the leader of the Opposition the other day. Then, again, the session is drawing on, and the debate on the Financial Statement seems to have died a natural death; and it is desirable that some of the measures of the Government should be got into another place as soon as possible, so that they should not be hurried at the end of the session. Therefore, looking at the whole position, the Government thought the House had better discuss these particular matters upon the Bills; and it is the intention of the Government to move all these Bills forward before they bring the Financial Statement up again, because they think that will be most convenient.

Mr. SEDDON.—Then I move the amendment which I notified my intention of moving, That the debate upon this Bill be adjourned until the financial proposals of the Government have been dealt with. After such a motion as has just been carried, I should have thought the Premier would have moved the postponement of all the other orders of the day so as to bring up Supply. The passing of that motion by forty-four votes to four should have given him heart and courage, having proved to him that he has a majority in the House; but it appears that he is afraid of taking a direct issue upon his financial proposals. How can the honourable gentleman say that the debate on the Financial Statement has died a natural death, when he knows that he and those who follow him have strangled it, and time after time have drawn red-herrings across the scent in order to prevent the House and the country from intelligently dealing with the proposals of the Government? I put it fairly to the House, What has the Opposition contended for? What we have contended for is that we have a right to have the details before us. The honourable gentleman surely does not mean to say that he thinks the intelligence of New Zealand is to be so blinded as to believe that showing a proposal to take off £2,500 a year from the salary of the Governor is giving details of the financial proposals of the Government. Does the Premier suppose for a moment that, because he holds himself cheap, and does not consider those with him on the Government benches worth more than £800 a year, that is giving details of the financial proposals?—and that is what the country requires some enlightenment upon. When the honourable gentleman had far less experience than he has now—when, I believe, he was not as fit to hold the position as he is now—I heard the honourable gentleman tell the House and the colony that it was impossible for any Minister of the Crown to live in Wellington and do justice to his position and to himself upon less than £1,000 a year. What has caused the change since then, that he should bring down this proposal to make the salary £800?

Major ATKINSON.—I rise to a point of order. The honourable gentleman is discussing the next Bill on the Order Paper. I think he should confine himself to the Governor's Salary Bill.

Mr. SEDDON.—The amendment I have moved deals with the financial proposals as a whole; and I am simply discussing what is contained in the financial proposals of the Government. If the Premier says the point of order is that the financial proposals do not embrace the question of the reduction of Ministers' salaries, then, of course, it is good; but my remarks referred to the financial proposals, and not directly to the Bill the Hon. the Premier has just now referred to. I will take your ruling, Sir, on the point.

Mr. SPEAKER.—You are not out of order.

Mr. SEDDON.—I think the Premier might with profit take a lesson or two on parliamentary procedure: he would then refrain from raising frivolous points of order. He must for the moment have begun to think that he was still speaking to empty benches. The point at issue, and one that I and the country require further information upon, is not contained in the Order Paper at all. I say, without hesitation, that the country is not enlightened at all upon the proposals contained in the Financial Statement, and it is very unfair, under existing circumstances, for the Government to bring on these measures without putting the financial proposals before us. I should like to know if the Premier will tell the House—it may or may not be so—what bearing the Land Bill has on the financial proposals of the Government, with the exception of saving the expenses of members of Land Boards. I know positively there are a large number of members in this House who have speeches prepared dealing particularly with the proposals as a whole; and if honourable members are forced to debate each item Bill by Bill it simply means burking a fair and free discussion upon the financial proposals. I am inclined to believe that it is done with a purpose, because on the first occasion when honourable members were paying attention to finance and the proposals of the Government we find the Government diverting honourable members' attention away from that subject by introducing the East and West Coast Railway proposition. That took some time, and took honourable members' attention away. That is precisely the custom which the present leader of the House has always adopted. Whenever a debate waxed warm, and when he finds a few of his supporters acting the part of the candid friend, and taking the part that the honourable member for Thorndon has done, who talked to him as a candid friend—so soon as he finds a debate drifting into that channel, so soon does the Premier change altogether the course of events. That is what he is doing now, and he is doing this wilfully, knowingly—I will not say maliciously. He calls upon the House, coolly and calmly, to go on with the Order Paper, such as we have to-night, and to leave alone the proposals of the Government, telling us that it is the wish of honourable members that these proposals should not be longer debated. It would facilitate business if the Premier would agree to postpone the orders of the day, and call on Supply, so as to get the financial proposals debated and concluded. We shall then have a clear Order Paper, and go on with the business in a way that, to my mind, would be beneficial to the colony. I hope I shall not provoke the Premier to follow the same course he took the other day with the honourable member for Christchurch North, and accept a proposal of this kind as a vote of no confidence.

Major ATKINSON.—Indeed I shall not.

Mr. SEDDON.—I felt positive that would have been the case, or I would not have moved the amendment. I think that one no-confidence debate each day will be quite sufficient. To have two on one evening would be rather too much of a good thing, and I know it is upon that ground the Premier has not accepted the challenge in that light. With a view of testing the feeling of the House, I beg to move, as an amendment, That this debate be adjourned until the financial proposals as a whole have been dealt with.

Mr. FISHER.—I would point out that this is the case of the drummer-boy over again—hit high, hit low, there is no pleasing these honourable gentlemen. When there were no Bills before them they said, "Here we are again waiting, and no business to be done." Now that we bring down our Bills to be pushed forward a stage the honourable gentleman says he would prefer not to have the Bills,—he would rather go on with the financial debate. This may appear to be very ingenious, and I readily grant that the honourable gentleman is a little adroit in his manner of doing it; but I think the House ought to have clearly placed before it what his drift, aim, and object are. Now, it is clear that the object of the honourable gentleman is not to discuss the business of the Government, nor is it his object to get before the House the Government measures. There are certain other Bills on the Order Paper which the honourable gentleman knows will come forward in due course; and it is his aim, by the tactics he is adopting, to prevent these Bills from coming forward and being dealt with this session, if possible. I should like the honourable gentleman not to suppose that he is playing this game so ingeniously that we do not know what his game is; and, having let him know thoroughly well that we are quite aware of what he is doing, we shall be satisfied if the House allows him to proceed in his own particular way. What is the duration of a day, and what is involved in the loss of a day? Let me tell the taxpayer, in whose interest the honourable gentleman is so completely absorbed, what a day's proceedings in this House costs. To begin with, the sitting of Parliament costs £400 a day. Then, the retrenchments which the Government propose to carry out will amount to £600 a day. So that each day needlessly wasted costs the country £1,000. Now, the average duration of a day's work in this House is eight hours; and if the honourable gentleman takes up half an hour's discussion upon this Bill, an hour's discussion on another, half an hour upon another, and an hour on another, he himself has consumed three hours out of the day of eight hours; and it does not take any great arithmetical power to be able to tell how much of the time of the House one honourable member may absorb during a session. The honourable member has his little speech on this Bill—not that he is the least interested in it—and he has his little speech on another, and when he comes to a Bill in which he shows great anxiety he has a speech of perhaps an hour—and we are told, on the authority of the honourable member for Dunedin South, that the man who cannot speak for an hour has no capacity or ability. I am not now discussing this Bill, but I want to point out to the House what the tactics of certain honourable gentlemen are. The object is as clear as possible to those who will take the trouble to penetrate beneath the surface: it is to stave off certain Bills which have not yet come forward; and perhaps it is as well that we should have a plain understanding upon that point on both sides. Those Bills are going to be pushed through, no matter how long the session lasts, and the honourable gentleman will gain nothing by temporarily staving them off. This Bill is simple enough. I merely wish to point out how impossible it is to satisfy the honourable gentleman in particular: I will not single out any others. But when there are no Government Bills before the House the great contention is that the House is wasting its time because there is no Government business before it. Now, here is Government business, and the honourable gentleman is not satisfied because he wants a discussion which is really dead and gone to go on in place of these Bills. I say this to show how impossible it is to satisfy certain honourable gentlemen on that side of the House. As to these Bills which we have pledged ourselves to get through, they will be got through this session, and no attempt to stave off discussion on these Bills is likely to succeed. I hope the honourable gentleman, when he comes to discuss the proposals of the Government, will take into consideration that we are not to be put aside in that particular way; and, above all, let him understand that we fully understand what he is driving at.

Sir G. GREY.—Sir, this being the first time I have had an opportunity of speaking since the Premier made an appeal to me, I think I ought to answer that appeal. He stated that no one knew better than myself that there was no anxiety on his part to assume his present position if any person could be found to satisfy the House better. He is perfectly right in that. Nothing could be more disinterested than his conduct was on that occasion, and I am glad to be able to say so when appealed to on the point. But, nevertheless, Sir, I think at the present moment the Government are going a little wrong. The last speaker said that the financial question was dead and gone—there was an end of it.

Mr. FISHER.—Not of the question, but the financial debate.

Sir G. GREY.—Well, the financial debate is dead and gone. I think that is one of the most extraordinary statements I ever heard. Why, there are several of us who have not had an opportunity of saying a word. I tried to get up once or twice, but did not succeed; and why am I to be told that the thing is dead and gone? If the honourable member for Kumara had not moved in this I intended, when the next Bill—the Ministers' Salaries Bill—came on, to point out that before dealing with that measure it was necessary the financial debate should be concluded. The Premier will excuse me, but I must testify to the House that upon several occasions in several sessions myself and another Auckland member (Mr. Reader Wood) have tried in vain to be heard upon the financial question, and we have utterly failed. The Premier has managed to keep us from bringing before the country our views on the financial position of the country. I do not mean to say these were the intended tactics on the present occasion, but I was sorry when I found the honourable member for Kumara raise the question in the manner he did, because my firm belief was that if I appealed to the Premier, when the question of Ministerial salaries came up, to allow us an opportunity of having the financial debate finished, he would be obliged to give us that opportunity. I believed he would acquiesce in that; and I hope he will do so still. To some extent I was afraid that the motion might perhaps be defeated, and that a debate would not be allowed to take place. Then I do not know exactly what would be our position, for I felt that when the Ministers' Salaries Bill did come on I could bring the question of finance up in spite of the Government. I could raise the whole financial question and make a financial speech, and those who chose to follow me would be able to do so too. I still do hope that the Government will allow the financial debate to be resumed before the second Bill on the Order Paper comes on, and that an opportunity will be given to those who have not yet spoken on that motion to give their opinions regarding what the Government propose. I believe I could show that their financial proposals are by no means adequate to the occasion; that much larger reductions might be made on a permanent basis; and I think I ought to have an opportunity of being heard by the House on that subject. I still trust that when the next Bill comes on we shall be allowed to debate the subject. And I can assure the honourable member who spoke last that, as far as I am concerned, I have no wish to keep any measure back—no such idea ever entered my mind; and if the honourable member for Kumara is in possession of some information respecting Bills to be introduced, and is determined to do what he can to prevent their being brought in, I know nothing about it; but I intended to enter on the financial debate with a true desire of influencing the Government to adopt my views, and to set before the country a better policy than they wish the House to adopt. I think the Government would be inclined to coincide with some of my recommendations. If this motion is not pressed to a division I will, when the next Bill is moved, go into the financial question as concerned in that; and I do not think it will be in the power of the Government to stop me. If we have not some special power to compel it, I think the opportunity ought to be given to us to resume the most important debate of the session.

Sir J. VOGEL.—I wish first to refer to a remark, or, rather, a series of remarks, which I understand were made by the Premier this afternoon.

Major ATKINSON.—Sir, I rise to a point of order. The honourable gentleman did not choose to be present, and that debate has closed, and I submit it is not competent for him to reopen it.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Clearly, it is out of order for the honourable gentleman to refer to a previous debate.

Sir J. VOGEL.—The honourable member for Auckland Central was allowed just now to refer to something the Premier said this afternoon; and why should I be debarred?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honourable member for Auckland Central was appealed to by the Premier to corroborate a statement, and was permitted to make an explanation on the subject. The honourable gentleman would be quite out of order in reopening a closed debate. If the honourable gentleman has a personal explanation which he wishes to make, no doubt the House will allow him to make it.

Sir J. VOGEL.—I do not wish to make an explanation now; but, as the honourable member for Auckland Central was allowed just now to refer to the debate this afternoon, I do not see why I should not too.

Mr. SPEAKER.—He only referred to an appeal made to him by the Premier, outside the subject of the debate, as to something which took place when the Ministry was formed. The honourable member may make a personal explanation, by the indulgence of the House.

Sir J. VOGEL.—Sir, can I speak on the subject on a motion to adjourn the House?

Mr. SPEAKER.—I cannot receive a motion to adjourn the House while there is a motion before the House to adjourn the debate.

Sir J. VOGEL.—Then, Sir, I will move the adjournment of the House presently; but I think that, as the honourable member for Auckland Central was allowed to refer to a previous debate, the same permission should be accorded to me. I wish to make a personal explanation.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I have already informed the honourable gentleman that he can make a personal explanation if he wishes to do so. The House is always willing to extend that indulgence to an honourable member on reasonable grounds being given.

Sir J. VOGEL.—Then, Sir, I will say what I wish under the guise of a personal explanation. I am informed that the Premier has stated that I have endeavoured in various ways to effect a coalition with him. I wish to state that the honourable gentleman is entirely mistaken—to put it as emphatically as you, Sir, will allow me to do. I have not made overtures to him myself—the honourable gentleman cannot say that I have; and if any one has led him to suppose that I have authorised any person to make such overtures he is mistaken entirely. I have given no one authority to make overtures to that effect. When I ceased to hold office under my late regretted colleague, Sir Robert Stout, I made up my mind not to hold office in New Zealand again except as Premier. That there ought to be a coalition Government now, a strong Government to suit the wants and requirements of the colony, I have stated over and over again in this House. I have also stated that it need not necessarily include—more than that, I may say I think it should not include—the head of the present Government. As to the subject at this moment under consideration, I am going, as I said this afternoon, to assist the Government in getting through their business quickly; and, after my having said that this afternoon, I feel bound to remark on the unwisdom, if not the impropriety, of the remarks of the honourable member for Wellington East addressed to the honourable member for Kumara, telling him in so many words that he occupied an undue amount of the time of the House in trying to show how great were his services to the colony. Does the honourable gentleman suppose that such remarks can have any other effect than to cause the honourable member for Kumara to speak as an assertion of his right not to be addressed in that manner? The honourable member for Kumara, or any other honourable member, has a full right to express his views to this House, and it is a great impropriety in any member of the Government to speak in such a recriminatory manner as the honourable member for Wellington East has done. That is not the way to expedite the business of the House. There is a general desire on the part of honourable members to expedite the business of the House; but it will not be expedited by the honourable member for Wellington East attributing motives, and saying honourable members are wasting time in order to delay business until more Bills are brought on. The honourable gentleman says that without a shadow of justification. I have stated that I am of opinion that honourable members on this side of the House are now as anxious to expedite business as they can be; but they will not allow measures to pass through without opposing those they think they should oppose. Therefore I venture, in all humility, to tender a word of advice to the honourable gentleman at the head of the Government. The difficulty which the House has got into throughout the session has arisen through his not taking the financial debate right through from day to day; and, Sir, as long as that debate is left open he will encounter what he is encountering now. No matter what is the desire of the honourable gentlemen to expedite business, he cannot avoid—I say it subject to your ruling, Sir—it being an obvious fact that all these Bills are mentioned in the Financial Statement—I say in those circumstances he cannot prevent honourable members talking all round the Financial Statement on each of these Bills. If the honourable gentleman wants to see the business put through quickly he will take my advice and, as soon as this Bill is disposed of—no doubt the honourable member for Kumara would, on receiving an assurance from the Premier, withdraw his amendment—allow the Financial Statement to be resumed. There are a number of honourable members who have prepared with great care speeches on the Financial Statement, and their utterances are of importance to this House and to the country. The honourable member for Wellington East smiles that sort of smile which means that he does not believe anybody's speech in the House is worth listening to. That is not the general opinion, and I could name honourable members on both sides of the House who have not spoken in the financial debate, and whose utterances are looked forward to with great anxiety by many other honourable members on both sides of the House. Now, as regards that financial debate, there has been no undue absorption of the discussion by honourable members on this side of the House. I believe I am correct in saying that nearly member for member has been put up during the debate, except on one or two occasions, when several honourable members on the Government side spoke in succession. I think the easiest course, and the one that would most promote the despatch of business, would be to allow the financial debate to be resumed and finished as soon as possible—as soon as we have disposed of this stage of the Bill before us. Regarding the measure itself, I may say that it is my intention to vote for its second reading; but I shall strongly urge upon the Premier to alter it in Committee. If it passes as it is now, it will be no measure of retrenchment or economy at all. I know, by what absolutely took place in former years, that if you fix the salary of the Governor at the amount fixed here, and with no specific amount for travelling-expenses, you will not only find the total expenditure to be much larger, but the House will be constantly troubled with the most disagreeable discussions concerning the Queen's representative. With the Bill passed as it is now, when the Governor wants to go away from Wellington to some other part of the colony for a time, he will ask if the Government are prepared to pay his expenses, saying that otherwise he cannot stay at Dunedin, Christchurch, or Auckland. What occurred before will occur again. My advice is, to reduce the salary by £1,000, and put on £1,000 for travelling-expenses separately. The allowances to the staff would then come out of the £4,000, and the colony would, as proposed by this Bill, pay the salary of the Clerk of the Executive Council. As against that argument I understand the Premier urges that a salary of £5,000 carries a right to a first-class pension; and therefore the colony would be entitled to a first-class Governor. Now, gentlemen who come out to the colony to undertake the charge of the government look very keenly after the question of what are the emoluments. I am not speaking without book: it is a regular profession like the diplomatic service, the profession of the English Colonial Department, and there are regular rises in it which are looked forward to with as much anxiety as rises in other departments. If you therefore make it nominally a first-class Governorship with a salary of £5,000, and no additions, you will make it an unprofitable Governorship. The result will simply be this: New Zealand will be used as a colony for working off what I may call the "dead horses." There are always some Governors who have outlived their usefulness, or who have made mistakes and are removed from important Governorships, and whom it is difficult to know what to do with, because it would be too severe a punishment to send them to inferior Governorships and so reduce their pensions. Now, if you make this an unprofitable Governorship, these "dead horses"—I speak with no disrespect, I hope—would be the gentlemen appointed to New Zealand. It would be far better to have the young vigorous man who is working his way up in the Colonial Department, and who would be glad to come here, and would be very careful to do all he ought to do, because of being on his way to promotion. It would be far better to have such gentlemen at a thousand a year less salary, and a specified sum for travelling, than to have a gentleman of the class I have referred to trying to work out two or three years more until he would be entitled to claim his pension. And then, in any case, there would be a constant encroachment on the good-nature of the Government to find the means for travelling-expenses unless a specific sum were set apart for that; and I strongly recommend the honourable gentleman to adopt the proposal of making the salary £4,000 with a travelling-allowance of £1,000. That is a question which can be discussed in Committee; meanwhile I shall have pleasure in supporting the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. SEDDON.—I ask leave to withdraw my amendment, especially after the reference of the honourable member for Auckland Central; and I also personally give this assurance to the House: that the remarks of the Minister of Education, to the effect that my amendment was made to prevent other Bills from coming on, were entirely without foundation. I have not consulted with any member of the House as to my moving an amendment, and I think it is the duty of the honourable gentleman to apologize to me for making such an unwarrantable and uncalled-for statement.

Mr. FISH.—I cannot refrain from expressing my surprise at the way in which the honourable member for Kumara was treated by the Minister of Education. The honourable gentleman's remarks were out of place altogether. If he thinks that he can frighten members of the House into keeping their tongues quiet, he has made a great mistake. When he referred to the great waste caused—the cost of the House being £400 a day—he must surely have forgotten the fact that so much time has been wasted by the way the Government have conducted the business since the adjournment. How much was lost by a discussion a short time ago! and how much was lost by the adjournment of the House for a long period!

Sir G. GREY.—I imagine this is a Bill relating to the finances of the country, and, being part of the Financial Statement, it will be in my power to discuss the whole subject. It may as well, perhaps, be done upon this Bill as upon any other. Really the fixing of any one of these salaries involves the whole question of the finances. The proposed reduction of the Governor's salary arises from the circumstances in which the colony is plunged; and the question is, How are we to retrieve the colony, to free it from the position of difficulty in which it is now placed? I must candidly say, in reference to that, I do not think all the blame rests upon the late Government or, really, upon several Governments, but I think I must candidly say, in looking at the salaries, that the honourable member for Egmont is as much to blame as any other person for what has taken place—in fact, I think more largely than any other man in New Zealand. I think I can make that perfectly clear to the House, and that I can do it in such a manner that I can lead the House to avoid the errors into which I think he has fallen. First, I will say that I believe a perfect financial settlement of New Zealand can only be achieved by dealing with all classes of the entire community, and I believe that the class we first of all have to deal with and specially to consider is the agricultural population of this country. I would call to the mind of honourable gentlemen here present, some of whom must recollect it, and I appeal to the honourable member for Egmont himself, who will also bear me out—I am satisfied in this: that upon this subject I several years ago earnestly besought the Government of the day, which included the present Premier, to think of the wretched position in which the farming classes were getting placed. I pointed out then especially the case of the deferred-payment settlers, and of other people who had been located on the land under somewhat similar arrangements, and I contended that it was absolutely necessary to pass a law by which their position should be fairly considered by a Court constituted for that purpose. I pointed out how the Court should be composed, what the duties of the Court should be—that every individual should have the power of bringing before the Court the amount of rent he was compelled to pay to the Government and the charges levied upon his land, and that the Court should have the power of determining whether those charges were just or not; that, if the Court found that they were oppressive and must end in the ruin of the individual ultimately, the Court should have the power of adjusting the rent and the charges to what would be called perfectly fair terms, just to the Government and just to the individual. For proposing so just a measure harsh language was used towards me. I have made a few extracts of what was said. I was told, if the Bill was passed the Government would be continually in hot water, that it was a great temptation to the people to repudiate their engagements, that that was the true purpose of the Bill, that the spirit of self-reliance was to be broken down in the people of this country, that the Bill would break it down altogether.

Major ATKINSON.—What year was this?

Sir G. GREY.—It was spoken on the 6th July, 1882. I was told that the Bill was totally unworthy of my high reputation; that it would tempt men to be dishonest, and to fall into bad practices. The present Premier on that occasion told the House he was satisfied that the remedy contained in the Bill would not be adopted by the House, and that the honourable member for Timaru was, in point of fact, right in the accusations he had made against me on the subject. The result was that the Bill was rejected, and the further result was that hundreds of families have been plunged in misery from that time to the present date. I have heard from many of them that for months together they have not known a night's rest or peace. Burdens were laid upon them they were quite incompetent to bear. This session I brought forward a Bill for the same purpose. I was encouraged to do so by recollecting that there is one honourable gentleman here now who then said that the honourable member for Auckland East had often brought forward Bills in the House which had been opposed in equally violent language, and which the Government, some year or two afterwards, or some time afterwards, were compelled to adopt and make their own—in fact, to filch them away from myself, who had brought them forward in the first instance. In preparing a Bill this session for the same purpose, so completely was the subject impressed upon my mind that I drew it in the very same words I had used in the former Bill. The Bill is in operation in Ireland. In fact, my first Bill was in part drawn from a Bill then in operation in Ireland, but which measure I made suitable to New Zealand; and the remedy I then recommended is being adopted in many civilised countries throughout the world. I feel confident that the Premier himself approved of the measure I have brought forward now, and must know that in keeping the country from the benefit of the measure for so many years he himself is greatly responsible for the difficulties in which the agricultural interests are at present involved. Therefore I do not think all the blame for the present depressed state of the colony is to be thrown on the honourable member for Christchurch North, or upon any other persons who have held office in this country. In 1877, ten years ago, I got a colleague to bring forward a Bill for reducing the salaries of Ministers, and I then laid much stress upon it. It is a singular thing that it was on the 29th November, 1877, and I am now speaking at the very close of the 28th November, 1887. It was exactly ten years ago. I had a Bill then brought forward for reducing the salaries of Ministers. The present Premier defeated it in spite of all that I could do. This identical Bill that he himself has brought forward, with the trifling exception that his salaries are rather lower for some Ministers, is the very Bill I brought forward ten years ago, and which he then declared was not suited to the circumstances of the colony. I then used this language to him. I said, "What we feel and what we sincerely believe is this: that at the present time you are founding the local bodies all through the colony, and that whatever example you set to them, either of prudence and economy or extravagance, they will certainly follow, and that the example being set in the salaries being given to Ministers is an example of extravagance." He then had the choice put before him of setting an example of economy to all the local bodies about to be formed; and I believe that if that example had been set New Zealand would now be in a very different position. I said that a system of gross extravagance was growing up in this country—a system of extravagance in the Government, and which would spread, as it has done, from the General Government to other bodies in the country. I said, "The Government has an opportunity to say to the inhabitants that, in its opinion, the Government should be prudent. If the Government is thoroughly extravagant, and if the Government considers that high salaries are necessary for the maintenance of the Government, it is quite certain that the local bodies now constituted will follow the example set by the General Government, and a system of extravagance will be established throughout the colony." That was my prophecy at the time. I ask, has not that been carried out? Does it not appear almost as a judgment that ten years ago, all but one day, I should have said that; that these difficulties should have arisen; and that the Prime Minister who at that time defeated the proposal is the same individual who is now trying to get the Bill passed?

Major ATKINSON.—I think you were Premier on the 28th November, 1877.

Sir G. GREY.—I was Premier then, but you led a powerful Opposition; and I shall go on to show on some of these things you defeated me, and stopped the thing altogether. If I recollect rightly, this Bill got into Committee—that can be easily ascertained—and I think that when I moved that we go into Committee on the Bill it was by your casting-vote, Sir, that we got into Committee. You said you felt bound to give your vote in favour of economy. The present Premier then moved that the Chairman do leave the chair, and at last managed to carry that by a majority of one, and the measure consequently was lost. And now, at the end of ten years, I stand here and say, when he accuses all others of having encouraged extravagance, he was one of the men who did not seek to prevent it, but forced it on the colony. Ten years have elapsed since that time—there is only one day wanting—when he himself is obliged to bring forward the measure he then prevented me from carrying to save New Zealand from these difficulties, which have prevented me from saving the agriculturists of New Zealand from the penury into which they are now plunged, and from the debts which encumber them. The other night he might have rescued the Bills I had in hand to succour the agricultural population, and they might have been the law of the land. He prevented that from being done, to my sorrow, and he has left New Zealand in the position it now occupies. I was anxious to say these things on behalf of other men, to show that he is not the one saviour of the country, that he is the man who has plunged us into these difficulties, because, in my opinion, he has been the guiding genius which has mostly led New Zealand into the difficulties in which it is now involved. The next thing I shall look at, passing from the salary of the Governor and those of the Ministers, is this question: Are the proposals of the Government for reductions such as a statesman ought to make? Is there anything of permanence about them? We cannot exactly tell; but certainly no proposition of that kind has been made to us. Why should the Government hesitate to allow us to debate the whole subject? We have been told distinctly that we shall not be allowed to go into it. Why could he not have stood up in the House, as I stand up now, and have sketched out one general plan which all could understand? I will ask this: When has such an opportunity presented itself as the present one, when the whole colony is bent upon doing something to ameliorate its condition permanently, when a Minister can do almost what he likes with the people and with the departments, when the plastic clay is placed in his hands which he has to mould either into some permanent statue to last for all time, or else into some half-formed creature whose purport none can make out? Which is the proper course for him to pursue in these two cases? I say this: that he has proposed to create a being which none of us exactly understands, of the purport of or the use of which we can tell nothing; that he is going to leave a mass of excrescences on the form before he has completed it. Let us now refer to the Insurance Department. Has he touched that, or has he proposed to touch it? And yet it is a subject of vast importance. Is it right that in that department—

Major ATKINSON.—May I say that I propose to deal with that subject when the estimates come down? It is not a part of the general revenue of the colony, and therefore is not dealt with in the Financial Statement; but I had intended to touch upon it.

Sir G. GREY.—It is a pity the honourable gentleman did not mention that in his speech. Until I mentioned it I heard nothing about it. The honourable gentleman may laugh; but I say it is a strange thing that, in mentioning all things, the most important matter of all was never even glanced at. Where is his plan? The House will not be deluded in that manner. I say it is wrong that great salaries should be given in that department, equal to those of Ministers of the Crown.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Greater.

Sir G. GREY.—They are greater.

Major ATKINSON.—They must be greater.

Sir G. GREY.—There is the voice, "They must be greater." Why? For what reason? Because other insurance bodies give greater sums. But why should our officers in our Insurance Department be paid any more than our officers in other departments? Why should a friend of the Minister, without any previous experience of the subject, at once have £1,000 a year given to him? Is that just to the nation or to the Civil Service? I say that it is our business, for the sake of those of our countrymen who insure their lives in the department, that the salaries of officers in these institutions should be kept to the level of the Civil Service, and that as large an amount as possible should be gained for those who insure in their national office.

Major ATKINSON.—You gave £1,000 a year.

Sir G. GREY.—I did not give £1,000 a year. I strove for less, as the honourable gentleman knows. It was the honourable gentleman who gave the full £800. I refused to consent to it. The honourable gentleman did it: that was the example set. I contend that the department ought to be made a portion of the Civil Service, exactly as any other branch of the Civil Service, and not a separate department; and in that way you will open new offices and new objects to your Civil Service, and give the officers a spirit they have not now got, because the introduction of strangers into this department and the neglect of just claims must have the effect of lowering the Civil servants in their self-respect. Then, I ask you about your Legislative Department. Why should that be a separate department? Is that right? Why are strangers to be introduced into the Legislative Department? Why should not that department be under the same government as any other department? I say that the inevitable result of separating your departments in this way will be to make them small family appanages, instead of being for the common good of all. In the Justice Department, why not open that, like the East India Company's service, to the whole of the Service? Train some of them, take out of some other branch of the Civil Service deserving men fitted for it, and give them the chance of rising to the highest position in the law in that way. Then, again, the Public Trust Office should be a department of the Service above all others, I think, and that will give openings in many parts of the colony, and prevent agents being appointed to most responsible positions who, I fear, must be unknown to the very persons who appoint them. And I would open all other departments in the same way. I appeal to the House whether the Government has proposed to rearrange the Civil Service in that way, and to make it really an object of pride and satisfaction to the country that they have so great a Civil Service as it will become. Then you will imbue men with some respect for the position they occupy, and, instead of depressing them by seeing persons in other departments suddenly elevated to salaries greater than they can earn by years in the Civil Service at the present moment, by doing that you would give them fresh courage; you would, in fact, give them self-respect, which I do not believe they can now truly feel. And how much better would your affairs be administered! I ask if you want to look at the manner in which the accounts of the Insurance Department are administered at the present day. If they require insurance buildings, do they call for tenders for insurance sites? Is that done?

Major ATKINSON.—At present it would have to be voted by the House. You are thinking of when the Board was in existence.

Sir G. GREY.—I am thinking of when the Board was in existence; but I am not at all sure what will be done in the future—I only take what is past. Whether under the present system a different mode of obtaining sites will be followed I cannot tell.

Major ATKINSON.—Yes; they must come to the House.

Sir G. GREY.—Yes; they must come to the House for the money, I suppose. That may be the case. But I believe a great deal of laxity has been allowed to creep into that department which it would be hard now to sweep out from it. That is my conviction. I have seen notices in the newspapers of things done formerly—before the Board was constituted, I believe, or, at all events, very soon after, though I cannot recollect the dates; but I know they left a feeling of dissatisfaction on my mind which I cannot express as to the way in which the department was conducted in reference to things of that kind. I only appeal to honourable gentlemen as to whether any proposal for the amalgamation of offices has been made. Have the Government told us that they have ever thought of such a thing as this? I say they have done nothing of the kind. Then, I come again to another point; and I must say this: When I put down here this question of a reduction being made in the case of interest on Sinking Fund, I recollect some seven or eight years ago I brought before the House two propositions—one that the Sinking Fund should be taken; and that was scouted with scorn. Again, the same kind of language was used to me as had been used in reference to the deferred-payment settlers. The proposals I made were rejected; and yet what has since then taken place? After several years, that was done in reference to the Sinking Fund which I had sought to have done, and was told that I was not an honest man to propose it, or words to that purport. Then, further, I at the same time showed that this colony was entitled, as I believe, by law, and ought to have enforced its power, to make all persons drawing funds from New Zealand pay, under the property-tax, the same amount as persons resident in New Zealand have to pay. I showed, in point of fact, that the law required that to be done; and I am still of the same opinion. I showed that it was hard in the extreme that those residing out of New Zealand, and who were deriving such advantages from the interest they drew from it, should not have to pay such tax, while those who resided here had to pay it. That was a manifest injustice. Everybody who resided in New Zealand and drew money from the Government, and everybody out of New Zealand who drew money from the Government, were all bound to pay under the property-tax. The language of the Act is precise. It says that the word "property" is to mean property of every kind and description whatever; and I say that since I raised this question upwards of a million has been unlawfully taken out of the pockets of the colonists—one million more than was necessary has been added to their debt. As to this, a position has been taken up by some that is inconceivable to me. The question is raised whether a gentleman having a considerable pension from New Zealand has to pay the property-tax, and the answer made is this: "The State contracted to pay him so much a year if he remained so long in the Service; and therefore if you take anything from that amount you cheat him and do him a wrong by giving him less than you promised him." The fact is that every nation interprets the matter in this way: They say to the person to whom they are going to pay the pension, "I have the money ready to give you, and it is your property, and, like every other person, you will have to pay the property-tax, and contribute your fair share to the necessities of the country. You were not promised any exemption from taxation." This is the rule. In the same way, every nation now, at the present time, I believe, deducts from those who draw revenues from the public securities exactly the same proportion that it deducts from the inhabitants of the country who pay the sums from which these revenues are derived by other persons. Why should we alone be subjected to this: that we do not get from those who receive money from us that which every other nation gets from those who receive money from that nation? It is quite clear that the moment the money is handed over to the Treasury from our pockets to pay gentlemen so much, it is property in the colony which is subject to property-tax. The moment it is so paid to your own citizens living here, you tell them it is property which must pay property-tax; and why is the non-resident entitled to an advantage which you take from the residents in the colony, who benefit you by spending the money here which they draw from you? It is eminently unjust. People say this: that those who would have to pay these amounts would object, and that they would think they were treated unfairly; but I believe the direct contrary. What is the sum they would have to pay? Take the case of a man who gets £100 a year remitted to him from this country. He would have to pay 8s. 3d. or 8s. 4d.; and the man who gets £1,000 would have to pay £4 3s. and some odd pence. Does any one think that the individual who had to pay would not feel it was his duty to assist the country the inhabitants of which were striving their utmost to pay him his large income of £1,000 a year? He would feel that such a contribution was nothing at all worthy of consideration, in order that he might secure a certainty of the payment he was entitled to. We have to preserve peace, law, and order; and—I will put it stronger than that—every man in New Zealand has to work so many days in a year for nothing and to give up his earnings for those days to pay the foreigner living out of the country; and ought not that foreigner who receives the money to pay his share for those people in times of sickness, probably arising from the very work in which they were engaged to get the money for him? Is he to pay nothing to help to support the families of those persons in times of sickness, while they have to sacrifice so much in order that he may get his money? Why, if all other nations decide in the way I reason, and reasoned several years ago, why should New Zealand alone compel its overburdened people to pay a thing of this kind to people out of the colony? At least, if you do that, relieve likewise those who are living in this country. You should do one of two things. I say the fair thing is to make those who are living out of the country pay, in the same way as the people of England make those pay who draw incomes from the funds.

Major ATKINSON.—That we do, just as it is done in England.

Sir G. GREY.—No; England deducts the tax from her dividends and her pensions, and it is for you to deduct the same from your pensions paid to persons living in England. You have not done that. I say the law demands it, and it is not done. I say the word "property" takes that, in the way it is put. I ask any honourable gentleman to look into the terms. If England says it is right and just and fair, why not New Zealand? Let me put it to the House in this way: I go to a man as a tax-collector and say, "You have a pension of £600 a year paid by the people of New Zealand: that is property; so much must be deducted from your pension on that account." He will say, "No, that is dishonest; you will not give me that to which I am entitled." But you put a tax upon every article he wears, and upon the tea he drinks: why do you take that from his pension? The things are equally taxation for the public good, and he, as a citizen, must know he is liable to pay for the public use something which all the rest of his fellow-citizens have to pay. I am quite sure he would admit that is the case. That would give you at once £148,000 a year now; and, as I say, you have lost, perhaps, £1,000,000, and you had no right to lose it. Years ago I asked for this, and if it had been granted New Zealand would be in a very different position from that in which it is now. The answer then made was, "It will prevent our raising further loans; it will interfere with that." But, I ask, will any honest, fair man say that we should not do what every other nation does? We should do that which the law requires should be done, and then we should ease our unfortunate people, who have to pay so much to that expenditure: £148,000 would be a very great sum—very large indeed. However small it might be, I would not take it if to do so was not just; but, I contend, no more just and proper thing was ever asked for or demanded than that which I demanded then; and I say the language used towards me when I demanded it was unfair. Precisely the same thing was said about dealing with the Sinking Fund, but when that was brought down afterwards every one admitted its fairness. Every other nation does the same thing. It is a useless pretence to pay Sinking Fund when we are borrowing to pay it, and pretending at the same time that it is being charged on the Consolidated Fund. When proposed finally by the honourable member for Christchurch North it was conceded without difficulty. I say there is another thing which the Government ought to do. It should not have tried to prevent this debate, so that these matters might be brought forward, and to say that the financial debate had ceased to live was pure nonsense. These great questions ought to be discussed and thoroughly understood and reasoned out, and it is only by dealing with matters of this sort that New Zealand can be drawn out of the difficulties in which it is at present involved. Well, now I pass again to our legislative body, and I contend that a larger reduction ought to be made in this House than Ministers propose. I know that is a very unpopular thing to say, and probably many persons would not like it; but I only ask them to compare this young New Zealand nation with other nations, and let them say is there any other nation in the world that has so large a number of representatives in proportion to population as this? I mentioned previously that, in my belief, fifty members is quite a sufficient number for New Zealand to have. The United States have 325 representatives of the people in their Congress. That is for sixty millions of persons; and we have close upon a third of that number for half a million of persons. Then, the same thing holds good with respect to the Upper House. They have seventy-six senators in the United States for sixty millions of people, and they perform great duties. Is it necessary for us to have some fifty? I ask, also, is it a fair plan proposed for consideration by the Premier with regard to the Legislative Council? What advantage will it be to us to have the Councillors limited to a certain number, if they are to be nominated as they are now? What advantage is it to us to have so many paid members of the House? What would be said in England if, looking at the number of the population here and that in Great Britain, it was proposed to have some four thousand or five thousand peers paid by the State? If a member of this House were to dare to go Home to England and get up and propose that, he would be shut up in a lunatic asylum and never seen again, whilst, if he escaped and reached this country again, he would be made Premier of New Zealand and have a long tenure of office. I think the thing is absurd in itself. The Government have no regard to our legislative reduction, and have made no proper proposals. Then, again, with regard to the salaries of the officers in our Legislative Department, I must say I think Ministers have placed them much too high, considering the time which is occupied by those officers in their duties, and the short period of the year during which they are engaged. I say that much more considerable reductions could be made, and that such reductions will be of considerable advantage to the country, in the good example they will afford. Then, with regard to the number of Ministers, I still contend that four Ministers would be ample for New Zealand. We have as many Ministers here as they have in the United States for sixty millions of people. I say that, if the number of Ministers were reduced to four, and if you had four Under-Secretaries selected from this House, who were placed at the head of the four departments into which the New Zealand government was divided, you would have a much more efficient Government, a Government which would be much more in sympathy with the people, and one which would train the young members of the House to a knowledge of what their most important duties were. I contend that it is impossible for men now suddenly made Ministers, without any previous training in public life, at once to perform their duties. It must take them a period of several months, probably not less than twelve months, to learn what their duties are. A Minister appointed for the first time under present circumstances is completely an infant born into a new world, and handed over to a wet-nurse in the shape of some Civil servant, brought up on very unpalatable sour milk, and it is long indeed before he can gain that experience and knowledge which will enable him to walk alone, instead of which he is kept in leading-strings by one or two of the officers of the Civil Service, himself knowing nothing about the new world that surrounds him. There is to be no improvement on that system by what we have proposed by the Government. It is only by the adoption of such a measure as I have frequently proposed that you can bring up in New Zealand a race of statesmen to be a credit to their country and an honour to their families. But there is no proposal of this kind in the Ministerial programme. To my mind, it is absolutely wanting in a broad, comprehensive view; but I submit that it is only by giving effect to views of that kind that New Zealand can be extricated from the difficulties in which it is now involved. I do not go into details of the reductions proposed in the various departments; but I say we ought to have an opportunity of doing that by going into the estimates. I am told that the Government intend to confine us to this first paper—this first page. I understood the Premier distinctly to say that he would not allow any discussion upon the items of the estimates. Whether he adheres to that I do not know; but in my own mind I resolved that I would agree to no such proposition while I could fight against it. I feel that we should have no chance of extricating ourselves from our difficulties unless we were to go into details; for every one of the measures I have recommended to the House requires a corresponding modification in the various departments. The Premier was good enough to say that there was no man in the House who was capable of giving an opinion on that subject, no man who could understand it. I say that honourable gentlemen, if they will go into Committee upon this subject as they ought to do, and devote their attention to it, will be quite capable of understanding the matter in such a way that they can intelligently and usefully vote. If they have not that opportunity I believe that such things as I speak of can never be done, at least at the present time; but I believe that, just as the Premier comes forward to-night and takes up the question of Ministerial salaries, at some future time he will come forward and take up a great many of the things I have recommended to his notice to-night; that, just in the same way as now, when most of the deferred-payment settlers have been ruined and it is almost impossible to restore prosperity to them, he comes forward and says they ought to be relieved, so will he come forward, when it is too late, and propose to carry out nearly all the things that I now say ought to be done. Just in the same manner as he, after showing violent opposition to the proposal as to the Sinking Fund, allowed it to be carried, in the same manner will he, some day, allow this $148,000 to be collected to help the people of New Zealand in the struggle they are carrying on against unnecessary difficulties. I feel certain that, if he does not do it now, he will surely do it some day. But the difficulty is that he may do these things too late. If the remedies were applied at a certain moment they would be effectual; but apply them after a lapse of time and they cease to be remedies. Those who have not died before the remedies are carried out will have the benefit of them, but before the relief is applied a large number of persons will have been irretrievably ruined. In fact, I believe that, unless we can have such control over the Premier that we can force him to bring in these measures, the prosperity which we are looking for and waiting for will recede farther from us.

Mr. TURNBULL.—I am of opinion, with the honourable member for Kumara and the honourable gentleman who has just sat down, that it would have been much better if we had completed the financial debate, and seen how far we could apply remedial measures, rather than proceed to these extreme ones which have been brought forward by the Government. I admit freely that there is stern need for retrenchment throughout the colony, though not, probably, to the extent which the honourable gentleman proposes; but I think our duty should, first, have been to see how far every person in the colony was bearing his fair proportion of the burdens. It must be evident to every member of this House, and to every one who considers the matter, that there are a large number of people in the colony who are not bearing their fair proportion of taxation. This must be evident to the House when it considers the papers presented by the late Government, and sees exactly how the property is divided. And, then, it must be evident that those who hold large properties are shutting them up to the exclusion of those who would occupy them profitably, those who would produce greater wealth than the present owners, and also increase the Customs returns very much indeed. No one who considers the position of the country, and looks through the statements that have been submitted, can arrive at any other conclusion than that the Customs is one of the causes whereby the present crisis has been brought about. It must be evident also, to any one who considers it, that the indebtedness of private individuals is one of the causes of the present trouble. People have, in their greediness, grasped large tracts of land which they cannot use profitably themselves, and which they prevent other people from using profitably; and they have, in consequence, to send out large sums of money to the foreign creditor. The private indebtedness of this colony is estimated to be about sixty millions of money, and the interest payable on that money is about three millions; and, if you come to look at the value of the produce of the colony, you see at once how much this is the cause of the depression. There is no doubt that our powers of production are much too limited, because the best parts of the country are not carrying the population that they should do. They are occupied by sheep, in connection with which there is the least labour employed; and so the land does not support the population it should. Now, we produce from our wool something like £3,367,000; from gold, about a million; from the agricultural products we get about £620,000; from sheep, mutton, and preserved meats, about £680,000; forests, kauri-gum, &c., yield about £417,000; and from other manufactures, fish, &c., we get £200,000. Now, we are not producing nearly enough to pay for the goods we import and for the interest which we send out of the colony. Setting apart the amount paid by the Government and the sums which they send out, and what is required for the purchase of goods, we have to send out seven millions. The private indebtedness, added to this, brings up the sum which we have to send out to about ten millions. We send out produce to the amount of seven millions to meet that. So that, if you take a million for profits, there is no doubt whatever that the colony is now, and has been for a number of years, sending out a million or two millions beyond what it has been producing. This we have done by borrowing, and this we shall have to do by borrowing, or great trouble will come upon us. Our Customs revenue this year is estimated to yield a million and a quarter; but I would point out that if these large landed properties were taxed to the extent they should pay they would yield us far more than the sum they do pay. In the South Island alone there are ninety estates which total in area something like three millions of acres, and the whole population upon these runs, upon these vast tracts of land, amounts to something like two thousand seven hundred people. I doubt whether more than thirty people are employed on each of these vast estates, taking the average. These estates should carry—and if they were properly taxed they soon would carry—a hundred and thirty-two thousand people. There is no doubt in my mind that one of the great causes of the failure of the late Government was their proposal to impose a progressive property-tax. The late Premier stated in his place that that was one of the great reasons of the opposition he experienced. For that cause alone all the great influence of the banks and loan corporations and others was brought to bear upon the elections. I do not believe there is a single member of this House whose election was not influenced very much by the power which they brought to bear upon it. There is no doubt whatever that a vast influence was exercised by those people, and that that was the cause of the defeat of the late Government. I very much regret not to have heard in any of the many speeches we have had from the late Colonial Treasurer any reference to this; but probably when the question of the Property-tax Bill arises that will give him the best opportunity of calling attention to it. Of course we are met with a very fair objection. It is said, "Very well; these men bought the estates; they have paid for them, and they have a right to do what they like with their own." It seems to me that that is a feasible argument, and I know it meets with general approbation, because there is always that feeling amongst English people that every man has a right to do what he likes with his own. The unfortunate thing is, that we are in the position of having borrowed £34,000,000, and of having spent that money in giving increased value to these estates; and not only have we done that, but we have done it on the assumption that this land would be used in the interests of the Government. We have borrowed money in order to settle people on these properties, with the hope that with the increased population we should be able not only to pay interest on the money, but to increase the prosperity and happiness of the country; and, if any Government is going to allow the holders of these large properties to retain possession of them without contributing a fair proportion to the necessities of the State it will be acting unjustly and unwisely. In the papers laid before the House by the late Colonial Treasurer we find that 34,000 people hold twenty-four million pounds' worth of real property, and that 1,807 people hold twenty-eight millions' worth of property. The fair inference to be drawn from that is that those who hold large possessions should pay a larger property-tax than the small holders. If land and labour give wealth, then they have all that gives wealth. These properties should pay for the money that has been expended in giving them increased value. It is a fair argument to say, "I have paid for these lands, and have a perfect right to do with them as I like. It is no matter of the State's what I do with them; they are my property." But then the State would immediately step in upon this ground, and tell the owners that they held large properties from which the State had the right to expect to derive revenue. I will take one of these estates that I know of—an estate of forty thousand acres. It is one of the best in the colony, and it has on it ten persons besides the owners—that is to say, there are twenty-two people on the whole of that valuable country,—and it is within ten miles of a railway, and is the finest wheat-producing land in the country. On that land we have twenty people, contributing to the Customs duties, say, £3 a year per head; so that the State derives from that property £66 a year beyond what is paid in property-tax. This property is capable of settling two thousand people, besides giving indirect benefit to a large number of other people, arising from the trade that would be created by so many settlers; so that from that land alone the State is losing £10,000 a year, in consequence of this property not being sufficiently occupied. Then comes the question, How far is it the duty of the Government, under these circumstances, to tax these holdings, and to what extent should they be taxed? If the State taxes them to the extent of its loss upon such a property, it would tax such a one as that mentioned to the extent of £10,000 a year; but it may be said that the estate is heavily mortgaged, and could not pay the taxation; and in that case it should be taxed until it is cut up and sold. We take our indebtedness, I think, as a matter of too little consequence. Let us for a moment think of what the honourable member for Auckland Central stated; compare ourselves with England, and imagine England sending out interest on her national debt—£750,000,000—sending it to China, draining it out of the country. How long would England be a first-class, a second-class, or even a third-class Power if that were done? But there is this other side of the question to be considered: Suppose she was not only sending that out, but that she was sending out, too, the interest on her private indebtedness—sending out for that double the amount of money sent as interest on the national debt—what would be the result? The thing is self-evident: to any country it would mean ruin; but here we sit, with the most complete stupidity, and we say we will willingly cut down everything, but we are not going to propose any remedy. I should have hoped that in any scheme brought forward by the Colonial Treasurer that would be considered; but he has probably taken warning from the fate of his predecessor, and thinks that it is a thing to be avoided. But it is a question that, in the interests of the colony, should be brought forward and debated. We are told that it is contrary to Stuart Mill or to Adam Smith to propose progressive taxation; but I do not think our ideas of political economy are to be stereotyped because Adam Smith or Stuart Mill said such-and-such a thing. Notwithstanding what might have been said to the contrary, progressive taxation is just and fair. I am not going to enter at any great length into this question, but will just briefly mention the objections I feel to the Statement. The Statement proposes to retrench during the present session to the amount of £71,000, and the table of revenue and expenditure appended by the Colonial Treasurer points to retrenchment to the extent of £300,000 during the next twelve months. I do not know whether the honourable gentleman—he will pardon me for saying so—has considered what the effect of the retrenchment will be, and whether he thinks it likely that he will meet the House next session with anything but a similar deficiency to that which exists upon the present occasion. Then, the honourable gentleman proposes to cut down the public-works expenditure by £27,000 a month. I say it cannot be done; it is impossible; the country will sink under it. You will not retrench from money you are sending out of the colony, but from money that is being spent and is circulating among yourselves; and that is one of the great evils of it. If the retrenchment were such that it would not affect the community here, but simply save money that was being sent out of the colony, I could understand such a course restoring prosperity; but to take £300,000 out of circulation in this way will simply intensify the distress. Now, there is one thing besides the severity of the retrenchment to which I will refer, and it is one portion of the retrenchment which I think the people will not allow, and which I should be very sorry to take any part in. I do not think for a moment that this House will sanction the proposal to reduce by £60,000 our education vote. I am quite aware that the capitation grant of £17,000 might be fairly cut off, and I think we might go into the question of reducing the school-age to fourteen years; and that, I think, would give ample retrenchment with regard to the education vote. The ages of the children attending the schools are as follow: From five to seven years, 21,024; from thirteen to fifteen, 10,882; and over fifteen, 2,190; so that by reducing the highest school-age to fourteen years, and not by increasing the age at which children should be admitted to the schools, a saving might be made. To raise the school-age of admission would be, to a certain extent, to cut off those who could least afford to miss their education; because a great number of the 82,000 children now attending the public schools have to leave as soon as they are able to go to the factories or to work;—they have to leave when about twelve years of age: it would be a great injustice to make retrenchment at that end of our education system. There is one part of the education expenditure that, I am sorry to say, has not been alluded to, and that is, that it is costing the colony something like £35,000 a year for our high schools. It appears that there are something like 2,143 children attending the high schools, and that something like £15 per head is contributed by the State towards the education of these children, and children, generally, of very wealthy parents. If there was to be any saving effected in education it would have been far better, before applying the axe to the primary-education system, to see how much could be saved from the children attending the high schools. Sir, I do not anticipate that the proposal of the Government on this matter will at all meet with the approval of the House, and it is one of those retrenchments I think they must be prepared to drop. There is one item here in which I shall find myself entirely with the Government; but I am bound to state that I cannot see how it is possible to reduce £180,000 from so small a number as the Government propose. There are 1,301 people to whom this reduction would apply. The Premier states that there are 5,862 Civil servants whose income is under £150 a year. How is it possible from the 1,300 left to make the reduction which the Premier proposes on this occasion? Setting apart £10,500 for Legislative, which I admit to be just, and taking Defence, £46,000, that would leave £170,000 which is to be struck off from these different departments. I think the House can justly demand to know how far this is to be done. The working railways alone is £38,000; and yet the Colonial Treasurer appears to think that there will be some slight increase in the department during the next twelve months. But this £38,000 is a sum about which the House should insist on knowing something. The proposition for the repeal of the Crown and Native Lands Rating Act I imagine to be a very just and fair one. I shall do my best to support the proposal for borrowing, because I feel that there is an absolute necessity for importing this money and giving employment to the people. The sooner our railway system is brought to an end the better for the country. I think that, when he is going into the market, the Colonial Treasurer ought to calculate the exact sum that will be required to fill up the gaps between the different lines; and it will be necessary, unless extraordinary burdens are to be laid on the people, to borrow £500,000, to be placed in the hands of School Commissioners for school and other buildings. I shall give the Government my most hearty support on their borrowing and Crown and Native Lands Rating Act repeal proposals. Of course a great discussion will arise on the Land Fund. I shall support them there also. It seems to me clear that the land which has been bought out of loan, and which is costing the colony something like £50,000 a year in the shape of interest, should not be allowed to lie unproductive. If the Government can obtain what it cost them they ought to get the land off their hands, and save payment of the large amount of interest which is accumulating from year to year on these different properties. The Land Fund is not one that will directly benefit the consolidated revenue, because it is kept separate and distinct; but we must be prepared for this: Instead of an increased territorial revenue we shall have to consider whether some considerable reduction will not arise from it. A paper which has been laid on the table shows a diminution of £11,000 from land handed over to the Midland Railway Company, &c. There is another question, as to whether we are raising sufficient money from the lighthouses. The cost is very considerably beyond the first outlay. It may be said that, if you raise the light-dues, eventually it falls upon the people. Well, it will fall on the few who travel; but that consideration ought not to enter into the mind of the Government. I think the Union Company's steamers should contribute a great deal more to the revenue than they do. As far as the Bill before us is concerned, I should scarcely like to give an opinion upon the matter until I see how far it is possible to raise a just revenue from the estates I have mentioned. I think the revenue ought to be increased from the property-tax beyond what is proposed to be raised by the Government. If large properties were taxed as they should be, they would yield considerably more than £200,000 to the revenue. Persons have no business to hold these large properties to the loss of the State.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Take them from them.

Mr. TURNBULL.—There is no desire to take them, but they have no business to hold them to the loss or injury of the State. This land ought to be classed either as agricultural or pastoral land, and the amount of population, not sheep, which they would carry should be calculated. They should be made to bear a fair proportion of the taxation they would yield if they were inhabited, and were producing more wealth. In considering this Bill, we must look at the alteration which has taken place in the condition of the colony since the £5,000 was voted for the Governor's salary. Looking to the large number of persons availing themselves of the hospitality of the Governor, looking at the position he should occupy, that he is the first in acts of liberality and kindness, I think it would be much better if we fixed the salary at £6,000. There must be very large calls upon a gentleman holding the high position he does here, and we should be careful not to cut him down too much. Last year we spent something like £10,000; but there was a very great deal of expense incurred in altering the grounds and other expenses of a like nature. But I should be very sorry to see the sum insufficient for a gentleman to come out here and hold such a high position as he should do. We do not want any example of meanness—unfortunately we have had too many—and we want our Governors to show an example of liberality. I think that probably the Governor would be the best judge in a matter of this kind; and if he has courage he will veto this Bill, just as President Grant had the courage to veto the Bill for the reduction of his salary to £5,000. I doubt whether legislation of this kind, when it got Home, would obtain the consent of the Queen. As to the other Bills, I shall express my opinion upon them when they are brought forward; but, if there is an amendment made to fix the salary at £5,000 and the travelling allowances at £1,000, I shall support such amendment; and I think we should be doing that which is for the best interests of the country by adopting that sum.

Mr. TAYLOR.—I find that the discussion on this Bill has simply resolved itself into a discussion of the financial policy of the Government. Having spoken on the financial policy of the Government, I do not intend to take up any further time in that direction. But I contend that the Governor's salary as stated in this Bill is ample, and I should be inclined to support the Government in a proposal to reduce it by £500 more than the sum mentioned here. The whole of the trouble to-night has arisen from a false expression on the part of the Premier with reference to the financial debate having been dead and buried, because the honourable member must have known that the honourable member for Parnell and the honourable member for Mount Ida have not spoken, and he must have known that he would certainly "rile" those honourable gentlemen upon a matter which I think should be dealt with in a different way. I do not know whether those honourable gentlemen who spoke so elaborately to-night will have a right to go over the same ground on the Financial Statement.

Major ATKINSON.—Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR.—Then, I hope those honourable gentlemen will abstain when the matter comes fairly before us, and will let us go to a vote as soon as possible.

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—On looking at this Bill more carefully, I find that it is not open to the objection which I said it was.

Major ATKINSON.—I am much obliged to the honourable gentleman for that statement.

Mr. WARD.—I think it would have been very much better if, instead of submitting an amendment to the House upon the Act of 1873, the Government had repealed that Act and brought down a fresh Bill. I find, on referring to the Act of 1873, that the Governor really receives a salary equal to £7,500 a year—that is, a salary of £5,000, £1,500 for expenses for his servants, and £1,000 for travelling allowance. And under this Bill the Governor will receive a salary of £5,000 per annum, £300 a year for the Clerk of the Executive Council, and £350 a year for his gardeners—£5,650 a year. It is also provided under the old Act—and is to continue under the Act now under discussion—that the colony has to keep the rooms painted and papered yearly, and furniture is to be provided at the cost of the colony. It appears to me that the only saving intended by the Act now before the House is that of £1,000 travelling allowance provided for in the Act of 1873.

Major ATKINSON.—And the establishment: £2,500 is the exact saving.

Mr. WARD.—What I am anxious to bring before the House is this: I am aware of the reason for putting it in this way, but I think it would have been better to have stated a fixed salary to cover everything—

Major ATKINSON.—That is not considered to belong to the Governor. We are obliged to keep up the grounds.

Mr. WARD.—There is no estimate before the House of what that costs. I do not think we shall really make the saving of £2,500 which the Premier says. Again, though it is a small matter, I fail to see why the proviso in the old Act should be maintained, which provided that the new Governor shall receive half salary from the time of embarkation for the colony till his arrival here. I fail to see why Governors should, in this respect, be treated differently from all other officers. I think it would be quite just to pay them from the time of arriving and beginning their duties. I am of opinion that, instead of amending the old Act, we might better have had a new one altogether. I will not detain the House further; but in Committee I will move in the directions on several points in which I have expressed myself.

Mr. WALKER.—I ask the Premier if he will not consider the advisability of getting to the financial debate again as soon as possible, and letting it be finished. As far as this side of the House is concerned, I do not think it can be charged with unnecessarily prolonging the debate. We have put up man for man, and we have no desire for continuing the debate at unnecessary length. I think, if the Premier is really anxious to expedite business, as he professes, he might very easily, on the last night the Financial Statement was discussed, have said—as we have often heard him say before—that he thought the discussion might be brought to a close by a certain time. If that debate were finished I feel sure that his Bills would go on a great deal better, and the public business would be done more quickly and with better results. I trust we shall not have any more of these desultory financial debates on the second reading of policy Bills. I feel quite certain it is not the right way of proceeding with business, and that the proper constitutional method is that the financial debate should be first closed.

Major ATKINSON.—I cannot accede to the proposal of the honourable member for Ashburton, and I am very much surprised that he should make it, in the circumstances. His chief has declared that debate a pure waste of time, and I understood that it was practically finished. Any one who listened to that debate could not but notice that no one was regarding it—that the Opposition had completely failed in the matter and their case had quite broken down, and that no one would listen to it. There was the least bit of life infused into it to-night by the honourable member for Auckland Central, but, as soon as honourable members heard him, they found that it was the same speech as he had made many times before, and he threw no new light into the matter. I say the Government must conduct the business in the way they think most conducive to get it through. The kind suggestions of my honourable friends opposite I have listened to too often. We have given way to their suggestions, even to delaying for a week, to give their leader time to prepare his attack; but, as I have said before, the honourable gentleman failed altogether in that attack, and then he came down and made a second speech, and said it was useless to go on with the debate. And now, one after another, Opposition members are getting up and telling us it is wasting time to go on with other business till the financial debate is finished. I venture to say that if I had put Supply at the top of the Paper we should not have got on with Supply work. Any honourable gentleman who has got an idea to offer or a speech to make has an ample opportunity to do it on any of these Bills. Did not the honourable member for Ashburton tell us, on the last occasion of the financial debate being on, that there were twenty-two members who were going to speak, and—

Mr. WALKER.—I do not like to contradict the honourable gentleman, but I must distinctly state, as the rules of the House do not allow me to go further, that I have no recollection whatever of mentioning the number twenty-two in connection with this matter.

Major ATKINSON.—I do not like, of course, to contradict the honourable gentleman, but I must say I think he is mistaken.

Mr. WALKER.—The honourable gentleman has an unfortunate habit of multiplying things by two.

Major ATKINSON.—I shall not multiply the Opposition by two at any rate. I accept the honourable gentleman's statement, of course, and will only add that either his memory or mine must be wrong. I was under the impression that he told me that.

Mr. W. D. Stewart

Mr. WALKER.—Was it direct from me or through a medium?

Major ATKINSON.—From the honourable gentleman himself, and I understood it was twenty-two.

Mr. WALKER.—I stated twelve; so that is nearly multiplying by two. The honourable gentleman not having closed the debate that night, the number might have increased afterwards.

Major ATKINSON.—I was very anxious that it should close, and I asked the honourable gentleman several times if his side did not object to getting it closed, and I could only get a negative answer: there was nothing definite. Then came the second speech of the honourable member for Christchurch North, saying it was useless continuing the debate; and the honourable gentleman having utterly failed to make out a case, and the debate being wholly disregarded, as the House emptied whenever any one spoke, I thought it better that we should get to some tangible business—something that we could get to a direct vote on. Now, we have an opportunity of advancing this Bill a stage; but, if we had moved for Supply, we should have had a desultory discussion, should have done no business, and should have had the same discussion again the next time that we moved Supply. And the Government have taken this course with a due regard to getting some work for the other Chamber to do. It seemed to us desirable, looking at the stage of the session, to get forward some of the business a stage, with a view to getting it to another place; and I venture to say we have the approval of a large majority of this House in taking this course. We do not want to stifle any debate, because any honourable gentleman has had a full opportunity of making a general speech on this Bill, and all will have other opportunities on other Bills. Sir, I think it would do no good to follow the honourable member for Auckland Central through his speech, but there are two or three points I will refer to. No one who heard the honourable gentleman would think that it was his Ministry which committed the very sins which he wishes the House to believe I am guilty of. Now, the honourable gentleman blamed us for not intending to deal with the Insurance Department. He evidently doubted my statement that we intended to deal with this department as well as with others. I said I did not see any use in mixing up this matter with others, as the finance of this department is outside the public revenue, and therefore any reform of this department is quite outside the general subject. The honourable gentleman must know that the finance of this department has nothing to do with the consolidated revenue. I am astonished at the honourable gentleman asking why the officers of this department should be paid more than other officers. Does he not know that the insurance business is a special class of work? Why do private companies pay more than is paid in other occupations? It is because men capable of conducting such business are very scarce, and can practically command their own price. These private offices have not the same publicity in their affairs as the Government Department necessarily has, but if we could look into them we should soon find that they made mistakes, and that our office would compare favourably with any of them. If any department of this kind is to be conducted successfully, we shall have to give much higher salaries than are to be paid to Ministers—that is to say, if we do not want all the best men to go to the private offices and our department to be obliged to take very inferior men. Now, the honourable gentleman said that we do not propose to effect any such reform as we might effect by amalgamating the different services. If the honourable gentleman had read the Financial Statement he would have seen that we say a great deal about that. It is the ground on which we are asking for the confidence of the House to enable us to amalgamate these services, and make one large service of them, as the honourable gentleman says, and to do away with the multiplicity of officers. The late Government, or the honourable member for Christchurch North, went somewhat in that direction. Under his authority, a certain number of departments were amalgamated with the view of making promotion run through the whole of the department. Any one who has looked into the matter cannot but know that, if there is to be any real reform in the Service, we must proceed on these lines—there must be a less number of heads, and we must give advancement right through the Service: there can be no question about that and the honourable gentleman said nothing new in that respect. The honourable gentleman said there were too many Ministers—that it was not right to have six Ministers in this House; we should have eight—four Ministers and four Under-Secretaries. Eight votes in the House! That would suit any Government extremely well, no doubt. The honourable gentleman was quite right about the state Ministers must be in, in going fresh to their work. He said they must go to their duties knowing nothing at all about them. But do they not go into departments which have thoroughly trained official heads to carry on the work of the departments? The honourable gentleman would have perfectly raw men to carry on the routine of the office instead of the permanent heads. He would have men taking charge of the ordinary departmental work without the slightest knowledge of it. Now, when a new Minister goes into office he finds, under the present system, a permanent head of the department, who knows his duties thoroughly, and is of very great assistance to the Minister. There are some Under-Secretaries, no doubt, who are not so competent as they might be; but that does not affect my contention. Now in regard to the appointment of the gentleman over the Insurance Department: The honourable gentleman has referred to that several times; and I am rather surprised that he has done so. The appointment was made by the Colonial Treasurer of his own Government, Mr. Ballance. This very appointment, regarding which the honourable gentleman has been railing at me to-night, if I may use the expression, for having countenanced it, was made before I came into office. I found that this officer had been appointed by the honourable gentleman's Colonial Treasurer on a distinct promise of a particular salary; but the honourable gentleman so far got the upper hand of his own Colonial Treasurer that he would not allow him to give the salary which had been promised, so the Treasurer gave him £100 less—£700 instead of £800. The Treasurer had so far authority that he was able to insist on appointing him, and he was promised that he should have £800 as soon as the Treasurer could get it for him. I did not express approval in any way of that appointment; but when I took office I found that the appointment had been made, and the officer was there discharging the duties, and that he had the promise of a particular salary from the Government of which the honourable member for Auckland Central was the head, and I brought down to the House the estimates with the salary that had been promised by the honourable gentleman's Government, and the House voted it. Now, that is the scandalous appointment the honourable gentleman said I had the chief hand in promoting.

Mr. GUINNESS.—How did he get a thousand a year?

Major ATKINSON.—That was done by the Board when the department was turned into an Association. The House saw fit to pass an Act forming the department into an Association. The honourable member for Christchurch North was the promoter of the Bill, which I supported, and I take my share of the blame. If any one is to blame for that appointment it is the honourable member for Auckland Central. He is the man who is primarily responsible to this House. He let the appointment be made; and, as he says, a gentleman was appointed without having any qualifications for the office. I say the honourable gentleman cannot point to any single such appointment made by any Government of which I was a member. If he can, I ask him to do so. Then the honourable gentleman goes into all my doings. He begins from 1877. I do not know why he did not go back to 1878, when the Governor's Salary Act was passed, or to 1874, when the Ministers' Salaries Act was passed. I was in the House then. I am in a most unfortunate position. Whether I am in opposition, or a member of the Government, or a private member, I am held responsible for what occurs in the House. That is what he wants the House to believe. When the honourable gentleman was in a majority in 1887 I was able to come down and say that he should not have the Ministers' salaries reduced. The honourable gentleman knows as well as I do it was his own friends who would not have it. The honourable gentleman knows that quite well. Whether the honourable gentleman was sincere in wishing it I do not know.

Sir G. GREY.—Read your speech.

Major ATKINSON.—I am perfectly consistent. I have read my speech. I have been looking over it. I expressed my opinions fearlessly, and I gave a vote accordingly. If the honourable gentleman had done the same, things might have been quite different. He thought nothing of voting in one way as Premier, while some of his Ministers remained out and did not vote. In 1877 I was against the reduction of Ministers' salaries and I was against the reduction of the members of this House. For this reason: I say a salary of £1,250 a year is not at all an excessive salary for Ministers of the Crown; and I say the same to-day. I have said it all through. I think it is only a reasonable salary, and, but for the state of the colony, as I have said, I should be resisting it this day as I did then; but I say our duty now is to make sacrifices ourselves, and to make them clearly and immediately, so that there shall be no mistake about it. This is a question affecting the opinions of the people, that they shall recognise, as we recognise, the great necessity for retrenchment. That is the point. Therefore I say I am perfectly consistent in the course I take. I say salaries might have been reduced but for the mismanagement chiefly of the honourable gentleman opposite. I do not say anything as to the management of the honourable member for Auckland Central, but I might say a great deal of that in the years 1877 to 1879, and I might look at many of the appointments which were made then. Then, so far, the honourable gentleman has thrown no light on this question. He has really not exposed to us a system which will do any good. What is the difference between the proposals of the Government and those of the honourable gentleman? So far as our retrenchment proposals go there is no difference whatever. There is some slight difference in this: We propose to keep six Ministers, and he would keep only four Ministers and four Under-Secretaries. Is that going to effect the salvation of the country? He would make the Service one Service in order that all promotions might be regular. Anybody who has considered this question knows that to have any effective reorganization that must be done; and that is the proposal of the Government. The honourable gentleman laughs as if wisdom only lived with himself. Then he said that when he proposed to take the Sinking Fund I resisted it, and then afterwards I agreed to its being taken. Everybody knows that I fought my utmost against it. There is the underlying assumption that, whether in office or out of office, I can do what I like. It is perfectly ridiculous. What could I do in a minority? I fought against it. I think that nothing has done so much harm to our credit as that transaction. I said that when the honourable gentleman proposed it, and I say exactly the same now. Then he goes on to the question of taxing the bondholders. The honourable gentleman does not seem to comprehend this question at all. I am astonished at him, and he seemed quite astonished to hear that we did here just the same as they do in England with regard to the bondholders.

The honourable gentleman does not understand the question with regard to these bondholders. We have to make a payment not at our Treasury here, but to the Crown Agents in London on a particular day. Mr. A, the holder of a bond for £100, has been promised that he will receive 4 per cent. He goes there, and gets it. Our bargain is to have the money there by a particular day. We have to have our money at the Bank of England many days before it is due. I say it is utterly impossible for us to tax those bondholders, and I will tell you why. Because we have agreed to have that money there, and I say the Courts of England would compel us to produce £5 for every £5 bond to the Agent on that particular day. The bonds which are issued in the colony, and upon which interest is paid out of our own Treasury, are taxed at the present time. When the holders come for their dividend it is stopped from them if it has not already been paid in as property-tax. That is quite reasonable and right; but the honourable gentleman must distinguish between the two operations. We pay the man £5, but stop it on another account. In the other case, we pay the money in London; it is out of our jurisdiction, and no one can touch it. Nobody would like better than I to tax the bondholders if only it was fair, and they would be taxed at the present moment.

Mr. VALENTINE.—They pay a tax at Home.

Major ATKINSON.—Yes, of course; but you cannot get away from the absolute bargain to pay this money in London, and as soon as the money gets to London it is out of our jurisdiction altogether. It is under the jurisdiction of the English Government, and therefore they rightly say, Whatever your income may be you shall pay on it. I should have thought anybody could have seen the distinction. Any attempt, such as is proposed by the honourable gentleman, would simply mean a forced reduction of the interest we have agreed to pay. It does not mean at all legitimate taxation, for by the bond we are bound to pay this money in London. Then the honourable gentleman was very angry with the Government for not having made proper proposals for reducing the number of members of the Legislative Council. We have not only proposed that, but I have no doubt we shall succeed in doing it. What was the action of the honourable gentleman in the two years he was in office? He made more appointments than were made by any other Government in three or four times that time. He beat the late Government in making appointments. Two evils do not make a good—I admit that thoroughly; but I say the honourable gentleman has acted in exactly an opposite direction to his creed, and we have acted according to our creed. No Government of which I was a member ever made large appointments. We always left that to the Government which succeeded us. In 1877 a large number of appointments were made. In 1884 the honourable gentlemen opposite succeeded us, and they made a large number of appointments. So that our action has been a reasonable and proper one—that is, to reduce the number of members of the Legislative Council. I do not know that I need say any more. I could follow the honourable gentleman further; but I confess I have been a little disappointed with his speech, because I had hoped, from his large experience, that he would be able to make some really valuable suggestions; but for some reason, I do not know why, he has thought it better to attack me, and hold me up as the one man who is the cause of all the mischief in the country. I am not going to return the compliment to him in any way. When we get into Committee on these estimates I hope I shall be able to satisfy him that I know something about the matter, and that I shall satisfy him that what we propose is reasonable; and I can assure the honourable gentleman and every other honourable member of this: that any suggestion in the direction of making retrenchment more effective and clear I shall be only too delighted to receive. I beg to move the second reading of this Bill.

Sir G. GREY.—May I make a personal explanation? I have simply to say, in regard to the appointment to the Insurance Department, that I did not allude to the appointment which the Premier has mentioned. With a quickness which arises, I suppose, from practice, he shifted the appointment I was alluding to to one made in my time. I thought I would not shrink from the thing at all, and therefore permitted it to go on. I would simply add that I cannot admit the correctness of the description he has given of the appointment made at the time I was Minister. I will not go into the details.

Major ATKINSON.—Would the honourable gentleman kindly say what was the other appointment?

Sir G. GREY.—I am sure the honourable gentleman does know. He cannot tell me he does not know.

Major ATKINSON.—I do not know of any other. I shall be very happy to explain it fully if I had anything to do with it.

Sir G. GREY.—It appears there is a misunderstanding. I am not alluding to an appointment made in his time.

Major ATKINSON.—I wish the honourable gentleman to name it, because I should like the right persons to have the blame if there is blame, or have an opportunity of contradicting it if there is no blame.

Sir G. GREY.—The honourable gentleman knows as well as I do.

Major ATKINSON.—Does the honourable gentleman refer to the appointment of the District Agent in Dunedin?

Sir G. GREY.—The honourable gentleman knows perfectly well the appointment I mean.

MINISTERS' SALARIES AND ALLOWANCES BILL.

Major ATKINSON.—Sir, I beg to move the second reading of this Bill. I do not think it desirable that I should make any comments in doing so; therefore I will content myself by merely making the motion.

Mr. TAYLOR.—This is a very important question; and, as the Premier is aware, I have placed a question on the Order Paper bearing in this direction. What I wish Ministers to consider is this: that, in the reductions they are about to make throughout the departments, it should not so happen that a subordinate should receive more than a Minister of the Crown. I am prepared to admit that the Hon. the Premier is one of the best politicians in this country; and, if his services are not worth more than £1,000 a year, I trust he will have no subordinates alongside him drawing salaries larger than his. I merely mention the matter in order that the Government may deal with the subordinates in a proportionate manner. In one particular instance mentioned in the return that has been laid on the table, I find that the Property-tax Commissioner draws something like £1,240 a year, including bonuses. If that is to be continued, I believe the Premier of the colony should receive more than is proposed in the Bill; but, if the Government are going to make proportionate reductions all round, then they will have my support, because I believe, in the present state of the country, we must have the reductions that have been indicated. I agree with the Minister in his proposal not to touch those salaries which cannot bear it; but when you see men drawing large salaries, such as £1,000, or £900, or £800 a year, there is room for large reductions. I put these views clearly before the Ministry. I say that, if the head of the Government is prepared to take this sum, his subordinates have no right to grumble at a proportionate reduction.

Sir G. GREY.—“I also hope the House will not agree to this Bill being passed. In my opinion the proposal is a mere affectation of economy. It may be all very well for a gentleman who is in receipt of a pension of £1,000 a year from the public funds, and who has an ample private fortune besides, to make such a proposal; but I will say this with absolute certainty: that no gentleman can occupy the position of Minister in this town upon £1,000 a year; and I speak from some experience on the matter. The same testimony, I am sure, will be received from any gentleman who may have occupied the position of a Minister. If it is desirable that Ministers should live in cheap lodgings and be separated from their families, or that they should be men of large and independent means, then I can understand the proposal; but I think it would be unwise economy to ask public men to occupy such positions at pecuniary loss to themselves. There are very few in this House who possess the confidence of the House who can occupy such positions except at great personal inconvenience. I do not believe there is on those benches one gentleman who is not sacrificing a great deal of personal comfort in order to serve the country. Unless we desire to confine the Ministerial benches to gentlemen of one class, it will be quite impossible to obtain gentlemen to act as Ministers if the salaries are reduced in this way. The choice at present is rather limited. There is now considerable difficulty in obtaining gentlemen to occupy the position of Ministers. A very large number of gentlemen are not in a position to do it; and when Ministries are being formed those gentlemen constantly refuse to accept office from various motives, but chiefly because they are not yet sufficiently independent to be able to leave their business to undertake the work of the country. I hope that the House will not, in a fit of false economy, rush into this reduction of salaries as proposed by Ministers.”

Sir, I have made my sentiments known to the House in the speech just delivered. I will quote from the speech of another very foolish gentleman who was subjected to much ridicule for making it:—

“What we feel and what we sincerely believe is that a system of gross extravagance has grown up in this country—a system of gross extravagance in the Government, and which has spread from the Government to other bodies in the community. The Government set an example, I may say, to the whole colony, of what, in their opinion, a Government should be. If that Government is thoroughly extravagant, if that Government considers high salaries necessary for the maintenance of good government, it is quite certain that all those local bodies we have established will follow the example set them by this General Government, and that a system of extravagance will be propagated throughout the whole colony.”

These two speeches were made this day ten years ago. The one was from the honourable gentleman who sits there, and the second was made by myself. He stood up in the House to-night and said I had at that time a large majority, and he could effect nothing. Let honourable members look at that admission, and then see how far what he states is to be relied upon. They will see I had no majority at all. In point of fact, in every good thing I proposed I was checked by the honourable gentleman. And now he does not hesitate to bring down this very measure which at that time he opposed.

Mr. BARRON.—As I understand it, the Prime Minister does not invite the House to take him as an example, but rather to look upon him as a warning; and as a warning I think his example is of a very salutary kind. It is to be hoped that no other honourable member will follow in the footsteps of the honourable member for Auckland Central by endeavouring to discourage the very laudable efforts at reform which the Prime Minister is making. For my part, I shall support him as far as I can in his reform. In this Bill I look for a reform which I do not find. Honourable members will recollect that in the early part of the session a motion was made by the honourable member for Waihemo to the effect that a reduction in the number of Ministers should be made; but supporters of the Government refused to vote for that motion, simply because they looked upon it as merely an endeavour to carry a vote of want of confidence in the Government. Now, however, the Bill is brought down fixing the number of paid Ministers, and in that Bill there is a confirmation of the present law, which provides for six paid Ministers besides the Premier, making seven paid Ministers in all. I hope the Government will see their way immediately to reduce this number by at least one—that is to say, to reduce the number of Ministers, exclusive of the Premier, to five; and also to make provision for effecting a further reduction should there be a reduction in the number of members of this House. I hope that clause 8 will be amended so that the number “five” may be inserted where at present there is six; and that clause 4 will be altered so that, instead of providing for five Ministers, it shall provide for four in case of a reduction in the number of members of the House. In pursuance of my duty, if no other member of this House moves these amendments, and if the Government does not see its way to accept them in the meantime, I shall feel called upon to move them, and I give notice now, so that there may be no misunderstanding when we get into Committee on the Bill.

Mr. MOSS.—It was my intention, if the financial debate had proceeded in the ordinary course, to say a few words upon this particular point which I will now trouble the House with. One of the greatest objections I had to the Financial Statement was the way in which the question of retrenchment was treated. I mean the spirit in which it was treated. Questions merely affecting departments were mixed up with questions of large constitutional import. It seemed to me this was altogether leading the House astray; it was striking a false note. Surely we are not to consider a question which affects the whole structure of Government in the same spirit in which we regard questions that affect ordinary departmental expenditure. It was said in the Financial Statement that we must show a spirit of self-sacrifice; and the honourable member for Caversham has evidently taken that view, and gives it additional force by saying, “We will show the Government an example.” I hold that this is altogether a wrong view. How can we, in our varied circumstances, lay down what it is to make a self-sacrifice? To talk of self-sacrifice, it seems to me, is—I do not like to use the expression—an utter sham. Some honourable gentlemen speak of it knowing that the sacrifice they make is a very small matter to them, whilst to others it may be a very great matter. There is no equality in it. The first duty which we undertake in all Parliaments is to ascertain what is necessary—no more than necessary, but what really is necessary—to carry on the government of the country. Our own forms tell us that is the proper course. The first thing they direct is, to go into Committee of Supply. There we consider what is necessary for the good government of the country. Then we go into Committee of Ways and Means, and devise how we shall get the means with which to meet that expenditure. But now we have people inverting the process, and, with wise shakes of the head, talking of cutting our coat according to our cloth. That is a simile which is entirely inapplicable to our case. We have no fixed revenue, no fixed quantity of cloth. It seems to me that the idea connected with this cutting-down of expenditure implies that past expenditure has been excessive, or that we are now going to reduce the expenditure below what is for the good government of the colony. It means one of those two things: either that we are going to cut the expenditure below what is good for the country, or else that those honourable gentlemen who have had control of the country for some years past have sanctioned gross extravagance in the administration of affairs. I hope the country will look at the matter from that point. So far as the salary of the Governor and the salaries in departments are concerned, those are solely matters of administration, and there is no large constitutional question mixed up with them; but when we speak of the salaries of Ministers and the payment to members, then we touch upon what are decidedly constitutional questions. These things are mixed up together in a most incongruous way in the Financial Statement. What we have to consider is the fair and moderate payment for performing public duties. The country has not come to that stage when it can call upon its Civil servants or any other individuals to put it under an obligation by making great sacrifices on its behalf. In regard to the question immediately before us, and looking at it from that point of view, I may say that I think a payment of £1,000 a year is sufficient for any Minister in New Zealand. I believe it will induce Ministers to set a personal example of economy which will be useful to the whole community. I do not regard them as objects of state and show. They have high and noble work to perform, and they occupy a position that ought, at all events, to save them from incurring any large personal outlay to maintain a position which gives them dignity. I cannot help thinking that it is a mistake to speak of pay drawn by Ministers in the same sense as pay drawn by departmental officers. The two strongest passions that possess any of us are, perhaps, ambition and avarice; and I hold that it is a sound principle not to gratify both of those passions in the same office. If you appoint a fellow-citizen to a position of great dignity, do not add to it great pay; for, if you do, it may make that office unworthily sought after. Now, the position of a Minister is a very high one, and one that we should all be proud to occupy; and it should be sufficient to have the dignity and a rate of pay attached to it such as will enable the holder to maintain it with modest decency. We want no show and pomp, and for that reason I think £1,000 ample to pay Ministers. But I observe in this Bill that it is called £800 and £1,000 a year with allowances of £200. I look upon that as misleading. Let us do away with these allowances. There is no necessity for them. It is understood that the houses occupied by Ministers are to be sold; and, if that is done, they will be able to occupy such as their own taste or circumstances for the time being may render suitable. I am satisfied that £1,000 is ample, and I hope it will be called £1,000 a year, and not £800 with an allowance of £200 added. I want to get rid of this idea that we are called upon to make great self-sacrifice; because it must be a sham. For what are we called upon to make this self-sacrifice? To put it plainly, it is not for the good of the country, or, if it were, each one should be called upon to pay an income-tax according to his means. This is a pretence of cutting down expenditure, in a way which, I am sure, will seriously affect the future good government of the country. So far as departmental and other expenditure is concerned, that may be left to the discretion of the Government; but when it affects the whole future government of the country, and practically puts a property qualification on those who may occupy the Government benches, and those who may also occupy these benches as honourable members, then, I say, the question is too large to be considered solely as a financial question; and I hope the House will not consider it in that light.

Mr. TURNBULL.—I once had the pleasure of proposing that the salaries of Ministers should be cut down to £1,000, and the objection was then made by the present Premier that it was a most unreasonable proposition, and that he could not consider that gentlemen who occupied so high a position in the country should receive salaries which could only be classed with the salaries of loan agents or insurance agents. I have always been in favour of a reduction of the salaries to the amount I have stated, and am glad that the Premier has now come round to my view. When we get into Committee on the Bill I shall have to point out one or two matters which will require amendment. The Premier has put his propositions before us in a manner which, I may say, is rather illusory. There are to be a certain number of Ministers, as stated by the honourable member for Caversham, who has supported retrenchment ever since he has been in this House, and who supported me on the occasion to which I have referred. He says that five Ministers should be the number. Now, I think the honourable gentleman said, in his second statement, that this depends upon whether the House reduces its number. That means six Ministers for three years, because three years must elapse before we can reduce the numbers of the members of this House, even if the Bill be passed at once. There is another important question. I agree with the last speaker that it would be better to fix the salary at £1,000, and let Ministers find their own residences. I understand that it is intended to sell the Ministerial residences; and I believe that it would be a mistake not to do that, for I have only just understood that all the furnishings in these houses have to be paid for by the country; and that must mean a great deal. I think we should give Ministers £1,000, that sum to include all residential allowances. However, I think one house should be kept for the Premier. It is an important position which he occupies, and, as there is a constant inflow of visitors to the colony, he should be put in a position to receive them. I am rather astonished, therefore, to see that he has thrown himself with the other Ministers, for I think that should not have been done. Now, I want to refer to a paper which was laid on the table this evening. That paper shows that 1,140 absentees—and I take it that it means individuals, because companies are mentioned separately—possess real property to the amount of £8,672,741, and personal property to the amount of £5,000,000 and over, bringing up the total to £8,785,435: that is to say, these 1,140 persons resident in England own one-tenth of the real and personal property in New Zealand. I say that such a thing as that ought not to exist, and it could not exist if some other system of taxation were provided. One-tenth of the real and personal property in New Zealand belongs to 1,140 absentees—there is the statement. Five millions odd of that means sheep; and what does that mean? That the whole of the clip of wool of these sheep is taken to England, and comes back to us in no shape or form to benefit this country. How can we wonder that the country is well-nigh ruined? Unless some means be adopted to alter this state of things the country must drift into misery and ruin. It is high time that this House took into consideration some means by which this property could be got at; and, until some step is taken in that direction, it is of no use our trying to retrench ourselves out of our difficulties. An honourable gentleman has said to me, "A progressive property-tax! You will drive property away by that. Property and money will not come here;" and then I heard that old story about a man having come out here with a large sum of money, but, hearing talk of a progressive property-tax, would not invest it. This man puts me in mind of the mystical Jack Robinson, whom you always hear of and never see. "Some one else had somewhere read in some newspaper." Why, a man cannot come to this country and invest £10,000. He cannot find a property in which to do it. The property of the colony is all mortgaged up to the eyes to the loan companies and the banks, and we are sending out of the colony three millions a year to pay them interest. And, be a man ever so willing to find investments for his money, he could not do it, unless he will take barren mountain-tops, or land which is comparatively worthless. It is all held by land companies, or is mortgaged to the outside creditor. A man came up to me the other day and said, "You know the North Island pretty well. Where can I get land? I went to the Land Company at Oamaru and asked them for land, and they wanted £17 an acre for front sections, and £12 an acre for back sections. I went to Paeroa, and they asked the same price. I went to Levels, and they asked the same price." How can you expect people to farm land and get a living from it at such prices as those? I have pointed out what would be the condition of England if she had to send out twice the amount of the interest on her National Debt, collecting no property-tax on it. The whole country would be ruined. Can we doubt that Gladstone, Hartington, and Salisbury would combine to take steps in the matter, to put a stop to such a state of things? We should have them putting a limit on the quantity of land that could be held, and we should not only find them taxing the foreign bondholder, but doing anything under which the people who were drawing this money out of the country could be made to pay a fair share of the taxation of the country. We talk of people coming here and investing their money. Why, under present conditions there is not room for the soles of their feet. What is the condition of the banks? Upwards of six millions of money lying on deposit, and three millions at interest. The savings-banks? A million and a half lying on deposit there. There is ten and a half millions which would be put into land if it could be had at any price which it would pay people to give. But there is no movement, no life. Consider the bank returns. A million less discount, a million worse off in their assets than they were last year. The country is going to ruin as fast as it can, because we will not institute the measures which would be for the good of the country. It is of no use tinkering about retrenchment. Your retrenchment will land you in greater difficulties. Your position will be very much worse next year than it is this year. The diminished expenditure will have its effect; and when the Premier meets Parliament next year he will have to tell us a much more sorrowful tale of deficiency than he has told us this year. I appeal to Ministers to rouse themselves. There are many men in this House who would support them, and endeavour to retain them in their present position if they would have—I will not say the honesty, but I will say—the straightforwardness to recognise the facts of the case, and come down and make propositions which the country is waiting for. The country wants but a chance. Fertile? None more so. Wealthy? None more so. In its bosom rest a productive soil, minerals, riches of all kinds. No country can compare with it. And these things lie dormant. Why? Because men cannot find room for investment. The lands are locked up. The facts disclosed by this return are the main causes of this depression at the present time. There are 1,140 persons, and they are absentees, who possess one-tenth of the whole of the real and personal property in the colony. The total taxable real property in New Zealand for 1886-87, as shown in the table to the Financial Statement, B.-6, p. 20, is £47,277,142; the total taxable personal property is set down at £43,505,588: total, £90,782,680. And by this return now laid on the table we find that one-tenth of that is owned by 1,140 people. Until some alteration is made in that condition of things—I do not know what the wisdom of the House will devise—we can look for nothing but trouble and depression.

Mr. LEVESTAM.—I intended to say a few words upon the Financial Statement, but, as it appears that the debate has collapsed, I shall not say what I intended to say. So far as this Bill is concerned, I cannot support it. I think £800 a year is not sufficient for Ministers, and I have not heard any argument in favour of this reduction—at least any good arguments. The only one I have heard was a bad one. It was made use of by the Minister of Education. He told us that, as long as we could get men like the Hon. Sir Frederick Whitaker to serve the country for £800 a year, it was idle to say that we could not get good men for the money. But I understand that Sir Frederick Whitaker has only accepted office for the session; and, if that is so, certainly he has not made any great sacrifice, because for a session's work he will get more than a session's honorarium. There is another proposal with which I do not agree at all—namely, that the Ministerial residences shall be sold; and I see, at the same time, that Ministers propose to increase the amount which they are to obtain as house-allowance from £150 to £200. I think that, when we have Ministers who may at any moment be turned off the benches, we can hardly expect them to take their furniture to Wellington and ship it back again; and I think as long as we have Responsible Government we must make provision for the Ministers. Now, we are told, also by the Minister of Education, that this is the first time within five years that any attempt has been made to live within our means. The honourable gentleman must remember—and he does remember, no doubt—that in 1885 the late Government did make an attempt to cause us to live within our means by increasing taxation. This Government say, "We will not increase taxation, but we will fund a lot of the debt and add it to the consolidated debt." Another clause in this Bill provides that the travelling-expenses shall not exceed £1,000 in one year. In speaking of travelling-allowances the Minister of Education said that, if the late Government had decreased the travelling-allowance expenses, they must have been very large in the past, as they were last year £57,000. When the honourable gentleman made that statement he was surely attempting to throw dust in the eyes of the people. The travelling-expenses of which we were speaking, and of which we have heard so much, were the expenses incurred by the Ministers, and the amount was something like £3,000 for the last year, which is said to be the largest sum expended by any Government, except by the Government in 1879, when the expenditure amounted to £3,558. I maintain that £1,000 for travelling-expenses is not enough; and, more than that, that the late Government considerably reduced the travelling-expenses as compared with what the Government preceding them spent. If you take the largest amount expended in one year, £3,000, and multiply it by the number of years they were in office, that gives £9,000. Let us see what the previous period, from 1879 to 1884, was. It amounted to £12,121 18s. for travelling-expenses. But, besides the amount which they had for travelling-expenses, they had Royal Commissions which cost the country £80,419; or, altogether, from 1879 to 1884, £42,416 7s. 2d. was spent in travelling-expenses. And what was the result of the expenditure? It was nothing. I will say, at the same time, that this included the survey of the West Coast, and the expenses of the Commissioners of the Melbourne Exhibition; but the other expenditure incurred was such as was no earthly good to the country: for instance, the inquiry into the constitution of the Civil Service, which cost £1,696 11s. 7d.; and the inquiry into the commercial value of the railways yet to be constructed, which cost £2,732 0s. 3d. Then there were a number of other Commissions: for instance, I can mention one, as to which was the best route for the main trunk line—the East Coast or the inland route—and after the money had been spent the Government had not the courage to make up its mind which line should be chosen. It is all very well to blame the late Government for having spent money in travelling, but I maintain that the travelling they undertook did a vast amount of good to the country, and gave a great deal of satisfaction. During the time that Government was in office we had no complaint that this district or that was neglected, and I believe that every district received justice. I have a large number of notes that I made upon the Financial Statement, but, as the subject has been pretty well threshed out, I do not intend to detain the House. I merely make these few remarks on the Bill now under consideration, and say that I object to it in toto. I object to the reduction of the salaries, because I believe that, if we ask men to conduct our affairs, we should at all events place them in such a position that they will not be sacrificing themselves and their families for the good of the country. I believe also that the travelling-allowances are too small, and that it is very unwise to place a limit upon them, because, if you do, it really means Royal Commissions again, and Royal Commissions are responsible to no one. If we have a Government, it is responsible, and I think its members should make themselves acquainted with all parts of the country. I shall not support the second reading of the Bill.

Colonel FRASER.—In the few remarks I am going to make I shall confine myself entirely to the Bill now before the House. I shall support the Government in the reductions they propose in this as in their other Bills; but I decidedly object to the increase in Ministerial house-allowances from £150 to £200, and I also think that the number of Ministers should be reduced to five. The proposal is to reduce them when the reduction in the number of the members of the House takes place. That, we know, cannot possibly take place for three years. When the Bill goes into Committee I shall certainly support the idea of the honourable member for Caversham, that the number of Ministers be reduced to six at once, instead of at the end of three years. This, however, is a matter that can be further discussed in Committee, and I shall not further take up the time of the House.

Dr. NEWMAN.—When this Bill goes into Committee there are two or three amendments I should like to make. It seems to me that a clause should be inserted to this effect: that when a Ministry is defeated in this House its pay should cease. Under the present arrangement, when a Ministry is defeated the honourable gentlemen composing it have one of two choices. If they go out of office at once, all the emoluments and et-ceteras of office go with them; but if they appeal to the Governor, and the Governor gives them a dissolution, they can hang on to office for four or five months, and have all the luxuries and sweets of office, and a chance of continuing in office afterwards. It must always appeal to them in this way: "Shall we go out of office at once and lose all the sweets of office, or appeal to the country?" I know that in a great majority of cases they appeal to the country, and the country always sends them back weaker than they went to it. These constant requests for dissolutions would not, I think, be made if the perquisites and sweets of office were to cease on the day of the dissolution of Parliament. And, even if that does not occur, what does occur is this: that always at the members of every Ministry is levelled the vulgar taunt that they are keeping office for the sake of its sweets and emoluments; if the Ministry were composed of angels the same taunt would be made, and if any delay took place it would be said that they were delaying the elections for the sweets of office. I think, in the interests of the colony, it would be of great advantage if a clause were put in saying that pay, house-allowance, and travelling-expenses of Ministers should cease.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Who would carry on the business of the country?

Dr. NEWMAN.—My honourable friend asks, Who would carry on the business? Sir, it is their duty to resign, and not to make these constant appeals to the country. When the House has met the Government with a vote of want of confidence the country behind it is always more against the Government than the House is; and the whole experience of the Australian Colonies for years past has proved it. As Lord Salisbury said, "Whenever a Ministry goes to the country for its verdict, its answer is, 'You must go.'" I believe if the clause I suggest were inserted there would be no appeals to the Governor for a dissolution, and, at all events, that a great deal of ugly language that is now hurled against the Government would cease. Then, I should like to see the question of the travelling-allowances considered. This Bill says they shall have travelling-allowances of £1 10s. a day, but the whole amount shall not be greater than £1,000. To my mind that clause is insufficient. It says they shall not receive more than £1,000, but there is no penalty attaching to it if they go to £1,400, £1,500, or £1,600. It would be like unauthorised expenditure. We pass Acts saying they shall not do it, but there seems to be no power to restrain them from incurring extra expenditure. I believe it would be a great deal better if a clause was put in defining more strictly what are "travelling-expenses," because we have seen such a thing in the past as the "Hinemoa" travelling about with one Minister, when the Union Company's steamers were running in all directions; we have seen Ministers taking special trains when they were unnecessary, as they are unnecessary with the regular trains running as frequently as they now do. And it would be a good thing to have a clause inserted preventing the running of trains for Ministers, excepting under cases of grave emergency. These trains, in the past, have cost the country a very unnecessary amount of money, and there can be no question there should be a more careful supervision over this expenditure, either through the Audit or by some other means. We have known of Ministers, when they might make a journey by the ordinary coach for £5, take special conveyances and cost the country £60 or £70. We have seen the travelling-allowance of a single Minister run to six or seven or eight hundred pounds. This Bill keeps down the travelling-allowances to £1,000 per annum; but, if the Ministers wished to be extravagant, there is nothing to prevent the travelling-expenses from being run up to more than £1,000; and I should like to see the Bill made more definite.

Mr. M. J. S. MACKENZIE.—I entirely agree with the Bill before the House, and sincerely trust that no honourable members, for the mere sake of opposition to the Government, will place themselves in an attitude of hostility to the retrenchment which has been demanded by the country in this and other matters. I think the Government are to be congratulated upon having dealt with their own salaries in the radical and thorough manner in which they have done. Now, that is all I have to say on that subject; but, with your kindly permission, Sir, and in accordance with your ruling, I propose now to discuss the Governor's Salary and Allowances Bill. I regret that I missed my opportunity of saying a word or two upon that Bill, and will do so now.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I did not say that honourable members could go back and reopen a debate that has been closed, but that in discussing money Bills the power of the finances to bear the expenditure involved in them was within the latitude of debate.

Mr. M. J. S. MACKENZIE.—Then, Sir, I shall not go back to that Bill; but, as we can go over the Financial Statement—I understand you have laid that down—I propose to allude to the matter as dealt with there. A proposal has been made to save some £2,500 upon the Governor's salary; and the objection has been raised, and it is a serious one, that it is liable to alter the calibre and standing of the colonial Governors who may be sent here for the future. My reason for saying a few words is that I believe I have a valuable suggestion to throw out, if the Premier will kindly listen to what I have to say. I believe that neither the sum of £5,000, as it is proposed it should be, nor the sum of £7,500, as it has been, is altogether sufficient to attract here as Governor any person in England who has in political life a good prospect before him, and, consequently, that as between the two sums it matters little which is accepted; but I believe it is quite possible to get a first-class Governor for a smaller sum, and my suggestion is that the Government of this colony should place itself in communication with the Governments of the Australian Colonies in order to suggest to the English Government that, for the future, they should confine their patronage in the matter of Governors to colonists who have achieved a recognised position in political life, when such are entirely eligible. I know I am not in order in alluding to a previous debate, and I shall not do so, but I shall merely mention that a demand has arisen in some quarters—a very improper and highly -injurious demand, as I think—that the Governors should be elected.

Sir G. GREY.—Hear, hear.

Mr. M. J. S. MACKENZIE.—The honourable member for Auckland Central says, "Hear, hear;" but on this question, as on some others, I, with much respect, differ in opinion from the honourable gentleman, because what he advocates is a constitutional change of a very grave character. But I believe the same object could be attained if the Home Government would confine their patronage to those colonists who have achieved recognised positions, such, for instance, as Agents-General. I believe that no better Governors are to be got anywhere, not at all disparaging those gentlemen who have so ably filled the position in the past in Australia and here. I think colonists would make excellent Governors so long as they were not sent to colonies where their political life had been passed. There is another advantage to be gained from the adoption of this plan—namely, that politicians achieving positions, such as Premiers and leaders of Opposition, might be chosen Governors of neighbouring colonies; and I will candidly admit that I should like to see the present Premier and the leader of the Opposition both promoted to the positions of Governors, the one as Governor of New South Wales and the other as Governor of Victoria or some other place. I do not wish to suggest, in the language of Lord Halifax, that these honourable gentlemen should be "kicked upstairs;" but I believe it is a kind of promotion that would stimulate young men in this colony to labour hard in political life, seeing that such a fine prospect was before them; and by the adoption of this course, instead of the one advocated by the honourable member for Auckland North, we should run no risk of bringing about a disastrous constitutional change, or of severing our connection with the English Government. I hope the Premier has paid attention to what I have said, and will remember it on some occasion, with a view to suggesting the change I have indicated.

Mr. ALLEN.—Sir, I am extremely astonished at the speech just delivered by the honourable member for Mount Ida. I do not know whether he intended me to follow his example, but I think I may say that, as the example is an extremely bad one, I am not going to follow it. The question of the Governor's salary was discussed and disposed of; yet he rises up and wastes the time of the House in discussing that measure.

Mr. M. J. S. MACKENZIE.—I rise to a point of order. Is the honourable member in order in saying that I, in following your ruling, and discussing a serious question, am wasting the time of the House?

Mr. SPEAKER.—That is no point of order, and I do not think the language was meant to be in any way offensive.

Mr. M. J. S. MACKENZIE.—It is the expression "wasting the time of the House." That has been ruled out of order in the House of Commons.

Mr. SPEAKER.—There is no point of order raised, and no ground for the Speaker to interfere; but probably the honourable member would himself admit that the proper time for him to express his opinion on the Governor's salary was when the Bill relating to it was under discussion.

Mr. ALLEN.—If I have hurt the honourable gentleman's feelings I am exceedingly sorry, and beg to apologize; but I think it would be trespassing on your generosity, Sir, and on the generosity of the House if I followed the example of the honourable member. I am going to get at the point at issue instead, and that is, the Bill now before the House. The honourable member for Nelson has had the audacity to tell this House that he saw no argument in favour of this Bill. Surely he could not have listened to the Premier and several others who followed that honourable gentleman. There were two arguments that disclosed themselves to anybody of ordinary capabilities: one, the argument of economy; and the other, the argument of example. Now, the economy argument has not yet been fully put before the House, because it is so self-evident; but if the honourable gentleman had calculated for himself he would have found that, whereas under the old Act the Prime Minister got £1,750, and six Ministers £1,250 each, altogether £9,200, under the present Act they only get £5,800: that is to say, there is an actual saving of £3,400. I admit that there is an increase in the house-allowance from £150 to £200, but that does not materially affect the question at issue. And, then, there is the saving of travelling-allowance, which is reduced by a considerable amount—from two guineas a day to £1 10s.; and this is limited to £1,000 in the year. Under the old Act there was no limit to travelling-allowance; but in this Bill there is a limit, and I think the provision a very wise one. That is the argument of economy, and I hope the honourable member for Nelson will take it to heart. He preaches economy so much that this measure ought to commend itself to the honourable gentleman's support. Then, there is the argument of example; and I must say that I was astonished at the remarks which fell from the honourable member for Parnell—a speech consisting of one mass of inconsistencies. In the first half of his speech he said that the mere fact that Ministers were reducing their salaries was of no use as an example; and then he went on to discuss the house-allowance, and said that if they had put the lot at £1,000 that would have been a good example, and that example was everything. If example was something, I think we may take it that the example set by the Government themselves in this matter is something. And I think it is one of the greatest points in the reductions that it tells the country that the Ministers are prepared for self-sacrifice, and that they expect the country also to make sacrifices in some way.

Mr. PERCEVAL.—It is too late now to commence any new questions, so I suppose I shall not be accused of wasting time. I think the Government are to be congratulated upon the motives that have actuated them in bringing down this measure; but I must confess that, in my opinion, they have gone to the opposite extreme. During the late elections no doubt this question was raised and discussed very freely, and I think the opinion of the country was very strong in its denunciation of the travelling-allowances. But I do not think the country objected to the salaries which Ministers drew before. What I wish particularly to draw attention to is this: that it would, I think, be a step in the right direction if we could sweep away travelling-allowances altogether. I cannot see why the salary should not be of sufficient amount to cover travelling-allowances. It seems to me that that would prevent what has occurred with every Ministry—a charge of spending extravagant sums in travelling; and I should like to see the clause relating to travelling-allowance done away with altogether. With reference to the house-allowance, I suppose that was inserted because the Government have not made up their mind whether they will sell the Ministerial residences or not. Of course, if they are to be sold, then it is much better to tack £200 on to the salary and make it £1,000 and £1,250 a year—what it is really meant to be. But, Sir, I do not think that £1,000 and £1,250 a year is a sufficient salary for Ministers of the Crown. I thought that the honourable member for Sydenham made some very pertinent remarks on this subject. It seems to me to be altogether derogatory to the dignity of a Minister of the Crown that he should not receive more than those who are under him. We pay Judges—and Railway Commissioners, if the Bill passes—considerably more than that, and it seems to me to be putting Ministers of the Crown in a false position altogether. I feel sure the country does not grudge a liberal salary to Ministers. What the country does grudge is an unknown quantity in the nature of travelling-allowance.

Mr. W. P. REEVES.—In the few remarks I wish to make I shall refer principally to the speech of the honourable member for Dunedin East. I cannot hope to rival that honourable gentleman's emphatic way of laying down the law in this House, because I am, like him, a young member, and I hardly apprehend that it would be good taste in me to refer to the "audacity" of previous speakers, or to denounce the speeches of experienced and able members of this House as consisting of "masses of inconsistencies." Nor do I sit so near the Premier as to get audible "tips" as to the information I am to give to this House. Therefore my speech will be a little empty as compared with that of the honourable member. Nor had I the honour to contest an election with a prominent Minister of the Crown; so that I have not come here ready armed with strings of platitudes on the imaginary sins and personal extravagances of Ministers. My views are therefore somewhat different from those of the honourable member for Dunedin East. It is my dispiriting duty to make a useless—I was going to say solitary, but I am glad to see that I am not solitary—protest against this theatrical and flashy retrenchment of the Government. This is not the real thing; it is a theatrical retrenchment waved in the eye of the country, to delude constituencies into the belief that the axe is being laid to the root of the tree. So far it is not being laid. We do not know what they are going to do. But of this I am certain: that this is not real retrenchment in the true sense of the word. If it is economy, it is economy run mad. The result will merely be that, after reducing salaries, now far too low, we shall put up the salaries to their original figure far too soon. I am not opposed to a just and moderate reduction of Ministerial salaries, but I am opposed to reducing the highest people in the country to a scale of pay given to a moderately-good manager. I agree with the honourable member for Christchurch South that the country should not decline to pay its highest officers a decent salary. If this country is to be governed by Ministers, we should pay them with no niggard hand; and, though I admit that the finances of the colony are not precisely in a flourishing condition, still I do not think we have fallen so low as that we need degrade ourselves by paying Ministers the salaries of second-rate managers. I have no doubt there are gentlemen in Wellington who are quite ready to hold forth on the subject of travelling-allowances; but I think that honourable members who come here from outlying districts will look with a jealous eye on any plan that proposes to cut down the travelling-allowances to such an extent as to reduce the travelling done by Ministers. It is most necessary to the distant parts of the colony that Ministers should habitually make tours of the country, in order to make themselves acquainted with local wants and to listen to local grievances. Unless this is done all our administration will simply be done by a huge bureaucracy here in Wellington; it will simply be government by heads of departments, who, having Ministers always by them, will keep them under their thumbs. I look with considerable apprehension not only at this, but at other measures the Ministry is bringing down, all in the direction of centralising government. Land Boards are to be done away with; there is to be a Central Board of Railway Commissioners not amenable to political pressure; and there are various other measures tending in the same direction. I do not wish to detain the House longer, nor shall I move an amendment against this Bill; but I must raise my voice against this retrenchment run mad, and against this sliding into Centralism under the guise of economy.

Mr. WALKER.—Sir, I must say a few words on this measure, as I look on it as an example meaning that the Government intend to order our expenditure all in the same proportion. Hitherto our official salaries in this country have been very much on the same scale as official salaries in the greater Australian Colonies, and on a higher scale than salaries in other parts of the world. In the North American Colonies, for instance, salaries are very much lower proportionately than here. I will not pretend to say whether we have been right in the past or wrong; but, at all events, apparently, the voice of the country goes in this direction: that our present circumstances do not warrant the salaries now paid, and they must be retrenched. This being so, Ministers have no doubt put this Bill forward in the first group of their measures as an earnest of the reality of their intentions as to retrenchment. I do not blame them for that; I think it was probably the impulse of generous and honourable men to do it, and I will not go so far as to say they have made a mistake, because I believe the country demanded it of them and us. But all I say is that I hope, while thinking of their own salaries, they will also think of other high salaries in this country; and, if Ministers of the Crown are fairly paid at from £800 to £1,000 a year, it will be a monstrous incongruity if other dignitaries receive salaries nearly twice as large. The honourable member for Sydenham has referred to this subject in a question he has on the Order Paper, and I was surprised that he did not touch on it in his remarks just now.

Mr. TAYLOR.—It was entirely an oversight. I promised my constituents that I would do my utmost to get the Judges' salaries reduced, and I will do it.

Mr. WALKER.—I maintain that, if the Premier of the colony is fairly paid with £1,000 a year, the Chief Justice will be paid as well with £1,000, and if the other Ministers are sufficiently paid with £800 the Puisne Judges ought not to be paid more than that amount. I have taken out a few figures on this subject, and I find that in the North American Colonies they are, as a rule, much more economical than we in the Australasian Colonies in this respect. In the Dominion of Canada there is a population of five millions, and there the Premier is paid £1,643 a year, and the other Ministers £1,443; and the Judges are paid at the same rate, the Chief Justice getting the same as the Premier. Coming to the provinces of Canada, there is Ontario, with a population of about two millions—nearly four times as large as that of this colony—and there the Ministers receive £800 to £1,000, as proposed here, and the Judges £1,200 to £1,400. I would not reduce the Judges to the same level as Ministers; but these figures show that in that large colony they pay less than we do here, and far less proportionately. In Quebec, with a population of about one and a half millions, Ministers are paid £800 to £1,000, and the Judges £1,000 to £1,200. In Nova Scotia, with a population of about half a million, the Ministers are paid £320 to £486, and the Judges £800 to £1,000. I think, at all events, at the present juncture Ministers should take this matter into consideration, and see that salaries of different high officers are not disproportionate one with another. Any reduction should be proportionate all round. Here are proposals to reduce the salary of the Governor, the salaries of Ministers, and the honoraria of members; and I think Ministers should also take the Judges' salaries and every high salary in the whole public service into account, and make proportionate decreases, whether those salaries are fixed by Act or not; and in this they would be supported by every sincere economist in the House, of whom I am happy to be one.

Mr. STUART-MENTEATH.—It seems strange to me that an honourable gentleman who has had so much experience in politics as the honourable member for Ashburton should take so sordid a view of the position of a politician. I would not for a moment impute a sordid motive in political life to the honourable gentleman, but I think he has lost sight of the true motives which animate, or, at all events, are supposed to animate, all public men. It would be a disgraceful thing for the country if gentlemen who took part in its public affairs should be actuated merely by motives of salary—if, when aspiring to the proud position of Premier, or to a seat on the Government benches, they thought only of the emoluments of the office. I do not think that is a consideration with those who aspire to positions in which they can largely mould the future of a new country and guide its political institutions. They do not consider whether the salary is £1,000, or £2,000, or £500 per annum. Now, the position of a Judge of the Supreme Court is an entirely different thing from that of a Minister of the Crown. It is simply a professional position taken by men who have qualified for it; men who have displayed qualities which are very rare, and qualities which require a great deal of training and special knowledge in order to fit the individual for the post. It is entirely on a different footing from that of an honourable gentleman who aspires to a seat on the Treasury benches. There is no analogy whatever between the position of a Judge and that of a Minister of the Crown. I repeat, I am surprised that the honourable member for Ashburton should have instituted such a comparison in this House, as I think it is calculated to lower the whole tone of our politics if we look at the Ministerial position only from the point of view of the salary attached to it. I only rose to object to the remarks of the honourable gentleman; and, as to the question of salaries generally, I think it has been frequently ignorantly discussed, and that it has been misapprehended by the people of the colony.

Mr. MILLS.—I intend to support this Bill, although, I think, perhaps Ministers have rather overdone it in their evidently sincere desire to meet the wishes of the people of the colony by commencing the retrenchment with themselves. I think they might very well have made the salary of ordinary Ministers £1,000, even if they reduced the number of Responsible Ministers, or if they paid only four Ministers at that rate and had two other Ministers holding the less important portfolios at a lesser rate, so that the total did not come to more than it will under this Bill. However, I welcome the Bill as showing the earnestness of Ministers in their determination to effect retrenchment; and I hope they will show the same earnestness and determination in every other direction, and I hope it will be followed by equal earnestness in making a greater reduction by lessening the number of members, and that honourable members will equal Ministers in earnestness when the question of reducing the honorarium comes before us. Some honourable members have said that the salaries now proposed for Ministers are too little, and that the reduced honorarium will not be enough for the positions of members of this House; but I think that in applying the reduction first, and on so considerable a scale, to Ministers and members of the Legislature we shall be doing right, for the reason that they have done so much in bringing the country into its present pass. It is only right, therefore, that they should be the first to make the sacrifice that all members of the community have to make now. I do not agree with the honourable member for Ashburton that the salaries of the Judges and other high officers should necessarily share the same fate as the salaries of Ministers; because the Judges have had a lifelong training for their positions, and they, at all events, have had no share in bringing about the present state of affairs in the country, but rather the reverse perhaps.

Mr. WARD.—I also am going to support this Bill; but I should like briefly to express my views on the subject before voting. I recognise that the position of a Minister of the Crown is one of a very responsible nature, and I do not believe the salaries recently paid are too high for those positions. But, no doubt, in the present circumstances of the country a reduction is essential, though I should have preferred to see the salary of the Premier not brought below £1,250, and those of the other Ministers £1,000. But, as the honourable gentlemen think it desirable to go beyond that and reduce still further, I must give them my cordial support. I think, however, it would be better if the reduction were made of a temporary character, and not permanent; because I recognise that perhaps in years to come so low a rate may deter gentlemen eminently fitted from trying to attain the position of Ministers. No doubt there may be always gentlemen living here ready to take the positions for £300 a year or even less; but others having their business in distant parts of the colony might not be able to see their way to leave those businesses and to remain here doing public work except at a larger salary than is now proposed by this Bill. The House must be careful not to overdo those matters, lest it lead to that most undesirable thing, class legislation. However, I think that in the present state of the country's finances it is a step in the right direction, and I will support the Bill.

Mr. GOLDIE.—I shall support the Bill now before the House; but, like the honourable member for Caversham, I am sorry that the Government have not determined to make the number of the Ministry five instead of seven. I am pledged to that, and when the Bill goes into Committee I shall be prepared to move in that direction. A very great deal has been said to-night about the salaries being very low indeed; but honourable members seem to forget that at least three of the Australian Colonies are only paying Ministers £1,000 a year, and Tasmania pays only £900. I am sorry the Ministry have not decided to sell the whole of the Ministerial residences. They cost £8,600; and during the last eight years there has been expended in repairs and additions £2,756, making a total of £11,356. In addition to that, during the last two years £2,408 has been expended on furniture; and several public servants have been taken from their ordinary duties to attend at these residences. I understand that at one time the cost per annum of the services of a gardener at each residence was £69 9s. 2d.; but now three of these residences have a gardener each, and the fourth has two constantly employed; and, in addition to this, tradesmen from the Public Works Department are largely employed in making repairs and additions. I hope Ministers will see their way to sell the whole of these residences. I think it would be cheaper and better for the colony to pay a house-allowance. I shall certainly support the Bill as it now stands, with the hope that when it goes into Committee we shall be able to make a further reduction by reducing the number of Ministers from seven to five.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Government Loans to Local Bodies—Midland Railway Revised Contract.

GOVERNMENT LOANS TO LOCAL BODIES.

The Hon. Dr. POLLEN, in moving the motion standing in his name, said honourable members would remember that in 1886 an Act was passed called the Government Loans to Local Bodies Act. By a return which was placed on the table of the Council in the first session of this year it was shown that transactions to the extent of more than a quarter of a million had taken place under the authority of that Act. The Council would not be indisposed, he hoped, to receive further information as to the operation of the Act, as they would probably be invited to consider whether the administration of that Act had been so satisfactory that some inquiry ought not to be made into it with a view of imposing some checks, which experience he thought had shown to be necessary. It was with that view he now moved the motion.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That a return be furnished (in continuation of that presented on the 10th May, in accordance with the provisions of section 50 of 'The Government Loans to Local Bodies Act, 1886'), brought up to 30th September ultimo, and showing: (1) What applications have been made under that Act by local authorities, and which of them have been granted or refused, and the case may be; (2) what sums have been granted or advanced by local authorities, and for what purposes, and the names of such authorities; (3) what sums have been borrowed or raised by the Colonial Treasurer, and what were the then outstanding liabilities and assets."—(Hon. Dr. Pollen.)

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE was glad to see his honourable friend taking a step in this direction. He wished the honourable gentleman would go still further in the matter. He would point out that unless the Act was worked very judiciously it might involve the colony in serious liabilities, and he therefore thought its operation ought to be very closely watched indeed. In looking into the Gazette from time to time he observed what was being done in connection with this Act, and some of the notices had struck him as being of a rather extraordinary character. The Hon. Mr. McLean, last session, had brought some of the peculiarities of this Act under the notice of honourable members. He referred to a case where a district was constituted with only one voter, and this voter, on his own property, got an advance from the Government of £50. There were others where the voters only numbered two, and others in which he (Mr. Waterhouse) maintained that there had been no care exercised to protect the interest of persons who had no possible interest in the works to be constructed, but whose properties were included in the rating-areas. To show how loosely, as he thought, the Act was worked, he would call attention to a notice appearing in the last Gazette, issued on the 24th November. There was a notice there of a public body in Pahiatua desiring to raise a loan of £1,500. The notices were published for three months, and the plans and estimates were published and exhibited; but at the last moment the proposition was changed into one for borrowing £500. This was perfectly illegal, and yet it must have been regarded as a legal operation: being published in the Gazette, the Law Officers of the Crown must have thought so. He hoped the attention of the Government would be directed to this subject. He especially invited the attention of his honourable friend Mr. Stevens, because he could appreciate the importance of the subject. He trusted his honourable friend would not allow the matter to drop, but would cause a thorough investigation into the modus operandi of this Act to be made by the Government. If there was not time to do it this session, he hoped the honourable gentleman would himself take the matter up next session, and move for a Select Committee to inquire thoroughly into it.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS said the Government would have this return prepared as soon as possible; but he thought it right to say that, in connection with any return in continuation of the return before the House in accordance with the Act, if the same details were to be used it would take a very considerable time to prepare, and he questioned whether it could be produced in that form within the time they were likely to be in session. In some form, no doubt, the return could be prepared so as to give his honourable friend the general results, which might suffice for his purpose. The Hon. Mr. Waterhouse had made special reference to the importance of the attention of the Government being kept directed to the administration of this Act. He might say he would undertake that the thing should not be lost sight of, and, as the honourable gentleman made a special reference to himself, he would endeavour to do his best to see that proper care was taken in all cases where public bodies were seeking loans under the Act of last year. The subject was one of very great importance. Honourable members who were present when the Act was passed were very much alive indeed, many of them, to the importance of the Act. Up to the present time, however, he had not had an opportunity of seeing how the Act had been administered, or rather used, by the local bodies.

Motion agreed to.

MIDLAND RAILWAY REVISED CONTRACT.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER.—Sir, I would first of all call the attention of honourable members to what passed in the year 1884. An Act was then passed for the purpose of enabling certain persons to form a company for the purpose of making this Midland line of railway, which was then called by another name—the East and West Coast Railway: however, it is the same railway as mentioned in the Act of 1884. The Act provided that there should be a contract made between the Crown and certain parties. In accordance with that, on the 17th January, 1885, a contract was made with a gentleman of the name of Chrystal, of Canterbury, and eight or nine other gentlemen, to make this railway within ten years. The next step in this matter was to transfer their rights to the company, and their interests were transferred to a company in England, and there was a memorandum of association, in which it was agreed that the company should take over this railway. In pursuance of that, a deed was made between the contractors on the one part and the company on the other part, which was duly signed and executed on the 30th April, 1886. Then, the next step in the matter was this: In 1886 a Bill was passed by the General Assembly legalising this contract with Messrs. Chrystal and Co., and authorising the transfer to the Midland Railway Company, the company having at that time been formed; and the company undertook to carry out the arrangements that had been made by Messrs. Chrystal and Co. The clause in reference to it will be found in the papers laid on the table, in the contract of the 30th April, 1886; and in it there is a stipulation to that effect, in the third paragraph, which reads as follows:—

"1. The contractors shall and will with all convenient speed, and within the term of ten years computed from the date of these presents, or within such further time after the expiration of that period as may be allowed in that behalf under these presents, at their own expense in all things, construct and completely finish a line of railway between Springfield and Brunnerton aforesaid, and Brunnerton and Belgrove aforesaid, and will construct such line of railway along the line shown in red upon the map marked 'A,' hereunto annexed, and known as 'the Arthur's Pass route,' to Brunnerton, and thence by way of Reelfton to Belgrove, or as near thereto as practicable; such railway to be constructed and, when completed, to be maintained and worked in all respects under and subject to the provisions of the principal Act and the said Act and of any other Acts relating thereto, and also under and subject to the terms and conditions of this contract."

In 1886 an Act was passed by the General Assembly recognising these several transactions, so that at present what we have to consider is, What should be the purport of that contract which it was agreed should be made, with the consent of the Agent-General, between the company and the Crown; and also what that contract should be which is contemplated in the Act of 1886. Honourable gentlemen will find in the schedule there are some provisions for altering the arrangements which had been made between Messrs. Chrystal and Co. and the Government. Those alterations have not been made up to the present time, nor has the contract been altered in any way as provided in the contract of April with the Midland Railway Company. The position, therefore, is this: There has, I think, been some misunderstanding; and honourable gentlemen may come to the conclusion that what is now proposed is to do away with the contract made under the Act of 1884, and to make a new contract. To a certain extent it is not to be a new contract; but there is a stipulation in the assignment, which was made with the consent of the Agent-General, authorised by the Government, that an additional contract should be made; that the contract with Chrystal and Co. should be done away with, and that a new contract should be substituted with the railway company; and the Act of 1886 confirms this, and provides that there shall also be certain alterations made; so that up to the present we are not entering upon the question whether we can make a contract or not. The question is, what that contract is to be. It was stipulated between Messrs. Chrystal and Co. and the Midland Railway Company that there should be a new contract, making the company directly liable and responsible to the Crown. They were at the time of the original contract of 1885 merely assignees; but in the assignment there is a stipulation that there shall be a direct contract between the Crown and the Midland Railway Company; and in the draft contract of 1887 that is carried out. It appears that a draft contract was agreed to on the 14th December, 1886, when the matter was gone into by the then Government, and the agent of the Midland Railway Company in New Zealand, and Mr. Brodie Hoare, one of the English directors. After some trouble this draft was prepared in the terms authorised by the Act of 1886. That was agreed to by the Government, and it was understood that there would be legislation for the purpose of validating that contract. It appears that the directors in England were not satisfied with the new contract in some particulars, and they made certain alterations. Negotiations took place for some time between the Agent-General in England and the company, and the result of it was that no agreement was come to as to certain points which the company raised and which the Agent-General was not authorised to accede to. The matter got into the position that, the Agent-General not being in London, the company framed a contract, which they sent out, asking the Government's consent to it. The then Government considered the matter, but, just at that time being about to resign, did nothing in reference to this contract; consequently it devolved upon the present Government to deal with the question. On looking into the matter it appeared to the present Government that what the company required was, first, what they were already entitled to; secondly, there were other demands to which there could be no objection; but there was a third class to which there was considerable objection. The Government then altered the contract into the form in which they wished it, and it was submitted to the company's agent—Mr. Alan Scott. An arrangement was then come to by which both parties appeared to be satisfied. The papers relating to the matter were laid before the Council, and were also laid before the House of Representatives; and, in the House, action was taken by the Government by moving that the whole of the contracts should be referred to a Committee of the House. The contract has been referred to a Committee of the House, and honourable members will find in the papers laid before this Council, or, rather, sent here by message, that the House of Representatives has passed a resolution asking the Council to concur in it. That was the purport of the message that came down here. It therefore has become necessary that the matter should be taken up by the Council; and my object in bringing the matter before the Council to-day is to move that the resolution passed by the House of Representatives adopting the report of their Select Committee should be concurred in by the Council. It would be quite useless for me to go through the whole of this matter, which honourable members have had before them for some time, and comment on the papers detailing the arrangements and alterations that have been made from time to time, as all the papers relating thereto have been laid on the table of the Council. I think it is only necessary that I should call the attention of the Council to the three important matters: first, to subsection (c) of clause 2, which is as follows:—

“(c.) All lands which from time to time, in the opinion of the Governor, are or may be required for bonâ fide mining for gold or silver, and the several purposes connected therewith or incidental or conducive thereto, and which land shall from time to time be set apart and defined by Proclamations to be issued on that behalf; but no more than 10,000 acres shall be so set apart or proclaimed in one block at any one time; and the land so set apart and proclaimed from time to time shall not in the aggregate exceed 750,000 acres.”

The Government insisted on an alteration of the draft contract as it stood, because it appears that under the Act of 1884 there was some difficulty as to what should be set apart for mining purposes. Under subsection (9) of clause 8 I apprehend that all that could have been taken for gold-mining would have been where there were actual workings. That would have been a very inadequate provision, and would have enabled the company to take a very large area of land which undoubtedly some day or other will become workable for gold-mines; and some portions, I believe, since that time have become so workable. It appeared absolutely essential that the Government should make some provision by which they could prevent this clause being used only for the purpose of particular places which were then being used for gold-mining purposes. There has been a very considerable amount of discussion on this clause, and between the Government, and the Committee, and Mr. Alan Scott—the representative of the company—it has been changed and altered from time to time, and it has resulted in this special clause which I have already read—that is, that the Crown may from time to time take such lands as they think fit out of a certain area on the West Coast, so long as in the whole they do not take more than 750,000 acres. It will be observed that the contract provides that there is to be a certain specified area within which the land under the contract is to be taken. That area has been defined on a plan for the purpose, and consists of a large area, containing some nine million acres of land. The Government are placed in this position: Although the company have power to select land within this nine-million-acres area, certain lands are excluded, bringing down the probable amount to about six million acres from which the company can take their land, the Government having the power to make a deduction of 750,000 acres, as gold-mining appears to be available at particular spots. Provision is also made in another portion of the contract that, whenever the company is about to select land, they shall give two months' notice, so that the Government may make up their minds whether the land proposed to be taken is a portion of the land they have a right to reserve under the contract. That is one of the important clauses. Another important clause is clause 3. It is probably the most important clause in the contract. That is this: Supposing that, at the end of the time, after the railway has been made, it is found that this 2,304,000 acres is insufficient to realise £1,250,000, the company then have the right of selecting other lands for the purpose of making up £1,250,000. The company contend that there is an implied contract between the company and the Government, that they should have land to the value of £1,250,000. The company contended that if there was a deficiency when the land was sold that deficiency should be made up by giving them other land. In the draft contract the stipulation was general, so that land could have been taken in any part of New Zealand in point of fact. Of course that was objectionable. That was a matter the Government could not agree to. They therefore limited the area within which this land was to be selected to the area which had been set apart within which they were to make their original selections, so that, in point of fact, they could not go outside of that six million acres, which includes a great part of the land between Springfield and the West Coast. A good deal of discussion has taken place as to the form this should take, and especially as to whether or not it was perfectly clear that the company have no kind of claim on the Government for anything with the exception of a selection out of the specified area, and no claim for a money compensation. The provision now made is this:—

"3. Within three months after the expiration of one year from the completion of the said railway an account shall be taken of all moneys theretofore received by and then owing to the company as proceeds of the land granted to and sold by them, and as proceeds of their timber and coal, whether by way of purchase-money or royalty, and a valuation shall be made, either by agreement between the parties hereto or by arbitration as hereinafter provided, of all the land, timber, and coal of the company then unsold; and, if the aggregate of the moneys so received and owing, together with the sum of such valuation, shall not amount to £1,250,000, the company may, within six months thereafter, select further land out of the land then remaining unselected and described as available for selection under section 2 hereof to the extent of such land then remaining so available; but all such further land shall be valued either by agreement or arbitration as aforesaid, and the company shall not select any such further land to a value greater than the difference (if any) between the aggregate of the moneys so received and owing, together with the sum of such valuation as aforesaid, and the said sum of £1,250,000."

So that at the end of the time the provision is, that the money they have received from the sales of the land from time to time allotted to them, from the sales of timber, and the money they have received on account of coal—if coal be discovered—the whole of that is to be added, and if it fall short of £1,250,000 they are to receive the difference between that sum and £1,250,000 in land. In point of fact, it may be called a guarantee that they shall receive £1,250,000 provided that the land within what is called the "authorised area" shall be sufficient to reach that sum. There are a great number of other stipulations in the contract, but I think most of them are details, and are not very essential. They are mostly matters for carrying out the arrangement between the parties. There is a provision that any land that is to be sold shall only be sold according to a certified valuation, which is to be made and signed by the parties, and no land which is so valued is to be sold at a less price than is stated in that valuation, unless it is with the consent of the Crown. I do not know what course the Council may take in reference to this question, but the papers have now been a long time before the Council, and I apprehend that honourable members are in possession of all that is necessary to enable them to come to a determination. At present we have got before us the Act of 1884; the agreement of 1885; the Act of 1886; and the draft contract agreed to by the Government, the agents of the company, and Mr. Brodie Hoare, one of the English directors, as it was altered by the company in August, 1887—we have got all these papers to refer to for the purpose of dealing with this question; and the object of the Government and the Committee is that the contents of all these documents should be reduced to one contract. The resolution which has been passed by the House of Representatives has been directed to that end, namely,—

If the contract should be prepared during the sitting of the Assembly, an Act might be passed for the purpose of giving effect to it before the Assembly breaks up. It is proposed that the draft contract which I hold in my hand, as agreed to by the House of Representatives, shall override all the others, and that the others, with all the stipulations not inconsistent with this, shall be put into one contract and signed after the session under the authority of an Act of the Assembly, if it cannot be done during the session. Whatever course the Council may desire to take I shall be very happy to accede to it, and to give any information which may be required. I think it will be found that the new draft contract which has been agreed to by the House of Representatives is a reasonable settlement of differences between the company and the Government. I beg to move, That the Council concurs in the resolutions passed by the House of Representatives.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE.—This is too important a question to be passed with a silent vote, and I am sure my honourable friend the Attorney-General would be disappointed if this subject were not entered into rather more fully than it would be if you, Sir, had proceeded forthwith to put the question. My honourable friend has given to the Council a statement of the reasons which, in the opinion of the Government, render it desirable that the proposed contract should be assented to. He has to a certain extent traced the history of that contract. But things pass very quickly, and things once passed are apt to be forgotten: I think it will then perhaps be as well if we trace the history of this contract back to the very commencement of the effort to construct a railway from the east to the west coasts of the South Island. As honourable members are aware, this matter was originated by the legislation of 1881—the Railways Construction Act, which, except so far as it has been amended by subsequent legislation, will be incorporated with this contract. The Act of 1881 was passed with the view of securing the construction of certain railways that were approved by the Government, but which the Government did not feel justified in undertaking; and it held out a very important concession. That concession was, that grants of land should be made to the extent of 30 per cent. of the cost of making any railways, such cost to be calculated at an average of £5,000 per mile, so that under that Act land valued at £1,500 was to be given for each mile of railway constructed. Certain parties in Canterbury were anxious, and not unnaturally anxious, that a railway should be made from Christchurch to the West Coast, and, not unnaturally, they looked to see how far it could be made under the provisions of the Act of 1881. They arrived at the conclusion that these provisions were not sufficiently liberal, and therefore pressure was brought to bear upon the Legislature and upon the Government to pass a more favourable Act. This was favourably considered by Parliament, and in the year 1884 the East and West Coast Railway Act was passed. The Government at that time was the Government of Sir Robert Stout, and its representative in this Council was my honourable friend Mr. Buckley. The Hon. Mr. Buckley, in introducing that Act to the Council, said, "The object of the present Bill is to give power for the construction of a railway of this character without burdening the colony in any way." That was the basis upon which the Act of 1884 was passed—that it was not to burden the colony in any way. It made further concessions than were made in the Act of 1881, and the principal concession was with regard to the amount of land to be granted. It was agreed that a grant might be made to the extent of 50 per cent. of the estimated cost of the railway. The estimated average cost of this railway has been set down at £15,000 per mile, and the average grant therefore would be seven thousand five hundred pounds' worth of land per mile, being at the rate of 50 per cent. of the total cost, or five times as much as the maximum grant under the Act of 1881. Now, I think I am justified in saying there was no very sanguine feeling on the part of members of this Council, when passing the Act of 1884, that it would be effective in getting the railway made; but, nevertheless, in a short time persons were found who entered into a contract under that Act, a syndicate being formed to obtain the concessions offered. The Act was passed on the 6th November, 1884, and the agreement to carry out the railway in accordance with the Act was signed on the 17th January, 1885. The syndicate who signed it, finding their own means unequal to the work, not unnaturally went to England to obtain assistance, and, on the 30th April, 1886, this syndicate transferred their interest under the contract to a company formed in England with a view to carry out the work and obtain the concessions. The syndicate formed in the colony gave over their interest in the work, and also gave over their obligations under that contract to a company formed in England, who took over the contract, with the obligations founded on the Act of 1884. Some conversation appears to have passed at that time between the Agent-General in England and the company in London that was to take over the contract, and it is quite apparent that in the course of that conversation the railway-promoters in London suggested certain minor alterations which met with the concurrence of the Agent-General, and which he agreed to recommend to the Government of this colony. The concessions were of a very minor character indeed, but, nevertheless, as they were slightly in excess of those in the Act of 1884, an Act was passed in 1886 to enable a new contract to be entered into, based upon these small concessions. The London company took over the contract on the 30th April, 1886; and subsequently, after the passage of the Act of 1886, they entered into a fresh contract, as has been pointed out by the Attorney-General, with the Government, based upon the Act of 1886. This agreement was signed by the company's representative in the colony, Mr. Brodie

Hoare, on the 14th December last; so that, eight months after the London company had taken over the contract, they had obtained, with the concurrence of their representative in the colony, a further contract, embodying all the views they had entertained at the time they entered into the agreement for taking over the contract in April, 1886. This new contract of December, 1886, contained all the points that had been contended for by the company in England. For some reason or other, when Mr. Brodie Hoare arrived in England with the contract signed by himself and the Government, the London directors refused to confirm it. One cannot look through the correspondence upon this subject without arriving at the conclusion that by this time they had come to the decision that they were not strong enough financially to carry out the scheme upon their own strength, and that it was necessary that they should strengthen themselves, and they could not get strength unless they obtained some further concessions of such a nature as to satisfy London capitalists. The consequence was that this agreement, which had been made in accordance with their own expressed views, and which had been signed by their own representative, was not confirmed; but fresh proposals were made, and in August last they sent out a new contract, which had been drawn up without the concurrence, and apparently without the knowledge, of the Agent-General, but of which a copy was forwarded to him shortly after they forwarded a copy to the colony; and on this the Agent-General remarks,—

"It is obvious, therefore, that the whole character of the original contract of 1885, as well as the arrangement between the company and myself, is fundamentally altered; and, of course, such a contract as is now proposed by the company is impossible without an entirely new Act."

Sir, it is quite evident from this that all we had agreed to do, and more than we had agreed to do, had been done up to that time, and consequently there is not the slightest claim on the Government of the colony to go any further in the direction of concessions. At that time the company in England was undoubtedly bound to the colony to carry out that agreement; but, at the same time, the Government of the colony was only bound to carry out the agreement they had entered into. They were not bound—and up to May, 1886, they had not been asked—to make any further concession. Now, Sir, it is very singular that when this contract came out the late Ministry were in the agonies of their Ministerial death-throes, and could not deal with the matter, but the Premier and the Minister for Public Works both recorded that the fresh advances which were being made in the fresh contract sent out to the Government seemed to remove difficulties out of the way, and rendered the task of their successors a comparatively easy one. I scarcely know how they arrived at the conclusion that it removed the difficulties out of the way, when you look at the further concessions now

sought by the company. The concessions now asked in this contract to be made to the company are as follow: First of all, the alternate block-system is to be given up. As honourable members understand, under the first agreement the Government and the company were to take alternately blocks along the railway. That is a mode of making railways frequently adopted in thinly-peopled countries. Where this system is adopted it is taken as a fact that the completion of the railway will double the value of the land, and that therefore the value of the land given to the company will be recouped by the additional value given to the land retained by the Government. But now it is proposed to do away with this plan altogether, so that, while we give the land to the company, there will be no means provided whereby we can recoup to the colony the value of the land granted. We are therefore asked to make a great and startling change in the original contract—to make a concession that was never contemplated in the Act of 1884, and which I am satisfied, if it had been brought before us at the time this subject was formerly dealt with by Parliament, would never have been sanctioned. Another important alteration is in regard to the area of selection. That was extended, and I think it was wisely extended. The Hon. the Attorney-General has pointed out a reason for this. A change of this sort is necessitated by the desirableness of making sufficient reserves for mining purposes, which amount to 750,000 acres. It is proposed that there shall be an additional area of selection to counterbalance this. This additional area of selection will exceed 750,000 acres in extent, and everybody who looks at the plan will see that it comprises land that, on the whole, must be of considerably more value than the average of the land contained in the original area. Then, another important alteration was that in regard to the repayment of the interest paid during the time that the undertaking is not in full working order. That will amount to £400,000. Another important alteration, and, to my mind, one indicating more than anything else the absolute weakness of the company, is the provision that, when contracts to the amount of £60,000 are entered into, land to the extent of £30,000 shall be forthwith set apart with a view to being sold; so that it was contemplated that, before the works are actually begun, land should be received in payment to the extent of £30,000 upon a contract of £60,000. That is an important new feature. Then, Sir, the additional alteration proposed was as regards the guarantee of the value of the land given. The company stipulated for a guarantee—they refuse to acknowledge the term "guarantee," but all their arguments show plainly that they mean guarantee—that the land should be worth the sum stated, namely, £1,250,000, and not that it should, as provided by the Act of 1884, be deemed to be of the value of 10s. per acre. This last point is a very material point indeed, to which I shall again refer before I finish the few observations I have to make. I would only remark, in regard to the alterations proposed, that while the company propose these startling alterations they propose to give nothing in return for these concessions. The agreement does not provide for the completion of the railway, nor does it provide for any penalty in the case of the abandonment of the works; and it is just possible—I think I may say more than possible—that under the agreement as it now stands the colony may find itself in the position of having two incomplete ends of a railway without having any claim upon the contractors for a penalty for the non-fulfilment of their contract. I think, in giving concessions to the extent contemplated by this agreement, it would have been but right some counter-balancing advantage should have been offered to us in the shape, at any rate, of satisfactory security that, under the amended terms of the contract, these works should be carried out to a final completion. Now, Sir, I have gone through a statement of the history of this case because I think it very important to recall these circumstances to the minds of honourable members and to bring them under the notice of the colony generally. The statement I have given shows conclusively that in this matter the Government are not compromised at all; and if the Government chose to say, "There is your contract: we have passed the Act; we have fulfilled all the obligations of the contract," they would be quite justified in taking that stand, and the other parties could take no exception, either moral or legal, to the Government assuming such a stand. Now, Sir, I feel that the logical outcome of the statement of the case I have put is that I should vote against the Bill altogether. I cannot help feeling that that is the logical outcome of the whole affair; and, were I as logical in my acts as the Hon. the Attorney-General is in his speeches, that is the course I ought to take up. But I recognise there are circumstances connected with the case which render it desirable that the contract should be approved; and I am prepared to adhere to my former decision that it should pass if, in the words of the Hon. Mr. Buckley, it can do so without "burdening the colony in any way." If so, although disapproving of so many of the provisions of the contract, and thinking that we are scarcely justified in passing this measure on its merits, I will still give it my support. But, before I do so, there is one clause the effect of which must be thoroughly cleared up. The clause is that to which my honourable friend Sir Frederick Whitaker has referred—clause 8. He stated of this that, under that clause, at the completion of the works it was intended that we should give land to the value of £1,250,000, provided that there were lands in the area of selection available to that amount. Sir, as the honourable gentleman explained the intention of that clause, I could see nothing to take exception to; but my contention is that that is not the fair and proper reading of the clause; that it does not carry out what my honourable friend says is its intention; but that, on the contrary, if this agreement is consented to, at the completion of the works we shall be asked to make good that amount of £1,250,000 if land to that value is not found within the area of selection; and that we shall be, if not legally, at least morally bound to make up the amount. Under this clause we stipulate that, in the event of the lands selected not being worth £1,250,000, we will give other lands in the prescribed area to make up the stipulated sum. At the conclusion of the work, to turn round upon the contractors and say that, as there are not sufficient lands left to make up a deficiency which has been established in the valuation, therefore we are free from all liability in reference thereto, would be simply dishonest. I cannot be a party to it. It would be like the action of the man who, having bought and paid for a thousand bushels of wheat from a farmer subject to its being of a certain quality, and to a proviso that, in case there were not a thousand bushels of wheat of the required quality, then a selection should be made out of the other wheat on the farm, should be told that, as there was not sufficient wheat in the farm to make up the required deficiency, therefore the farmer was free from all responsibility to pay back the valuation he had received. It is clear to my mind, without being a lawyer, that under the working of the clause there would be a legal liability, and I have not the slightest shadow of a doubt that if there were not a legal liability there would be a moral responsibility. The Hon. the Attorney-General explained in his speech the intention of the 3rd clause, and he quite satisfied my mind on the subject; but unfortunately the clause does not read as he expressed its intention. It does not put in the proviso, provided that there shall be land to that amount. As honourable members are aware, this subject was referred by the other branch of the Legislature to a Select Committee. The Select Committee not unnaturally desired to have some legal advice on that subject, and applied to the Law Officers of the Crown for their opinion on the matter. The Solicitor-General did not send a written opinion, but he sent back the clause with words attached which in his opinion—and in that opinion it was stated the Attorney-General concurred—would make the clause absolutely safe. These words were adopted by the Committee; but afterwards, for some reason unknown to me, their decision was reversed. It is clear then that, in the opinion of the Solicitor-General, which was stated to be supported by the opinion of the Attorney-General, the addition of other words was requisite to make the clause absolutely secure, and, if the object was to carry out the intention as expressed by the Attorney-General on this subject, it seems to me that there should have been no objection to adding those words. If those words be added my objections will certainly be removed; but if those words, or similar words, be not added, and the matter is left in uncertainty, my objection to the contract will be so very strong, indeed, as to compel me to vote against it absolutely, for the simple reason that it would entail losses, and because I cannot help detecting something like dishonesty behind the whole thing. I cannot help feeling that, if this clause is passed in its present shape, there are those who will say, "If there is not the land to make the selection, the country is not bound to make up the deficiency;" while, on the other hand, the promoters of the Bill will say that the intention of the Act is that any deficiency in the valuation of the land should be made up. If the clause means what the Attorney-General contends is its intention, and if it carries that out, I am satisfied with it; but I think, with a view to ascertain that it really is so, the best thing would be to refer it to a Select Committee. And therefore I beg to move, That the proposed Midland Railway contract be referred to a Select Committee to inquire into and obtain legal opinions upon the effect of the 3rd clause, and more especially as to whether such clause sufficiently protects the colony from all claims for compensation: the Committee to consist of the Hon. Sir F. Whitaker, the Hon. Mr. Stevens, the Hon. Mr. Reeves, the Hon. Dr. Pollen, the Hon. Mr. Oliver, the Hon. Mr. Miller, and the honourable the mover. I can only say for myself that, if this matter is reported upon, and the opinion is given that the clause does sufficiently protect the colony from all claims for compensation, I shall give my vote in favour of the contract; but unless it is sufficiently established that the clause does protect the colony I shall consider it my duty to vote against it.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER.—Sir, I do not propose, after the exhaustive speech to which we have listened from the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse, to discuss the whole question of the character of the contract which is now before us for our approval or disapproval. I think the speech fairly led up to the proposal of a Committee; but I am a little disappointed in the narrowness of the order of reference which is proposed. There are one or two very important points which were alluded to by my honourable friend, and which, I think, demand some examination from the Committee, or, if not from the Committee, then from this Council. There is one subject, which I think of very great importance indeed, to which he did not refer at all. It is within the knowledge of the members of this Council that the system of subsidising railway companies has had very extensive application in the railway system of the United States. Large corporations have there undertaken the construction of great lengths of railways. They have done so encouraged by the concession of huge tracts of land, some of which they have never earned, but which they still enjoy; and it is known that the whole question of the position of these railways is a public scandal in the United States at the present moment. One very important objection which is now taken to the action of these companies is the result of their charging differential rates to various customers. In a book which has been recently added to the General Assembly Library, and which discusses the question of the dominance of these railway companies, one fact is referred to which alone proves the necessity of providing against the abuse which may arise from their action, and it is this: An allowance of rebates was made to a certain oil company, which in eighteen months amounted to no less a sum than ten million dollars. The differential charges are a very great scandal, and are not in the interests of commerce. Now, I have sought to find something in the Public Works Act, or in the Railways Construction and Land Act of 1881, or in the Acts which we are now considering, which provides in any way against this scandal arising, and I have not succeeded in finding anything. In England this is provided for by a Railway Commission, whose duty it is, among other things, to inquire into charges made against railways resorting to these discriminating rates. The functions of the Railway Commission have either recently been extended in order to meet some defects in its working, or they shortly will be extended. It seems to me that, while we are building up amongst us a railway company with such huge properties in land, such large powers, we cannot guard too carefully the rights of the citizens. It therefore seems to me that if my honourable friend would reconsider the terms of his amendment, and make it a little more extensive, he would be acting in the interests of the community. There is one other matter that might also be referred to the Committee, and that is, whether some conditions should not be inserted in the contract, obliging the company, under certain penalties or forfeitures, to proceed with the construction of the line from the beginning to the end. It seems to me that the danger which he slightly alluded to—namely, that of possessing, as the result of our concessions, the useless ends of railways not connected in the middle, and, at the same time, the company having the possession of big endowments—is a very great danger indeed. I think, therefore, that to narrow the purpose of the Committee is a mistake, and I appeal to the honourable member—it seems to me it is a logical necessity arising out of his own speech—that he should amend his motion.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN.—I entirely agree with the honourable gentleman who has just sat down that the duties of the Committee proposed by the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse should be extended in the direction he has mentioned, for it was perfectly clear from the history given by the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse that from beginning to end there has been a certain consistency in the legislation and negotiations that have taken place with regard to this railway, that consistency being the consistency of perpetual concessions; and, as it appears to me, some of the most important concessions are made by the contract now before us, especially as it seems to me that a concession is made in reference to the grant of a very large amount of land in excess of that originally proposed, and in granting that not as proposed in the contract made by Mr. Brodie Hoare—after the railway is completed—but granted before the railway is completed. I notice that in that contract, in clause 8, it states that, if the land selected by the company “does not realise the sum of £1,250,000, the Queen will, upon the completion of the said railway, grant such additional lands, within the authorised area, as may be necessary to bring the total selling-value of all the lands granted up to the said sum of £1,250,000.” That formed a guarantee that the railway would be actually completed before that enormous quantity of land was granted to the company under the present proposed contract. As has been remarked by the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse, there is now no such provision. The company is left entirely to its own option as to the construction of the whole or any part of the railway, starting at the two ends; and it is quite possible that we may find that we have the two ends of a railway going through comparatively valuable country, and leaving out a huge mass of mountains in the middle. It may, of course, be contended that the company will find it to their own interest to make the railway complete, because unless that is done the traffic on the railway will not return what it might if the whole line is constructed; but we can quite understand that the engineering difficulties may be such that it may pay the company better to construct only a portion of the line, and to take their chance of making their money out of the land which is granted to them, instead of making the whole line; that they will practically turn the whole company not into a railway company, but into a land company; and it is quite evident that the concessions of land made are of such an extent that there is great temptation to any company to adopt such a course as that. I see that, instead of 2,804,000 acres, estimated to be worth £1,250,000, they may very possibly take land to the extent of 5,450,000 acres. That would be an enormous concession to make, and, I think, if such a concession is made, we ought to have the most absolute guarantee that the company will construct the railway from beginning to end, and that the colony will derive a substantial benefit from the enormous concession of land which it is making. I am perfectly well aware that it is said that any such attempt to obtain all that the colony might fairly expect would be followed by the company refusing to go on with the railway, and that owing to its financial difficulties the whole thing might break down; but I think that it is quite possible the country might absolutely be more benefited by the breaking-down of a company which only pretends to make a railway than by letting the railway go on in this imperfect manner. I should certainly prefer to see the whole thing upset, rather than see an incomplete railway made in this country, and I can foresee endless difficulties which may arise from this—difficulties which it is very difficult to explain without a full knowledge of the country; but as the country is opened up, and as portions of it may be found to contain minerals, we may find a large number of difficulties cropping up in all directions, and the ultimate result may be to force the colony to complete this railway, supposing it is made, in the imperfect manner I have indicated. For these reasons, and for others which I shall not trouble the Council with, but which have had considerable weight in forming my opinions upon the whole question, which I have studied carefully, I shall certainly strongly support the referring of this question as a whole to the Committee, instead of referring it on the one special point, as proposed by the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse. I shall be prepared to move an amendment if necessary, but I should prefer the honourable gentleman himself to amend his motion.

The Hon. Dr. POLLEN.—I opposed this project of the Midland Railway in its inception on what I regarded then as a principle accepted by the colony generally: that was, that the railways of the colony should belong to the people of the colony, be constructed by the Government, and managed by the Government of the colony in the interests of the people. I opposed it also upon the ground that, as a commercial speculation, it was demonstrated, or easily demonstrable, that it could not be regarded as a reproductive work. I looked upon it that, even supposing it might be found to be a necessary work in time, the time had not yet come, and that it could not in any sense be then regarded as a work of colonial importance, or a work which the colony itself should go on with. Unhappily the consideration of the question was not carried on upon principles at all. It was raised, or, sunk into a political party question, and as a political party question it has been decided, and not upon its merits. I accept facts. Much as I dislike the project, I do not want now to interfere with it. Engagements have been entered into by the colony, expenditure has been incurred, expectations have been raised which perhaps it would not be politic to disappoint, although I am quite sure the logic of facts will disappoint very seriously all parties concerned. But I accept, as I say, facts. I am willing to accept the contract as it stands at present. I believe that it provides against the dangers which are supposed to underlie it. If I had any doubt in my own mind upon that question, not being a lawyer, I should be quite satisfied with the assurances of the Hon. the Attorney-General upon the point. But doubts have been expressed, and doubts do exist as to the finality of the liability of the colony under the contract as it is now before us, and it is because I think these doubts should be removed, even by measures which appear to be of over-abundant caution, that I shall vote for the amendment of my honourable friend for the reference of this contract to a Committee, in order that all these doubts, so far as is possible, may be set at rest.

The Hon. Mr. MILLER.—I hope it will be understood that, whatever may be the report of that Committee, it will not preclude any honourable member from moving such an amendment as he may desire with the view of expressing the meaning of the 3rd clause. I think, as the Attorney-General has said, all we have to consider is, What should be the contract? We need not now go into the past history of this question. I am sorry to say it has excited a very great deal of feeling in the past, and some of us have done all that we possibly could to prevent its coming into operation. The colony, no doubt, is now committed to it, and it remains for us to consider what should be the contract. I have no hesitation in saying, from my point of view, we should state in black and white that the colony intend to give only land for the construction of this railway; and that we should say, in the plainest English we can possibly use, that we do not intend to render ourselves liable for any cash payment whatsoever. If land to the value of £1,250,000 is not to be got within the authorised area—which seems to be pretty extensive now—well, then, that is the company's look-out. I think we should say that, not only because that is in accordance with the understanding on which the colony first entered into the agreement, but also because, as the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse has said, we should not leave it in the power of any one to say hereafter, "Oh, you gave this land knowing that the money was not there, and you thought you were doing a very fine stroke of business." I think we should say, in so many words, that we will not be liable for any cash, and then we throw the whole responsibility on the company, and it is their duty to find out whether the land is worth the money or not. I certainly do wish that the terms of reference to the Committee were a little more extended, because I should like to know something more about this land. I am bound to say, knowing what I do about a portion of this work, that I think it will be a very courageous company if it does carry out the work. We know very well that one tunnel alone is 3 miles 16 chains long. That is a very formidable undertaking by itself. In one portion of the line there is over 5½ miles of tunnelling. It is an immense work. It is a very important consideration for the colony, as far the work itself is concerned, to have the line completed as a whole: that is to say, there should not be unfinished portions handed over. I think it would have been very much better if that part of the contract had been altogether left out compelling the company to begin at the two ends. I think it would have been very much better if we had said, "You shall begin at Springfield, and carry the work on to Teremakau," to carry the work on from one terminus to the other. What good would it be to the colony to have eight, ten, or fifteen miles of railway from Springfield? It would be of no earthly use at all. The land is of no value, and the line would practically lead nowhere. I think it is a great pity that provision was ever put in. I suppose it was one of those political necessities which seem to destroy the value of almost everything we undertake. I do not think there is any good in taking up the time of the Council further. We all thoroughly understand what the nature of this contract is. I rose to say that I hope it will not be understood that any honourable member will be precluded by the appointment of this Committee from moving such an amendment as he may desire to move in the event of the Committee not reporting in accordance with his views. I say again that I think we ought to have it plainly in black and white what the colony really means, and then there can be no misunderstanding, and no reflections can be cast upon us hereafter.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR.—I do not think any member of the Council would be debarred from exercising his natural rights simply because this matter was referred to a Committee; but, at the same time, I think it is convenient, if a measure of this sort is referred to a Committee, that we should to a large extent be guided by the opinion of that Committee. For my own part I am perfectly satisfied to accept the opinion of the highest legal authority we have in this Council, and when he assures us that this clause effects the objects sought by the Council I am perfectly satisfied to accept that.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE.—I do not think he stated that.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR.—I understood that he said that this clause gave effect to exactly the object we intended it should give effect to. I understood the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse to say that the Hon. the Attorney-General stated that.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE.—I said, as the honourable gentleman stated, it gave effect to what I wish; but I called in question the clause itself being in accordance with the statement made.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR.—I do not think the Hon. the Attorney-General would have made the statement if he thought the clause did not convey the exact meaning. I feel perfectly satisfied in regard to it. I do not see that we can put it in much clearer terms. I do not think we should go out of our way to say, "This shall not mean money," when there is no reference to that. It will only lead to further complications if we put in what may be thought to be additional safeguards. The limitation here is expressly made to land within the prescribed area. If we rest upon that there can be no misunderstanding of what is meant by Parliament. No company can misunderstand it, and I am afraid the putting in of other words will simply amount to a redundancy, and will perhaps lead to the very complications which are sought to be avoided now. The proposed contract limits the choice of land to the prescribed area. I, for one, have not the slightest shadow of a doubt that the land within the prescribed area will far more than satisfy the sum specified. There are something like six millions of acres from which the 750,000 which is to be set apart for mining purposes can be deducted, and the whole of the balance of that is available to satisfy the demands of the company, and in my opinion it will satisfy the most exorbitant demands which could possibly be conceived. We have an extraordinary difference of opinion amongst honourable members. In the first place we find, from the nominal value placed on the land, that 2,300,000 acres would meet the demand of the company for £1,250,000. That was the estimate, as I understand it, of the original area, reckoning the land at not less than 10s. an acre. That was the valuation before the railway was constructed: 2,300,000 acres was supposed to meet that requirement. Now we have an area of something like six million acres from which the selection may be made, and the land is to be valued at the value of the land within one year after the railway is constructed. It may reasonably be expected that the expenditure of three millions of money will add much to the value of the land, and, on the completion of the railway, the value of the land will be materially increased. I think there can be no possible doubt about it. With the enormous quantity of land to select from, and from my own knowledge of very considerable portions of that land, I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that there is more than ample to satisfy any conceivable demands that may be made by the company under the conditions of the contract. I can see no possibility of any demand being made on the colony in the shape of a money-grant. In the next place I say that under this contract it is utterly inconceivable that any company could have the slightest possible expectation of a claim for any money-payment. They are tied within the limits of the 3rd section of the contract so tightly that I can see no reason for this unnecessary alarm of some few members of the Council. I recognise that, in the circumstances of the colony, it is right that we should feel alarm at committing ourselves to cash liabilities in any shape or form. The time is such that we should put our house in order; and we must carefully guard against incurring money liabilities. At the same time, we may go to unreasonable extremes. I feel perfectly satisfied that there is nothing whatever within this contract to cause the least alarm. As has been said by other honourable members, the original question of the formation of the railway is a matter of the past. We have, of course, very different opinions upon the propriety, or otherwise, of the construction of this railway. I, for one, feel that the colony made a grievous mistake in that this railway was not started seventeen years ago, when it was projected in the original public-works scheme. Had that been done the colony would have been saved a great deal of the present depression; and, until that railway is completed, we shall not arrive at anything like an approximate value of the immense area of rich country on the West Coast. The surface of that country has only been barely touched. That part of the colony will maintain a very much larger population in ratio to its area than any other part of New Zealand, and will yet be a great source of wealth to this colony. I feel so satisfied upon that that I, at all events, have no doubt as to the propriety of starting the railway or the faintest doubt that it will be a highly productive work. So long as we are in an isolated part of the colony—and isolated we have been ever since the settlement of the West Coast, for we are shut out from the rest of the colony and the rest of the world—we shall be unable to get sufficient capital or labour to develop our resources, we shall continue to suffer from the want of this very railway which promises to afford us so much relief; and I trust that no man in this Council will throw any unnecessary difficulties in the way of having it properly completed. I did not intend to say so much on this phase of the subject, because the matter is really a question of the contract, and the only essential question connected with the contract is the one which has been raised in connection with clause 3; and I have no doubt, if the matter is referred to a Select Committee, that it will be thoroughly cleared up. But I do not think there are any other points in the contract which require to be, or should be, altered. I would only say one thing: There appears to be a fear that under this contract the company would start certain sections of the railway and get their land and then be done with it. I do not think this is a reasonable thing to fear. I would point out that this company has been established, not for public purposes, but for the purpose of making a legitimate profit out of the undertaking; and it would never pay any company to let contracts at the Springfield end and the Nelson end, and then abandon the work on the strength of getting payment in the land. If the land is of such tremendous value there can be no reason to fear that there will be any deficiency in the area; and if the work is commenced at the Nelson and Springfield ends the company is bound, for their own protection and success, to carry it throughout the length of the line from one end to the other. The traffic will not be anything at all until the full line is completed. I think the best guarantee we can have, after all, is that it is to the company's interest to finish the line. The Hon. Mr. Miller says he would like to know something about the value of this land, as if he wished to protect the company. I say that during the whole time these negotiations have been going on the company have been making themselves thoroughly acquainted with the property which they are about to take over. They have had their representatives in the colony, brought out from Home, who have been scouring the whole country backwards and forwards, and examining the nature of the country; and they have had one of their leading directors, Mr. Brodie Hoare, who saw for himself the whole property, as far as time would permit, and who said he was thoroughly satisfied with the nature of the bargain into which he had entered—in fact, more satisfied than before he came out. And he is a man who speaks his mind, and does not hesitate to say what he means. And if this company fail to make themselves acquainted with the nature of the contract they are entering into, why should we have this extreme care for their interests?

Are they not better able to take care of themselves than we are to take care of them? And they may be relied upon to have perceived the difficulties under which they will have to construct the railway. The colony says that for constructing the railway we will give them this land within the block; and if they are satisfied with it, seeing that we are satisfied with the bargain, what business is it of ours? They do not care about our anxiety for them, and they will carry out the work in spite of it. With regard to differential rates, I suppose, if we give the matter into the hands of a private company, they must be allowed to regulate their own rates.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER.—Not by discriminating rates.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR.—I think, if I am not mistaken, there is a regulation by which these rates are subject to certain restrictions and the approval of the Government.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER.—The rates have to be approved by the Government; but there is no provision, so far as I can find, which makes it a penal offence on the part of the railway to charge one customer one rate and another customer another.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR.—I should say, if the rates are fixed by the Government, the company could not make differential rates. If the Government found that the rates were being departed from, that is a matter which could be very soon rectified. As I said before, I am perfectly satisfied with the contract in its present form, and I think the whole of the best interests of the colony are well served, and we shall be able to carry out a work which will be not only for the benefit of the district, but also for the benefit of the colony as a whole.

The Hon. Mr. HOLMES.—I have listened very attentively to the remarks of the last speaker, but I think the result of the negotiations connected with this matter utterly disproves what the honourable member who has just sat down has been saying. I wish to refer, in the first instance, to one or two things that have struck me, and which have not been referred to by other honourable members. In reference to this contract we are told that Mr. Brodie Hoare, one of the directors of the company, went over the whole of the land and satisfied himself as to its quality. Then, when the draft contract reached London, it was found not to answer the purpose at all, and demands were made which would double or treble the value of the contract to the company. One or two of these have been referred to by several honourable members; but there are one or two others which have not been referred to, and to which I wish to draw the attention of the Council. One is this: In the original contract with Mr. Brodie Hoare the surveys were to be made at the expense of the Queen and the syndicate. The company now wishes to throw the whole expense of the surveys upon the Queen.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER.—The contract assented to by the House of Representatives does not contain that provision.

Hon. Mr. Bonar

The Hon. Mr. HOLMES.—That has not been agreed to by the syndicate in London. The next point to which I wish to refer is a most important point—that the Queen shall give to the company, and the company to the Queen, the running-power over their respective lines, and shall pay 50 per cent. of the receipts from it—that is to say, that half of the receipts for traffic shall be given to the Government, or the company shall have the power to run over the Government lines, paying them half of what they receive for traffic. When we consider that on one of our lines the working-expenses are 72 or 82 per cent., we should be losing by this transaction 28 or 30 per cent. as compared with what we should gain on our own railways—we should be allowing the company to use our lines at a positive disadvantage to ourselves. Then, again, with reference to the value of the land. It appears that the syndicate at Home heard of the speech delivered by Sir Robert Stout, the then Premier, in which speech he gave a very bad character of the land, and a very poor idea of its value; and immediately an alteration took place, and they made these demands. Now, it has been said by the Hon. Mr. Bonar that the original contractors resided in Canterbury, and knew all about the value of this land. Mr. Brodie Hoare went over the land, and made himself acquainted with its quality, and was well satisfied. And, besides, there is a regular literature in connection with the quality of this land, from various surveys made by Mr. Rochfort, Mr. Blair, Mr. O'Connor, Mr. Foy, and three Commissioners, who were appointed for the express purpose of examining the land in question. The syndicate had all that in black and white in the Blue Books, and were perfectly cognisant of it; and yet they entered into this agreement, and are not prepared to carry it out. In order that honourable members may have the information in the words of those appointed to inspect the land, and be able to judge as to whether there was any attempt at misrepresentation or exaggeration in describing the quality of the land, I will read an extract or two from the papers I have referred to. Mr. Foy says,— “From Foxhill to Hampden, sixty miles, the average traffic does not exceed one to two drays per week. There is a good coach-road all the way, with the exception of four miles, which has doubtless been finished since.

“The line is estimated to cost £10,000 to £12,000 per mile.”

Mr. Blair says,—

“In company with Mr. O'Connor, C.E., I spent six weeks in making a personal examination of the East and West Coast Railway lines proposed.

“Nearly all the country on the western side of the range is covered with dense timber, and the good flat land of any kind is comparatively limited. I can confirm Mr. Calcutt's report on the subject, as regards the indifferent character of the land and its limited area.

"The coal-deposits occur in a narrow belt along the West Coast, which entails the maximum length of carriage. The coal must be brought from the extreme end of the line. The comparatively good harbour of Westport, and the facilities which exist for shipping coal, are sufficient to turn the scale in favour of water-carriage, even to Nelson.

"With reference to the question of making the railway, and a harbour at Westport, I am clearly of opinion that both are not required.

"The cost will be something like £1,750,000, the interest on which comes to 10s. per ton on all the coal imported into the colony.

"From any standpoint whatever I can see nothing to warrant such an expenditure for many years to come."

Mr. Calcutt, land-valuator for the Colonial Government, says,—

"The soil of the forest-lands is light and poor. Where the finest birch-trees are found there is literally no soil, but a carpet of moss and leaves, underneath which are boulders, shingle, and clay, utterly useless for any agricultural purposes whatever.

"Clearing fit for plough would cost £10 to £15 per acre; cutting, burning off, and sowing with grass-seed, £6 10s. to £8 10s. per acre. Such an undertaking would not commend itself to capitalists or farmers, and to the man of small means it becomes practically impossible.

"The open land is on the whole very poor also: some small patches here and there have good soil; but the proportion of good land to the whole is very small.

"Taking the piece of country as a whole, and viewing it from an agricultural and pastoral point of view, it is not, in my opinion, adapted for the permanent settlement and support of a large number of people."

Mr. Hursthouse, M.H.R., said, "The land is of little value for settlement, or anything else;" and one of the best judges of land in the colony has been over it all, and says,—

"A railway from Springfield to Brunerton would be of service, but at a cost that would never recoup interest on the capital.

"From Reefton to Belgrove the cost of construction would be very great, through a purely mountainous country with very little cultivable land, and could by no possibility pay working-expenses, to say nothing of capital sunk.

"The land from Springfield to Arthur's Pass is purely open pastoral, about 400,000 acres in extent; thence to the West Coast is hilly, mountainous bush country [the New Zealand Alps]."

A Commission was appointed by Government to visit the land, and report to His Excellency the Governor. They say,—

"(1.) That there is little land suitable for agriculture. (2.) That the climate appears quite unsuitable for raising grain. (3.) That the most important factor in considering the West Coast as a farming district is the dense forest with which the whole country is covered: the cost of felling and clearing is out of all proportion to the value of the land when cleared, and, owing to the humidity of the climate, underscrub and rushes soon appear unless the land is ploughed frequently. After considering the whole of the foregoing conclusions we must respectfully report to your Excellency that we recommend the Arthur's Pass as the most suitable; but the most sanguine view the Commission can take is, that there is no prospect of the traffic paying more than working-expenses on the completion of any of the alternative lines."

Sir Robert Stout, when speaking of the land referred to on the West Coast, said,—

"All gold-working land is excepted, and all known goldfields. Land near the Welcome Reef would not feed a goat on ten acres—not a rabbit. Any person selecting land about Reefton for agricultural purposes would only be fit for a lunatic asylum. It will never be raised in value for agricultural purposes."

These are the opinions of men of ability who had examined the country, and were given to guide the Government before any company or syndicate of contractors was ever thought of. Mr. Brodie Hoare, with his engineers and assistants, was over the country, and expressed his approval of it. His taking exception to it now, merely because of the speech of Sir Robert Stout, is only a flimsy pretext to justify exacting further concessions from Government. Had he considered the fact that a considerable portion of the land set apart as an endowment is from 2,500ft. to 6,500ft. above the level of the sea, and in the latitude of the Middle Island, he would have known that for about half the year it would be covered with snow, and of no use either for agriculture or for grazing. The open land on both sides of the Hurunui will doubtless sell to the runholders now in occupation; but what will be said of our radical politicians, who denounce selling land except in small farms, now assisting to pass an Act to give away to an absentee company millions of acres in a block? The company relies for a revenue on coal and timber; but how can it hope to compete with water-carriage, where there is a well-appointed fleet of steamers now in the trade, and charging 9s. per ton to any port in the colony? Mr. Mills, the agent, told me that, when Westport and Greymouth harbours are improved and deepened to allow large ships to take in their cargo from the staiths, 6s. per ton will be the rate. Now, I would ask, how is it possible to carry minerals 120 to 140 miles over such high mountains to compete with any of these rates? As regards timber, most of it is birch, and there is some pine; but in Southland good red-pine can be purchased at the saw-mills for 4s. 6d. to 5s. per 100ft., cut into boards and scantling, with a level line to a good harbour at the Bluff. For goods and passengers there will be the competition of steamers constantly plying to the ports on the West Coast.

The hour of five o'clock having arrived, the debate was adjourned, and the Council rose.

OTAGO CENTRAL RAILWAY.

The Public Petitions Committee brought up a report on the petition of Mathison Brothers, of Dunedin, stating that they had no recommendation to make.

On the motion, That the report lie on the table,

Mr. FISH said he did not know how the Committee had arrived at the conclusion they had come to upon the case, if the facts were as he had been informed. The petitioners were contractors on the Otago Central Railway, and, according to schedule prices attached to their contract, they were entitled to a certain rate per yard for the removal of earthwork from slopes. It appeared that the Government Surveyor disputed the amount claimed by the contractors under this provision, and the contractors had to appoint two engineers to measure up the quantity; and the quantity arrived at by these surveyors was not paid for by the Government at schedule rates, as provided for.
 The matter was then referred for arbitration to the Chief Engineer of the colony, who, according to the terms of the contract, had power to act as final arbitrator in the case. That gentleman made an award which these men urged did not meet their claim, but was several hundreds of pounds less than they were entitled to according to the measurement of their own surveyors—Messrs. Robert Hay and L. O. Beal, jun.—who were two of the best engineers in Dunedin. The contractors, he might say, could obtain no information, as far as he could understand, from the Government Engineer as to how he arrived at the amount which the Government had paid; and they contended that they were entitled to a certain sum per yard, as scheduled in the contract.

 As he had said, they had had the work measured, and it came to many hundred yards more than they had been paid for. They now prayed for relief; and they were in the unfortunate position that one man had power to say the Government should pay so much, but did not say how he made up his award. There was another thing respecting which the petitioners had a grievance and prayed for relief; and it was amazing to him, if the evidence had been put before the Committee as he had heard it, that they should have come to the conclusion announced in their report. It was stated that these men had been singled out, apparently, from all other contractors on the line for the purpose of being fined. There were other contractors who had exceeded the limits of their contract-time by a considerable period, but no fines had been inflicted except upon these particular contractors, who had been fined £100.
 Surely it must appear very unfair to the minds of honourable gentlemen if one contractor did not get fined for exceeding his contract-time and another one did. He believed that, in connection with these works on the Otago Central Railway, there was one individual, an Inspector on the line, who acted very unfairly with regard to contractors. It was freely alleged by nine out of ten contractors who had the misfortune to do work on that line that unless they stood in favour with this particular individual they would get very little chance of having justice done. He might state, as a fact in connection with this matter, that the petitioners had lost a considerable sum of money over their contract—no less a sum than £2,000.
 He believed the arbitrator of the Government had awarded them less than he should have done because the work happened to be of an easy character. Well, he would point out to the House that that was most unfair, because it might have happened that the extra work would have been of a very difficult character, and in that case the Engineer would not have allowed anything extra; and the fact that the work had happened to be of an easy character was no justification for doing an injustice to the contractors. The report was exceedingly bald; and he would like to hear some explanation from the Chairman of the Committee as to why they had arrived at the conclusion they had. In the meantime he would move, That the report be referred back to the Committee for reconsideration; as he felt sure, from his knowledge of the case, that an injustice had been done to these men.

Mr. T. THOMPSON might say in connection with the petition that the Committee had gone very fully into the matter, and had had Mr. Blair, the Engineer of the department, and all the documentary evidence affecting the matter, before them. The evidence showed this, that after the contractors were dissatisfied with the decision of the District Engineer, the engineer in charge of the work, the matter was referred to Mr. Blair for arbitration, and he awarded the contractors the sum of £425 in excess of the amount previously arrived at. After that decision was made known to the contractors a letter was written to Mr. Blair expressing satisfaction with his decision, and a receipt in full of all demands in connection with the contract was given. It had also come out that in more than one instance the petitioners had been fairly and liberally dealt with, inasmuch as, after the Engineer had allowed the penalty to be remitted for a sufficient time to cover all alterations in connection with the contract, there were still some twenty-three weeks left upon which penalties could have been inflicted, and they were let off all except to the extent of £100, which represented only five weeks. At the time Mr. Blair's award was made no complaint was made by the contractors; but, as he had already said, in a letter that was before the Committee they expressed entire satisfaction with the decision, and made no complaint whatever. The Committee went very fully into the matter, and he could not see that any purpose would be served by referring it back to the Committee. If any further evidence could be produced he himself, and, he had no doubt, the Committee, would be very glad to reconsider the matter; but unless further evidence could be produced nothing could be gained by referring the report back.

Mr. BRUCE said that, without going into the whole of the case, he might say that it would be very difficult to add anything to the remarks made by the Chairman. He might just repeat what the Chairman had stated in reference to this petition, that if any additional evidence was forthcoming he, for one, would be very much pleased indeed to see the report referred back, because there was a considerable amount of sympathy with the contractors who had presented the petition. But he must say that, after going fully into the matter, the Committee did not see that they could possibly reopen the case. If the honourable member for Dunedin South could find any additional evidence he, as a member of the Committee, would be very glad indeed to reopen the case.

Mr. FISH did not know whether any additional evidence could be produced, and the fact of the contractors having written a letter expressing satisfaction with the award came upon him with surprise. With regard to the statement about the receipt being given in full, these contractors were like most other contractors, overdrawn at their banker's for a considerable amount, and they had given a general order to the banker to receive all moneys coming from the Government in respect of this contract, and when the award became known the banker took the money and gave a receipt.

Mr. T. THOMPSON said it appeared that the contractors gave the receipt. They owned that they had an overdraft at the bank, and the receipt was given on their authority.

Mr. LEVESTAM did not know anything about the merits of the case, but it appeared from this report that the petitioners petitioned against an alleged wrongful act of the Government. The Committee reported that they had no recommendation to make. He had frequently drawn the attention of the House to the fact that this was a most unsatisfactory way of dealing with petitions. When any one presented a petition to the House he expected to get an answer, and the Committee ought to report that he was either entitled to something or he was not, instead of reporting that they had no recommendation to make. He thought the House had a right to expect that the Committee should report one way or the other upon petitions that were presented to them.

Mr. BRUCE might point out that if the Committee went fully into the matter, as there was a conflict of engineering evidence directly involved, they would have to bring all the witnesses up from Otago. The Committee did not consider themselves justified in doing so.

Mr. LEVESTAM said that in that case the Committee ought to say that they had had no opportunity of going fully into the case. The Committee told honourable members that they had brought in this report without hearing all the evidence. They led the House to believe that they had gone fully into the case, and now it turned out that they had not done so.

Mr. T. THOMPSON said the honourable member for Nelson had quite misunderstood the remarks of the honourable member for Rangitikei. The Committee did not wish to exclude any evidence, but had brought up the report in accordance with the evidence before it.

Mr. ROSS said the Chairman had stated that Mr. Mathison had written a letter expressing his entire satisfaction with the award. Here the Chairman was a little in error. He did not express his satisfaction with the award. Moreover, the letter was written before he had been informed that any penalty was imposed. He thought that Mr. Mathison had a perfect right to suppose that the whole circumstances respecting his case had been thoroughly investigated and considered, and he was surprised when, instead of getting £425, he received only £325, the penalty of £100 being deducted from the amount.

Mr. RHODES said that the petitioners expressed satisfaction with regard to the arbitration, and signed a receipt in full. He thought that was sufficient evidence to justify the Committee in bringing up the report they did.

Mr. FISH said he had that moment seen the petitioner, and was assured by him that he did not sign the receipt himself, that it was signed by the banker, and that he never wrote a letter expressing satisfaction with the award. It appeared to him (Mr. Fish) that there was a most extraordinary conflict of evidence somewhere or other. He thought, under the circumstances, the petition might be referred back to the Committee; and he would take an opportunity himself of looking over the documents.

Amendment agreed to, and report referred back to the Committee.

HOERA TE MIMIHA AND HONE KORANEHO.

Mr. T. THOMPSON brought up the report of the Public Petitions Committee on the petition of J. C. Macky and others and the petition of E. McDonell and others, praying that Hoera te Mimiha and Hone Koraneho, convicted of perjury, might be allowed an opportunity of proving their innocence. He begged to move, That the report do lie on the table, and be referred to the Government for consideration.

Sir G. GREY simply wished to state, in reference to this petition, that, having perused the documents connected with the case several times, he was satisfied that very probably a gross injustice had taken place; and, if such an injustice had taken place, it was of the most extraordinary kind, because people who had suffered a very great injury and wrong were now in prison on a charge of perjury, said to have been committed in an attempt they made to redress that wrong. He believed it was a case worthy of the full consideration of the Government, and he had no doubt whatever it would receive that careful attention which it really demanded. To a certain extent he regretted that the petition came up for presentation to the House in the first instance. He believed, if the case had gone to the Government at once, the probability was that it would have been inquired into before this time, and probably justice would have been done. He trusted the Government would give this case, which was one of the most extraordinary he had ever known, that careful consideration it required. He could not help thinking that the result would be that the two prisoners now confined in gaol would be adjudged to be there wrongfully, and would have their liberty restored, and would have some compensation for the wrong they had suffered.

Mr. PEACOCK desired in some degree to emphasize the report, and ask the Government to consider the matter. Ordinarily, it was not a proper thing to call in question a judgment of the Supreme Court. In this case, however, the circumstances were somewhat peculiar, and such as to warrant very careful consideration on the part of the Government, with a view to seeing whether a further trial should not take place, and that those now in gaol might have an opportunity of clearing themselves.

Mr. FERGUS.—I only desire to assure the honourable members for Auckland Central and Ponsonby that when the report of this Petitions Committee comes before the Government they will give it their very careful attention, and, if any wrong has been done, will endeavour, as far as possible, to rectify that wrong.

Motion agreed to.

OTAGO DOCK TRUST.

Mr. T. THOMPSON brought up the report of the Public Petitions Committee on the petition of the Dunedin Chamber of Commerce, praying for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the management of the Otago Trust, and moved, That the report do lie on the table.

Mr. ALLEN said that this matter was a very important one, and one that should not be longer delayed. He was going to give notice of motion on the subject, but perhaps his best plan was to ask the Premier whether he would, between this and next day, consider the matter of giving him facilities for the appointment of a Select Committee. The appointment of such a Committee had been recommended in the report of the Public Petitions Committee, just now presented.

Major ATKINSON said the Government knew nothing about the facts of the case, which appeared to be a matter of some importance. He would look into it before next day, and would then state what course he thought should be pursued. He hoped that would satisfy the honourable member for Dunedin East.

Mr. FISH thought the Government would find it a waste of time to go further in this matter. The Dock Trust was created by an Act of the House, and they had done certain things in regard to floating a loan, and his opinion was—however much he differed from the Trust as to the propriety of the action they had taken with regard to the raising of the loan for the purpose for which it was obtained—that the Premier would find it very little good troubling himself about the matter. He did not think the honourable gentleman would find it worth while to take any action. If any wrong had been done it was past recalling, and he thought the thing should be allowed to remain exactly where it was.

Mr. MILLS did not think any good could be done by opening up this matter. He did not think there was any objection to offer to the appointment of a Select Committee, but it appeared to him that it would lead to useless expense, and it would be sufficient for the purpose if the Government would take in hand an inquiry such as was asked for by the petitioners, as that could be done at very much less cost. Having a full knowledge of all the facts of this matter, his idea was that the proceedings of the Dock Trust had been strictly within the four corners of the Act, and that nothing could be gained by inquiry. However, he should not object to the appointment of a Committee if it was the desire of the House.

Mr. ROSS took leave to differ from both the last speakers. He was a member of the Dock Trust, and, from his knowledge of its actions, he believed that a most searching inquiry was necessary. According to the opinions of the late Colonial Treasurer, the proceedings of the Trust had been "frightfully irregular." He had no doubt that if a Select Committee were appointed there would be such facts brought out as to cause the Government to consider whether it would not be desirable to dissolve the Trust.

Motion agreed to.

NAVAL AND MILITARY SETTLERS AND VOLUNTEERS.

Colonel FRASER asked the Premier, Whether it is the intention of the Government to bring in the Naval and Military Settlers and Volunteer Land Bill this session?

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON said, as he had already stated, it was the intention of the Government to bring in such a Bill this session.

VILLAGE SETTLERS.

Mr. HOBBS asked the Government, Whether their attention has been drawn to the regulations that are now in force for passing work done by village settlers on their sections; and whether the Survey Department cannot, through their District Surveyor, be authorised to certify for payment as soon as the work is completed, without the settlers having to wait for months for the advent of the Village Steward? He had presented a petition on the same subject that day, and he had also received letters from different settlers; and he might add that when he was taking a trip in the North lately he found this matter to be one of the chief causes of complaint. Further, he might also read a short extract from the Auckland Star of the 18th November, in which the matter was also referred to. He was not going to read the whole of the article, because a good deal of it was outside the particular matter to which he wished to draw attention; nor did he wish to dwell on the wrongs of the settlers for fear that he should be accused of interested motives. He simply brought the matter forward in the interests of the settlers. The extract he referred to was as follows:—

"But the irregular communication with the place had been aggravated by the want of a better system for making the payments to settlers. The visits of the Village Steward are necessarily few and far-between, while the need for food by the settlers and their families is ever present. It would be all right, says this unfortunate settler, who is struggling under hardships that would break the strongest man down, if there was some person on the spot authorised to pay the settlers the amounts guaranteed by the Government as they are earned. Why should not such a person be appointed? The Government, having induced these settlers to go upon land which is difficult of access from Auckland, ought to have made provision in the settlement for paying the men what is due to them. They ought to do so now, and not leave these industrious men who have gone out into the wilderness to make independent homes for themselves and their children to starve, or force them to abandon their cultivations, which have cost so much physical and mental suffering, to drift back into the cities, penniless and destitute, broken and crushed men. A fate such as this for men who went forth lion-hearted to win from Mother Earth a livelihood would be lamentable indeed."

He might add that it took the Steward of the settlements about two months to go round, so that the settlers had to wait a considerable time for him to come to a particular settlement to pass work done. He thought Government might make some arrangement under which some person in each settlement could pass work when done, so that the settler might get his money at the end of the month. He could assure the Government that it was a hard case, and that it ought to have their immediate attention, as he hoped it would.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON thought that the matter had been exaggerated, for no complaint had yet reached the department with reference to this matter. It would be a great waste of time if the District Surveyor had to leave his work and go to one of these settlements each time that a settler wanted an advance. There was a Ranger appointed for the purpose of passing the work done, and further than that the Government did not at present see their way to go.

Mr. HOBBS, to prevent any possibility of misunderstanding, might say that he had no fault to find with the Steward, who, he believed, was a man in every way fitted for his position.

RANGITIKEI RIVER.

Mr. BRUCE asked the Government, Whether they will, in view of the serious destruction to the banks of the Rangitikei River by floods and the consequent injury to settlers, instruct one of their Engineers, skilled in protective works, to visit and report upon the best methods of conservation as applicable in this instance? This was a matter of very great importance, and had application to other districts as well as Rangitikei; though, in this particular instance, the injury done was of a very serious character. When the country was first settled the banks were well protected by trees, shrubs, and other herbage, that had since been destroyed by fire, cattle, and other agencies, with the result that thousands of acres of rich alluvial land had been swept away by the river. It was in view of this that he asked the Government to allow one of their Engineers to visit the locality, and furnish a report which might guide settlers as to the best protective methods to employ, if any existed, whereby they might, individually or collectively, arrest the destruction that was going on.

Mr. MITCHELSON replied that this opened up a very wide question indeed, and he did not know that it was a matter in which the Government could very well take action, as it appeared to him that it was more a matter for private engineers. If the Government were to undertake such works it might be considered to be an interference with private professional practice. However, if the honourable gentleman would point to any particular place where much damage had been done, he (Mr. Mitchelson) would instruct one of the officers of the department to visit it and make a report.

Mr. BRUCE said that was all he wanted. He thought it a question of national importance.

TARANAKI CENTRAL RAILWAY ROUTE.

Mr. MARCHANT asked the Government, Whether they will, at an early date, give instructions for a survey of the best route to connect Taranaki with the Central Railway?

Mr. MITCHELSON said that the intentions of the Government with respect to the North Island Trunk Railway would be fully explained in the Public Works Statement.

FOREST-TREE-PLANTING.

Mr. BUXTON asked the Government, If any claims have been made under the Forest-tree-planting Encouragement Act; if so, how many, and when will the Government settle such claims?

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON said there were 124 claims, representing an area of 5,247 acres planted, now before the department. Many of these claims would not come within either of the Acts or regulations, as nearly every one who planted trees seemed to have sent in claims in response to an advertisement calling for claims to be sent in before the end of 1885. The money-value of the above claims was £20,908. In addition there were fifty-four land orders extant, representing a money-value of £5,798, for 1,449 acres planted. The time within which scrip was exercisable was limited by Act to two years, but, as there had been no land available in Canterbury, in which district most of the orders were issued, the scrip has not been exercised. It was hoped, however, that on the passing of the Land Bill opportunities would be afforded for exercising the greater portion of the scrip which had been issued.

WAIMEA PLAINS RAILWAY SURFACE-MEN.

Mr. COWAN asked the Minister for Public Works, If it is his intention to assimilate the wages paid to surface-men on the Waimea Plains Railway to those paid to the same class of workmen on the other Government railways? The surface-men employed by the Waimea Plains Railway Company when their railway was transferred to the Government were paid for their services 6s. a day; while men who had been since transferred to that section from other lines were being paid 6s. 6d. a day, that being the standard wages paid by Government for this class of work. The result was that in the same gang were men in receipt of different rates of pay, which naturally led to dissatisfaction among those employed. He hoped the Minister would see his way to remove the existing anomaly by paying all the surface-men on the Waimea section 6s. 6d. a day.

Mr. MITCHELSON replied that when the Government took over the Waimea Plains Railway, in November, 1886, the men who were then in the employment of the company were receiving 6s. per diem, and they were continued in the service of the Government at the same rate. All who had been engaged by the Government since had been given 6s. 6d. a day, and if there were any of the old workmen who were still receiving only 6s. a day he would give instructions to have their wages raised to the ordinary rate paid throughout the service.

KAIHU VALLEY RAILWAY.

Mr. TAIWHANGA asked the Minister for Public Works, Whether any money has been paid by the promoters of the Kaihu Valley Railway to the late chief Parore te Awha as compensation for damage done by the railway to Native land at Hauhangā, near Dargaville; and, if so, to what amount? Parore te Awha had put up a notice on his land stating that £3,000 compensation would have to be paid to him for taking the railway through his land; but the surveyors of the company had smashed the notice up. The company had since given Parore te Awha some money, but not enough, and he would like to know what that money was paid for.

Mr. MITCHELSON said that the Kaihu Valley Railway was being constructed by a private company, and the Government had therefore nothing to do with the matter; but since the honourable gentleman had placed the question on the Order Paper he had communicated with the secretary of the company and asked him whether or not Parore te Awha had received any compensation from the company. The reply was that no compensation had been paid for land taken, but he had received a sum of £15 for fencing, for which he gave a receipt in full for all claims for fencing. The reason why Parore te Awha received no compensation for land taken was that it was thought that, owing to the fact of his land being greatly enhanced in value by the construction of the railway, he had no intention of making any claim for money for the land taken.

VACCINE LYMPH.

Mr. RHODES asked the Colonial Secretary, Whether the Government will have vaccine lymph taken direct from a calf sent to all Public Vaccinators, accompanied by a statement of the desirability of using such lymph? The reason he put this question on the Order Paper was that it had been proved by German experimentalists that vaccine matter loses its protective power unless occasionally fortified by using cow-pox—that is, lymph direct from the animal.

Mr. HISLOP said there seemed to be a difference of opinion among medical men on this question, as on many others. The practice pursued by the Government was to secure a supply of calf-lymph, and send it to those vaccinators who asked for it. With regard to vaccinators who were not duly-qualified medical men, the intention of the Government was to write to them somewhat on the lines suggested by the honourable gentleman's question.

Mr. HOBBS moved the adjournment of the House. He had brought this matter under the notice of the House on a former occasion, when he had moved for a return with reference to the supply of lymph to persons in various parts of the colony, with the object of showing that a much better system than the present one was wanted for the distribution of lymph throughout the country; but the House in its wisdom thought fit not to allow him to carry his motion. His object had also been to show that the department in Wellington appeared to ignore the medical men in different parts of the colony who were corresponding with it; and it was time the department attended to the wishes of those gentlemen. At the time that he brought the matter forward there was small-pox in the colony, and also in New South Wales, and sailors were constantly landing in his district, with a danger of spreading the disease, and he thought it only right to bring it under the notice of the House and see whether the medical men should be snubbed as they had been.

Motion for adjournment not seconded.

PERMANENT VOLUNTEER FORCE.

Mr. JOYCE asked the Government, If, in their retrenchment proposals, it is intended (1) to reduce either the pay or the strength of the Permanent Artillery, or (2) to reduce the strength of the Volunteer Force, or the capitation allowance usually granted to efficient Volunteers?

Major ATKINSON said the honourable gentleman would receive full information on the matter when the estimates for this department were brought before the House; and he hoped the honourable gentleman would be kind enough to wait till then.

DEFENCE.

Mr. JOYCE asked the Government, If they have received a report from General Schaw upon the defences of the colony generally, which he was recently requested to make; if so, when will the report be presented to this House?

Mr. FERGUS replied that the report had not been received from General Schaw yet. He believed a preliminary report had been printed, and was now in the hands of General Schaw for revision; and when that was received, if it was of such a nature that it could be made public, it would be laid on the table.

JUDGES' SALARIES.

Mr. TAYLOR asked the Premier, Whether he intends to amend the Civil List Acts, 1868 and 1873, providing for the reduction of salaries of Judges after the present gentlemen in office cease to hold their appointments? There was a very important principle involved in this question, and he trusted the Government would take it into their serious consideration, because when they were dealing with reductions all round he hoped they would mete out the same justice to these gentlemen as to others. He hoped also that they would deal with all salaries fixed by statute, so that they might all start afresh.

Major ATKINSON said, without committing the Government in any way to the views expressed by the honourable gentleman, the Government would consider this matter during the recess, in connection with other questions of reduction.

RAILWAY-FREIGHT ON EARTHENWARE.

Dr. FITCHETT asked the Government, Whether they will consider the advisability of reducing from 30cwt. to 5cwt. the minimum weight entitling locally-manufactured earthenware to railway-carriage at half-rates, under Class B? He asked the question as the result of a letter which he had received from a local pottery-factory—the Milton Pottery Company's—and he thought one or two extracts from that letter would induce the Government to give an answer in the affirmative. The letter referred to the excessive rates of freight on the railways generally, and then went on to say,—

“The present concession, in favour of local earthenware, of a reduction to half B rates on amounts of not less than 30cwt., is almost useless, as but few customers buy that weight of our ware in one lot. . . . A reduction to 5cwt. would not in any way interfere with the profits of the railways. It would result in our being able to supply customers at a distance. . . . The increase of our turnover which would thus be caused by extending our market would enable us to still further reduce our prices, and that, again, would operate in the direction of still further increasing the turnover. We should accordingly be able to employ more hands, . . . and the amount of our goods on the railways would treble itself in twelve months.”

Mr. MITCHELSON said this matter had already been brought under his notice in a letter from the honourable member for Dunedin South, and he had considered it very carefully. He found that the rate was reduced some time ago to the very lowest possible rate, which was the rate at which grain was carried. However, in order to encourage the manufacture of earthenware the Government considered that, though they could not reduce the rate under Class B, they might reduce it under Class C to Class D for lots under 30cwt. That was the greatest concession that could at present be made, and it would only apply to locally-manufactured earthenware.

OWHAOKO LAND.

Mr. CARROLL asked the Native Minister, On whose instructions, or by whom, were the extracts of evidence in the Owhaoko case selected which have recently been furnished to members? The printed extracts to which he referred involved charges of a very serious nature against persons outside who could not defend themselves. Considering the evidence which had been submitted to the Legislature, he doubted very much whether the Legislature was justified in ordering it to be printed. As these extracts contained imputations against persons outside the House, he asked the question in order to find out at whose instigation those extracts were obtained and for what purpose they were printed; for they could serve no public good; and, if they were only obtained to show personal hostility to persons outside the House, then he regretted very much that such a course should have been pursued.

Mr. MITCHELSON replied that the extracts of evidence in connection with the Owhaoko case had been ordered to be printed by the late Government. A motion having been moved in the Legislative Council that they should be laid upon the table of the Council, the present Government considered whether or not such extracts should be so produced, and they also made inquiries as to whether the whole of the evidence taken at the Court respecting the rehearing of the Owhaoko case was included in the paper referred to, and, having been informed that it was so, they agreed to lay the paper on the table; but they had nothing to do with the printing of the paper, as that had been ordered by the late Government.

Mr. CARROLL moved the adjournment of the House, and said that all the evidence bearing on this subject had not been printed, and the portions omitted were those in favour of the persons accused. In the interests of justice those persons should have an opportunity of being heard.

Dr. NEWMAN seconded the motion for adjournment, and said that Dr. Buller had written to him on several occasions with reference to this matter. That gentleman felt very greatly aggrieved at these papers, and it would be only right that the Native Minister, now that the matter had been brought under his consideration, should print the whole of the evidence. He understood that Dr. Buller felt so aggrieved at what had taken place that if he could possibly leave England he would come out and take steps against those who had so grossly libelled his character.

Mr. HOBBS said it would be satisfactory to honourable members if they clearly understood from the Native Minister whether it was the present or the late Government who determined as to the evidence which should be supplied in answer to the return asked for. He might say that when he saw this return, and read it, he was perfectly horrified that such gross charges should have been made against an absent person. Such charges should not be made against any man without giving him an opportunity of defending himself. He hoped the matter would be cleared up, and that the whole of the evidence would be printed.

Mr. MITCHELSON might say that, when the late Premier made a request to the Native Department that this evidence should be sent to him, Judge Mackay was then at Waipawa. He was communicated with, and requested to supply the whole of the evidence bearing upon the question of the application for the rehearing of the Owhaoko case. He (Mr. Mitchelson) understood that the evidence which had been printed only referred to the rehearing; and, consistently with the request to Judge Mackay, he was led to understand that the whole of that evidence had been printed. However, he would make further inquiries, and if any of the evidence had been omitted he would have it supplied.

Motion for adjournment negatived.

WELLINGTON-PITONE RAILWAY.

Mr. FITZHERBERT asked the Minister for Public Works, If the Government will, this session, place a sufficient sum of money on the estimates for the purpose of straightening the railway-line between Wellington and Pitone? No person who travelled along this line could fail to see the number of unnecessary curves there were on it. He understood that at a very small cost the line could be straightened; and if so the trains could run out in twenty minutes or a quarter of an hour, instead of taking thirty-five minutes as they did now; and if that were done they would have a considerable increase in the population of the district, which would add to the traffic on the railway. Further than that, if the line were straightened, the wear and tear, which was now something terrific, would be reduced to a minimum, so that there would be a large annual saving in the expense to the Government. He hoped the Minister for Public Works would see his way to place a sum on the estimates for this purpose.

Mr. MITCHELSON said that the question was rather an indefinite one. If it meant that the Government should undertake to straighten the line from Wellington to Pitone an enormous expenditure would be required, but if it only meant the straightening of the worst curves the expenditure would be from £20,000 to £25,000. Seeing that the amount required even for the latter was so large, the Government could not see its way to undertake the work at present.

WELLINGTON-PITONE TELEGRAPH-POLES.

Mr. FITZHERBERT asked the Commissioner of Telegraphs, If he will have the telegraph-poles which have been left standing on the road between Wellington and Pitone, in consequence of the recent deviation of the railway-fence, immediately removed, so as to prevent accidents?

Major ATKINSON replied that the Superintendent would visit this line, and see what was necessary to be done and cause it to be done.

RABBIT-PEST.

Mr. ANDERSON asked the Minister of Mines, If he intends getting a report from Professor Watson, of Australia, relative to the destruction of rabbits by the lately-discovered method of introducing a contagious disease among them? This question might not seem of any great importance to the House, but those who had any knowledge of the matter would see that it involved something of very great importance to the country. If the Government could find means of suppressing the rabbit-pest, and thus increasing the sheep-carrying capacity of the country by two or three millions, they would confer a great boon on the country, and the work would be of more importance than any other that was going on.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON might inform the honourable gentleman that, at the instance of the Rabbit Committee, the Government had telegraphed to Adelaide on this matter. Experiments were now being carried on by Professor Pearson, and the Government hoped soon to receive a report from him respecting them.

SURVEY DEPARTMENT DRAUGHTSMEN.

Mr. TANNER asked the Government, if draughtsmen in the Survey Department are still allowed to undertake private work in mapping; and, if so, whether the Government will put a stop to the practice?

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON replied that it was customary in survey offices for draughtsmen, after office-hours, for the convenience of the public, to make tracings. Within office-hours this was not done. No request had been made to the Government to stop this practice, and it would cause public inconvenience to do so.

MANUKAU HARBOUR.

Mr. HAMLIN asked the Minister of Marine, What is the reason for removing the buoys in Manukau Harbour, especially those in the South Channel marking the course to Awhitu, Pollok, and Waiuku, and also some of those in the Main Channel? He wished to draw the attention of the Minister of Marine to this matter. By a letter dated the 22nd of November he was credibly informed that, on the occasion of the last visit of the "Stella," Captain Fairchild moved all the buoys in the channel used by all the small coasting craft, which buoys had been found an immense boon to persons navigating the harbour. It appeared, also, that Captain Fairchild's hands were not confined to the South Channel, but that he had even removed buoys from the Main Channel, which was used by the large boats; and, to show that he thought that some of the buoys were necessary, he provided smaller ones (oil-cans), and placed them as substitutes for those he had taken away. He (Mr. Hamlin) brought the matter under the notice of the Government in the hope that, if his information was correct and the buoys had been removed, instructions would be given to Captain Fairchild to replace them as soon as possible, as this was a matter of great importance, affecting the navigation of the harbour.

Mr. FISHER was informed that no buoys had been removed from the Main Channel. Those in the South Channel had been removed because there was only one small steamer trading in that portion of the harbour, and the trade was not sufficient to justify the keeping of these buoys in repair. The buoys were wooden, and wanted painting occasionally. The master of the vessel which traded there declined to keep them in repair for his own use, and they were therefore removed. If the master of the vessel which required to make use of the channel would have undertaken to keep them in good order, there would have been no reason for removing the buoys; but the question had been put to him, and he had declined.

Mr. HAMLIN wished to say that a number of vessels trading to Taranaki and Hokianga constantly used this South Channel, and the buoys were of very great use to them. So far as the small steamer trading to Waiuku was concerned, the master of that vessel could run without them at any time; but there were other vessels trading on the coast that required them.

Mr. FISHER could assure the honourable gentleman that the information of the department was that the buoys were only used by one small steamer.

Mr. HAMLIN said the department must be very deficient in information.

Mr. FISHER said, of course, if there was any considerable traffic the buoys should be put there and kept there.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Dr. NEWMAN asked the Government, If they will, during the recess, consider the whole procedure of business in this House, with the object of altering it so as to make it more businesslike, quicker, and more useful? The debates of the last two days, and the manner in which Parliament had been conducting its business, supplied sufficient reason for asking this question.

Major ATKINSON would be very glad indeed to consider it, and only hoped that honourable gentlemen would consider it at once, and neither ask needless questions nor make long speeches when they asked questions.

CIVIL SERVICE PENSIONERS.

Mr. JOYCE asked the Government, If it is contemplated by the Financial Statement to require officers who are entitled to pensions to retire from the public service? He desired to ask the question, because there were in his district several who would be affected by it; and it seemed to him desirable, in the interests of the public, that the question should be asked.

Major ATKINSON said it was not the intention of the Government to require any officers that they wanted in the Service to leave the Service; and the rights of all officers who were now entitled to pensions would be properly conserved if they remained at smaller salaries.

TAX ON FOREIGN BONDHOLDERS.

Mr. TAYLOR asked the Colonial Treasurer, Whether he will, when revising the incidence of taxation during the recess, consider the advisability of taxing all foreign holders of New Zealand Government securities, say, to the extent of one penny in the pound? He desired to ask the question because he conceived that these gentlemen should contribute to the necessities of the State equally with those who lived in the colony. A great deal had been said about repudiation, but he could not at all see that such taxation would be repudiation. If the securities were held in the colony taxes had to be paid upon them. It was contended that we had guaranteed a certain amount of interest. That did not affect the question. When stocks went up £10 or £12 the rate of interest was reduced to those who purchased at those prices; and he could not see on what principle his suggestion should not be adopted. He trusted the Colonial Treasurer would see his way to do something in the matter during the recess.

Major ATKINSON said if there was, in his opinion, any possibility of taxing these bondholders he should be very glad to do it: but, to his mind, the thing was impossible. He did not believe that any law passed by the House would do it, because he had no doubt at all that there was a distinct engagement, which would be enforced by the English law-courts, to make certain payments in London on a certain day, and, if the colony failed to do that, then it would be in default. The difference between bonds held in the colony and at Home was, that here the Legislature had power to determine what taxes should be imposed on property within its own jurisdiction; but it could not tax property that had got to England. We had agreed to pay in London a particular sum, and, if we failed to pay that sum, then we were defaulters.

FIJI.

Dr. NEWMAN asked the Government, If they will enter into negotiations with the Colony of Fiji, with the object of obtaining a political union with New Zealand? The question was one of very great importance. If such negotiations were entered into, and were successful, a great deal would be done towards reviving the island trade, which was at present languishing.

Major ATKINSON could not hold out any hope that during the present recess, at any rate, anything of the sort could be done. The honourable gentleman was perhaps aware that negotiations were carried on some time ago, and that they were not very successful. He saw that Fiji was now approaching one of the other colonies on the subject; but he feared that the difficulties, so far as New Zealand was concerned, were insuperable; and if a political union were obtained he was afraid it would not be of so profitable a nature as the honourable gentleman seemed to anticipate.

"STARK'S PURCHASE."

Mr. MONK asked the Minister of Lands, If the Government will give as an endowment to the Borough of Devonport that portion of the land known as "Stark's purchase" not required for defence purposes? This question referred to a piece of property, on the North Shore from Auckland, known as "Stark's purchase." There was a considerable portion of land, more than could possibly be required for defence purposes; and the people of the Borough of Devonport were desirous that the Government should arrange to give them this as an endowment. He might also mention, in support of this, that by the abolition of the Crown and Native Lands Rating Act the borough would lose rates to the extent of £50 a year on this land, and they would feel very much the diminishment of revenue. He might also say that there was very little chance of the Government being able to sell this land at anything like the money they paid for it; whereas, if they gave it to Devonport as an endowment, in two or three generations hence it might reach the value paid for it, and in the meantime it would benefit the present and intermediate generations of Devonport. If the Government could see their way to comply with this request they would receive very hearty thanks.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON regretted to state that it was out of the power of the Government to accede to the request conveyed in this question. The land was acquired under the provisions of "The Public Works Act, 1885," which provided that, when land was acquired for such purposes, and there was any land over and above that actually required for the purpose for which it was acquired, it must be disposed of as provided for by "The Public Works Act, 1882."

Mr. MONK said perhaps the Government would bring in a short Act with the desired object.

Mr. BRUCE suggested that a way out of the difficulty would be for the Government to sell it to the borough at cost price.

NOTOWN-GREYMOUTH TELEPHONE.

Mr. GUINNESS asked the Commissioner of Telegraphs, Whether he will have telephonic communication established between Notown and Greymouth?

Major ATKINSON was afraid the Government could not see their way to agree to this. The estimate was that the work would cost £450, and that the probable receipts, judging by the circulation of letters, would be £10.

SANDON AND CARNARVON SMALL-FARM ASSOCIATION.

Mr. WILSON asked the Minister for Public Works, If he will assist the Sandon and Carnarvon Small-farm Association by giving a pound-for-pound subsidy towards the erection of a punt on the Rangitikei River opposite their selection in the Otamakapua Block? Perhaps he ought to ask the Minister of Lands this question, as it related to the Otamakapua Block, a very large portion of which was Crown land. The special settlement that was spoken of was on the river-side, and behind it there were Crown lands which must be opened up by access being afforded across the river. The Small-farm Association was prepared to assist in this matter if it could get a punt put across the river. A friend of his had written to him to say that there was a party wishing to get on this land, and they had been camped on the river for three weeks for want of a punt.

Mr. MITCHELSON said this was really a question for the Minister of Lands, as the honourable gentleman had stated, and it had nothing to do with the Public Works Department; but he would answer it. Although grants of a like nature had on rare occasions been made to local bodies, the Government would not see their way to comply with the request in this instance.

ST. MARY'S INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL TELEPHONE.

Mr. LEVESTAM asked the Commissioner of Telegraphs, Whether he will have telephonic communication established between the St. Mary's Industrial School and the City of Nelson? He might say that this was a semi-public institution; and, as there was a large number of children there, for whom medical aid might be required at any time, he hoped the honourable gentleman would give a favourable reply to the question.

Major ATKINSON said that since he got the information on this matter he had not had time to consider it. He found that it would cost about £120. If it were a private establishment the institution would have to pay £26 the first year and £20 a year afterwards. He was afraid the institution would not be able to pay that amount; but he would be very happy to consider the matter further and see if any reduction could be made.

CLYDE POST-OFFICE.

Mr. PYKE asked the Government, When the Clyde Post-office will be rebuilt? In asking this question, he should like to explain that Clyde, though small in itself, was the starting-point of two lines of traffic, two lines of mail-coaches, and two lines of telegraphs. All the letters and telegrams going to the country from Dunedin must necessarily pass through Clyde to reach Cromwell and the country above it—Arrowtown or Queenstown. In addition to that, Clyde was the seat of the county government, and also the head-quarters for police and three counties; and in many other respects it was necessary that the post-office should be there. The post-office was tumbling down. It was an old wooden and iron building; it had been in existence for about twenty years, and could not possibly stand much longer. It was not safe at the present time, and had not been safe for years. This was not a new vote, it had been on the estimates for three or more years, and, unless effect were given to the vote very shortly, the Government would have to find other accommodation for the postal business, as it could not possibly be carried on much longer where it was.

Major ATKINSON was at present advised that the department did not consider it would be advisable to erect the building which was proposed to be erected, the business not now justifying it. The sum of £675 had appeared on the estimates.

Mr. PYKE.—A great deal less than that would do.

Major ATKINSON said the department thought that £250 would erect the building required. He would make further inquiries, and do what was necessary for the improvement of the place.

OPHIR-MATAKANUI TELEPHONE.

Mr. PYKE asked the Government, When the promise to extend the telephone from Ophir to Matakaniui will be given effect to? He forgot how many years this work had been on the estimates. The peculiar circumstances were these: There was a large mining population at the place, formerly known by the name of Tinkers', and the only means they had of communication with the outer world was by riding over to Black's, or Ophir. When accidents happened there, life might possibly be lost before a doctor could reach the place. In one case, he believed, life might have been saved if the doctor had been communicated with earlier; but that was impossible. He was certain that the telephone would pay, and was convinced that, if the inhabitants were at all disinclined to pay, the County Council would guarantee the cost of the telephone-office: that was to say, they would guarantee to pay any deficit in the cost of maintenance by fees.

Major ATKINSON said that this work, under the circumstances, would be gone on with.

MARSDEN, DUNGANVILLE, AND GREENSTONE TELEPHONE.

Mr. SEDDON asked the Commissioner of Telegraphs, If he will have telegraphic communication established at the following places—namely, Marsden, Dunganville, and Greenstone?

Major ATKINSON was sorry to say the Government did not see their way to construct this line as proposed.

TELEGRAM RECEIPTS.

Mr. MILLS asked the Postmaster-General, If he can see his way to allow clerks in telegraph offices to initial receipts for money for telegrams without the extra charge of 2d. as at present? In asking this question, he would explain that, in large business establishments, where the telegraph was used very freely, it had been customary to enter telegrams in a book, which the boy carrying the telegram was required to get initialled at the telegraph office. This was done not so much for the purpose of getting an acknowledgment of the value of a receipt as for the purpose of removing temptation out of the way of the boys, as it had been very often found, not only in his own experience but in the experience of many business people throughout the colony, that boys taking telegrams charged an ordinary telegram as an urgent telegram or a delayed telegram as an ordinary telegram, and put the difference in their pockets. It was only occasionally that the fault was found out. Quite recently the Government had made a charge of 2d. on each telegram despatched in this way. Twopence was a small amount, but that on every shilling telegram formed a very large extra charge, and he thought it was a charge that might very well be done away with.

Major ATKINSON was sorry he did not see his way to grant the concession the honourable gentleman wanted. He found that it was the custom in Great Britain to make this charge; but, if the charge were not made, the facility offered would be availed of to a much larger extent than now, and that would entail a still further expense on the office. It would be necessary to keep more officers. The office did not wish to encourage this sort of work, and thought it necessary to make a charge to those who wished to check their own officers.

REMINGTON-LEE RIFLES.

Major JACKSON asked the Government, What was the total number of Remington-Lee rifles purchased by the Government, and at the time of such purchase had the Imperial Government decided on the future arm of its service? Had the Government decided to adopt the Remington-Lee rifle as the future arm of the colony before incurring the expense of purchasing the same; and was the Officer Commanding the Forces consulted before these rifles were procured? What was the cost per arm, complete, landed in the colony; and what quantity of ammunition for these rifles was purchased, and at what price? Were these rifles and ammunition a gift to the Rifle Association or any other body, or will their cost be recovered? To what vote is the cost of these arms and ammunition charged? Has a further supply of ammunition been ordered from America? Is there any truth in the rumour that this arm is quite unfit for the Volunteer or any other service? How many of these rifles have been returned to store disabled?

Mr. FERGUS replied that 500 rifles were purchased. At the time, the Imperial Government had not decided on the future arm; nor had it done so officially yet, though by last mail the Government heard privately that an arm was selected. The Government had not finally decided to adopt the Remington-Lee rifle when these were ordered. The order was mentioned in the report of the Commander of the Forces laid before Parliament, dated the 25th April, 1887. The cost per arm was £3 9s. 8d. without bayonet, £3 14s. 6d. with bayonet. There were in the colony 200,000 rounds for the Remington-Lee rifle, which cost 7s. 3d. per 100 rounds. One hundred of the rifles were sold to the Honorary Reserve Corps; 850 were lent for twelve months, with option of purchase, and an undertaking to return them in good order, if not bought by the Rifle Association; fifty were on hand, some twelve or fifteen of which were sold. Arms and ammunition were charged to the vote, "Arms and ammunition, Volunteers, Defence Department." A further supply, on the application of Captain Somerville, for the Rifle Association, of 100,000 rounds had been sent for, to be paid for by the association. There was no truth in the rumour that this arm is quite unfit for any service, as it was adopted in several countries besides America; and there was no reason to believe it to be quite unfit for the Volunteers. One rifle had been returned to the store to have its extractor repaired; and another was reported to be similarly injured, and likely to be sent for repair.

Mr. FITZHERBERT asked the Minister of Defence if he was quite sure there were only 200,000 rounds in the colony, as that gave only twenty-five rounds to each Volunteer in New Zealand.

Mr. FERGUS said that was the quantity of ammunition at present in the colony for the Remington rifle only. The question referred to that rifle only.

AUCKLAND UNEMPLOYED.

Mr. R. THOMPSON asked the Minister for Public Works, If it is true that he has ordered the formation of carriage-drives through the Domain in Auckland, for the purpose of finding work for the unemployed? His reason for putting this question on the Order Paper was, that he had seen it stated in a newspaper that the Minister had authorised the formation of carriage-drives through the Auckland Domain, in order to give employment to the unemployed. He did not wish it to be understood that he objected to work being found for the unemployed if it was necessary it should be found; but, if so, necessary and useful work should be provided for them. He trusted that those people who required employment would be sent to the country districts to make roads for settlers, and he did not suppose there was any other district in the colony where it was so easy to find necessary work of that class for the unemployed as the Auckland District; and he hoped the honourable gentleman would not allow any fancy works of the kind he had referred to to be done in and about Auckland, but would see that the unemployed were sent to useful works in the country, where they could be easily and profitably engaged.

Mr. MITCHELSON said he had ordered no such work, nor did he intend to do so. A Labour Bureau was about to be established in Auckland, some gentlemen whom it was desirable to have as members having consented to act; but Mr. Percy Smith, the Assistant Surveyor-General, whom the Government were most anxious to have on the Board owing to his local knowledge, could not act, being largely overworked. On the previous day he (Mr. Mitchelson) had received a communication from one of them, asking that the unemployed might be given work at constructing a reservoir at the Western Springs; to which he had sent the following reply:—

"28th November, 1887. — In reply re unemployed. Government has found system of establishing relief-works in neighbourhood of large cities very objectionable, as tendency is to draw temporarily - unemployed persons from the country into the towns, instead of taking those already in the towns into the country. Besides this, too, if the work you suggest—which is really a local and not a General Government one—was undertaken, we should immediately be asked to undertake similar local works for the benefit of other boroughs and cities, and if we did not do so—and certainly we could not—considerable dissatisfaction would result.

"Furthermore, provision has been made on estimates for putting in hand works that are bonâ fide Government undertakings, and no provision has been made—nor could Parliament well be asked to make any—for the waterworks at Western Springs.

"Under all the circumstances of the case, I would advise that definite action in the matter be deferred until a meeting of the Labour Bureau now being constituted can be held, which will be within the next two or three days, probably; but I would, in the meantime, suggest for your consideration that the Rotorua Railway-works would probably be suitable work to employ the men upon.

"E. MITCHELSON.

"Charles Atkin, Esq., Auckland."

He might, however, state that a list of works that were proposed to be undertaken in the Auckland Provincial District would be forwarded to the Bureau, with a recommendation that the Bureau should decide as to which of the works mentioned would be the most suitable for giving relief to the unemployed. But, at the same time, the Government felt that they must to a certain extent accept the advice tendered by the Bureau, as the Government fully believed that no work would be recommended that would not be of some public benefit.

Mr. R. THOMPSON would suggest the advisability of issuing instructions to the Labour Bureau to distribute the unemployed among the local bodies in the country. It would save a great deal of trouble, and he was sure the local bodies would be glad to get the services of these men, and it would be better for them than to keep them hanging about the town. It was not at all likely that a Labour Bureau of Auckland City men would, of their own motion, send men away into the country districts if work could by any means be found for them about the town, and therefore the intervention of the Government was desirable.

PROPERTY-TAX OFFICIALS' BONUSES.

Mr. R. THOMPSON asked the Government, Under what authority has a bonus of £100 been paid to the Property-tax Commissioner, and also a bonus of £75 to the Deputy Property-tax Commissioner?

Major ATKINSON said the bonuses were paid, under the authority of the late Colonial Treasurer, for extra work during the compilation of the rating-rolls and the triennial assessment. This was the first bonus or any extra payment that either of these officers had received since their department was established.

PITONE RAILWAY-STATION.

Mr. FITZHERBERT asked the Minister for Public Works, If he will carry out the promise made last session by the late Government, to have the Pitone Railway-station enlarged without delay? Last session the Minister for Public Works promised that this work should be carried out at once—not only that the station should be enlarged, but that it should be removed to a more convenient place. The honourable gentleman fully recognized the fact that it was absolutely necessary to have greatly-improved station-accommodation there. Since then, a piece of land had been purchased from the Natives for this purpose; but he could not see that the work had been commenced in any way. Although this station might have been big enough some seven years ago when there were only about a hundred and fifty people in the district, yet now, with a population of nearly two thousand, it was entirely inadequate. On wet days, women with children, and other people, were to be seen standing outside exposed to the rain, without any shelter whatever; and he thought it absolutely scandalous that such a thing should exist in any district; and that there should be such a miserable "box" for a railway-station where the traffic was so large. He hoped the honourable gentleman would see his way clear to have the work begun at once, because the necessary land had been purchased, and was lying absolutely idle at the present time.

Mr. MITCHELSON said it was true his predecessor had stated that increased accommodation was necessary and should be provided, but he had not given any pledge as to when the work would be undertaken. The necessary land was now being acquired, and as soon as the title was complete the Government would consider whether or not they could authorise the necessary expenditure—namely £1,000—which would be sufficient to give all the accommodation that was needed.

SOUNDS COUNTY RAILWAY-SLEEPERS.

Mr. SEYMOUR asked the Minister for Public Works, Whether there is any truth in the rumour current in the Sounds County that the Government intend to abandon or greatly curtail the purchase of railway-sleepers in that county?

Mr. MITCHELSON said, on the 31st March next a contract for 20,000 sleepers would expire. Of that number, 12,500 had already been supplied, and the rest would shortly be delivered. As a consequence, the Government would have more sleepers than would be required for some time, and would not want further supplies; and the settlers in the Sounds had been informed accordingly.

LAND-TRANSFER.

Mr. VALENTINE asked the Minister of Lands, If he will take steps to effect a reduction in the fees relating to the cost of transferring land? He had received several communications upon this subject from various people, particularly small landholders, and they found the tax on them very onerous indeed. If a section valued at only £5 was transferred, the Government got out of them £1 10s. 6d.

—being search-fee, 2s.; form, 1s.; title, 10s.; and registration, 10s. Then there was the solicitor's fee of a guinea, making the total cost £2 11s. 6d., or rather over 50 per cent. of the capital-value of the section transferred. He hoped the Government would see their way to make an alteration in the way of a reduction in these charges, for it seemed to him they were extremely large, especially in the case of such small transactions as he had referred to. He hoped serious attention would be given to the matter.

Major ATKINSON said no doubt the matter wanted looking into; but the requirements of the Exchequer were so very great that he could not make any absolute promise of reduction. He would, however, during the recess, look into the matter, and see whether any relief could be properly granted in cases such as the honourable gentleman had mentioned.

Mr. VALENTINE would suggest that the fee for title should be only 5s., and for registration 5s.

SUBSIDY FOR WIRE-NETTING FENCES.

Mr. COWAN asked the Government, To what Rabbit Boards a subsidy of pound for pound has been promised for the erection of wire-netting fences, and what amounts will be required to pay such subsidy? This question was one of immense importance, the whole country being deeply interested in it. His object was to elicit information as to the obligations the Government had incurred in respect of the subsidies to which he referred.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON said subsidies to Rabbit Boards were not promised; but pound for pound was claimed by the Board upon the rates they collected, under section 25 of "The Rabbit Nuisance Act 1882 Amendment Act, 1886." £7,500 was placed upon last session's estimates under "Permanent charges under special Acts of the Legislature," and up to date £5,287 9s. 6d. had been paid as subsidy to three Rabbit Boards—to the Awatere Rabbit Board, £2,156 13s. 1d.; to the Hawke's Bay Rabbit Board, £2,031 9s. 1d.; to the North Amuri Rabbit Board, £1,099 7s. 4d.: total, £5,287 9s. 6d.

EGRESS FROM PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. BEETHAM asked the Government, If they will consider the necessity that exists for a strict supervision over all buildings used for public meetings, such as churches, theatres, &c., so that sufficient means of egress may be assured in cases of sudden panic? He was induced to put this question from reading the accounts in European publications of the great loss of life at Paris and Exeter recently through want of sufficient means of egress from public buildings. He thought the Government should take some action to prevent the possibility of such deplorable catastrophes happening in our midst; and he believed action taken in time might prevent a deplorable loss of life that might otherwise occur. He knew this was a matter as to which Municipal Corporations had control; but he was afraid those bodies did not always do their duty in that respect, and he hoped the Government would keep a watch over them by appointing an Inspector, who should see that proper provision was made to prevent accidents in all cases.

Mr. HISLOP said this was a matter that was and ought to be under municipal management; but the Government would be very glad to issue instructions to the police to exercise supervision to some extent.

WIRE-NETTING.

On the motion of Mr. COWAN, it was ordered, That there be laid on the table a return showing (1) the quantity of wire-netting ordered by Government; (2) the date on which such order was made; (3) the private properties through or along which such wire-netting is proposed to be erected.

PUBLIC WORKS NOT LET BY PUBLIC COMPETITION.

On the motion of Mr. GOLDIE, it was ordered, That there be laid upon the table a return giving a detailed list of the works executed in the various provincial districts for the three years ending the 30th September, 1887, under the supervision and control of the Public Works Department, which have not been let by public competition; such return to include (1) the character of such work and (2) the cost of the same.

LAND BILL.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON.—Sir, in moving the second reading of this Bill, I wish to point out to the House that in the Governor's Speech, and also in the Financial Statement, the Government laid stress upon this question of land-settlement and land-administration as one of the essential points of their policy; and this Bill is now brought before the House for consideration in fulfilment of their promises on the subject. The desire on the part of the Government is to make land-settlement in the colony less complicated, and to give facilities for the acquirement of land upon such a tenure as the selectors may choose. I would, before going into the points of the Bill, say a few words with reference to the past policy of the colony in dealing with our Crown lands. Honourable members are aware that some years ago our lands were only disposed of on the terms of cash purchase. Presently the deferred-payment system was introduced, and a very valuable system it proved to be; but we further developed the perpetual-lease system, and other systems of tenure, I might almost say, too numerous to mention. We got into the experimental stage, and tried nationalisation of the land, with a result which I do not think has been entirely satisfactory. I might point out, as a result of the change in our methods of dealing with land, that in the year 1879–80 there were one hundred thousand acres more sold for cash than were disposed of under other systems; whereas in the year 1883–84 the amount disposed of on systems other than the cash system equalled in area that sold for cash, and in the year 1886-87 we disposed of one hundred and fifty thousand acres more under other systems than we sold for cash. The actual receipts from all sources in 1881 amounted to £460,000, whereas in 1886-87 the receipts from all sources amounted to only £305,000. Honourable members are aware that a considerable proportion of the land revenue is treated as territorial revenue, and is paid into the Consolidated Fund. Taking, in 1881, the territorial revenue at £190,000—the nearest round numbers—and the cost of land-administration, surveys, &c., at a similar amount, there was an available surplus of £200,000; whereas last year, taking the territorial revenue at £190,000, and the departmental expenses, surveys, &c., at £100,000—the cost of administration and surveys having been reduced by £30,000—the available surplus was only £15,000. The land disposed of and sold in 1884 was 294,000 acres, and in 1886-87 215,000 acres. As to our present position, I may say that, outside the area set apart for the Midland Railway, and not taking into account Native lands, we have for disposal fourteen millions acres of open land and six million acres of bush land. That is all the estate we have left available for settlement. The balance consists of mountain-tops, lakes, et cetera. Now, I think that the mistakes of the past which we should endeavour to correct in the present are these: For the past two or three years—in fact, for more than that—the Land Act has been administered mainly in one direction. There is nothing in the Act to lead any one to suppose that it was the intention of the Legislature to give undue preference to any one of the systems therein enacted; yet such has been the case. I know that in a large district with which I am acquainted all the best of the land has been set aside wholesale for settlement under the perpetual-leasehold tenure only. Our secondary lands, which are much less in extent, have been set apart for deferred payment; and all left for cash purchase are a few scraps of bad land, which people are not likely to take up on any terms. One of the great evils of this course, I think, has been that cash purchasers have been discouraged; and cash purchasers, or men with money, are employers of labour. I have myself known, within the last three years, three or four instances of men coming to this colony with substantial sums of money, from £2,000 or £3,000 to £10,000, experienced farmers, desirous of taking up Crown lands from the Government, and, unable to get land by cash purchase, leaving this colony, taking the money away with them to Australia. I consider that the way in which the land has been administered has had a great deal to do with the “unemployed” cry, through this: that would-be employers of labour have been choked off our lands; and the attempt that the late Minister of Lands has made to place on the land men without money is, I think, an equally grave mistake. The means necessary to make successful settlers have been passed over. The experience of most honourable members who are acquainted with settlement and with the country will, I think, make them agree with me that our most successful settlers have come from the class of men who started in the first instance, probably, as farm-labourers, who have been careful and saving, who have perhaps taken a team of horses on terms from their employers, and “worked them out” on contract ploughing; and when they have acquired the horses and ploughs, and a little money, they have made a start on their own account, and have made good settlers, and have become successful men. Men without such an apprenticeship, and without these habits of thrift, going on the land, without any money at all and without experience, can never succeed. There is another fault which, I think, has obtained too much in the past, and that is, there has been too much thought of the first price paid for the land, which has frequently been so high as to render successful settlement impossible. Now, Sir, to come to the Bill itself. The main principle of the Bill—and I think honourable members will admit that it is a liberal principle, and which makes a difference between this measure and any that have preceded it—is that the choice of tenure is left to the selector. This is a matter which heretofore has been at the will of the Minister of the day, or at the recommendation of irresponsible bodies; and I think an alteration in this respect will tend very much to popularise the system. I know that many settlers who have of late years taken up land have taken it up under systems of which they did not approve, because they could not take it up as they wished. The next important point in the Bill is the power to classify our lands, and to give extended areas, at lower prices, of our second-class land. In the Provincial District of Wellington, for instance, the lowest upset price of land is £1 an acre, whereas we have a very large area in it that cannot possibly be taken up at that price. I might cite also the Canterbury Provincial District, where the price of land stands at £2; and I think I am safe in saying that nearly all the land in that provincial district worth £2 has already been disposed of. The third important point is the abolition of the Waste Lands Boards, and the affording relief to existing settlers. If honourable members will refer to the Bill they will see that the sections dealing with the choice of tenure are sections 2 to 8, and they will also see that in giving this choice of tenure there is no special preference given to any one system. From the accountant's point of view—that is, from simply the pounds-shillings-and-pence point of view—the perpetual-leasing system is the best and easiest system under which a man can take up land; but against that we have the sentiment in favour of freehold, and I think the smaller advantage in the way of interest which holds in favour of perpetual-leasing will be completely overridden by the almost universal desire to own a freehold. The provisions giving power to classify are to be found in section 9; and section 10 provides for enlarging holdings of second-class land. With regard to cash purchase, I would call the attention of the House to the fact that a restriction is placed in the Bill to the limit to be obtained—640 acres of ordinary land and 2,000 acres of second-class land in one survey district. Each survey district in the colony approximates one hundred thousand acres; so that it will be impossible, under this condition, to acquire any extensive estate such as would warrant the use of the term "land-monopoly." I now come to the provision for the abolition of the Waste Lands Boards, which will be found in the 27th section of the Bill. The cost of the Waste Lands Boards is only one of the causes for proposing to abolish them, and not, perhaps, the most important. I find that the cost of the Land Boards last year was £905 for fees and £1,305 for travelling allowances, making a total cost to the colony of £2,210. The duty of the Boards has, of late, dwindled down to this: at each sitting to be informed by the Commissioner of the business transacted since the previous sitting, to fix the rents and upset prices for the land, to recommend the tenure under which the land shall be held, and to hear complaints and forward recommendations on the same to the Minister. Except with regard to the last point, this Bill takes the business away from the Boards. It settles the tenure and provides for fixing the price; and nobody can say that it would benefit the country that the Boards should be informed of the routine business transacted in the office. The only important point that the Boards would have to perform would be to hear complaints and forward their decisions on them to the Minister. Under this Bill there will be the same public hearing and the same power of appeal; but the hearing will be before the Commissioner instead of being before the Board. The difference is very much akin to having a case heard by an experienced Resident Magistrate rather than by Justices of the Peace. Whenever, in the past, any serious matter came before the Board it has always been referred to the Minister, and hindrances and delays have existed in many cases owing to the way in which the business was conducted. If a man applied to have a deferred-payment section opened for selection on perpetual lease, his application had to wait till the next sitting of the Board, who considered it, and if it was recommended it was then sent up to the Land Department here, where it was minuted and sent on to the Minister, who likely enough was out of Wellington, and it had to wait. When his signature was obtained the papers had next to go on to the Governor, whose signature was required, and perhaps he too was out of Wellington. So that the time occupied in all these proceedings was probably so long that before the formalities were complete the man who had applied for the land had become disgusted and had gone away. This Bill proposes to do all this in a much more direct way, and throws the whole responsibility on the Minister for the time being. If honourable members will look at subsection (a) of the section bearing on this matter they will see that the Commissioner, with the approval and confirmation of the Minister, is to perform all the powers, duties, and functions which were vested in the Board previous to its dissolution with regard to all matters relating to forfeitures or affecting the status of holders, and so on, which hitherto have been subject to the Minister. Other minor matters which the Board had power to determine in the past the Commissioner will now have power to hear and decide. Among the sections dealing with giving relief to existing settlers is, notably, section 15. The side-note gives the idea: "Freehold of deferred-payment or perpetual-lease lands may be acquired as soon as prescribed improvements have been effected." That, Sir, I have reason to believe, will afford considerable relief; and, to show what the settlers themselves think of it, I will read an extract from one of many letters I have received on this matter:—

"I beg most sincerely to thank you for the information that your Act will allow us to get our freeholds. This will be an inestimable boon to me and many round me who are situated as I am. . . . I have now some hope of escaping that total failure which must have happened except for this relief." . . .

This letter is not any stronger in language than, and it is of much the same tenor as, many I have received since I have held the position of Minister of Lands; and I may also say that, though a number of honourable members seem to think that one of the greatest difficulties with regard to settlers is their paying excessive rents, and though there are such cases, I am rather disposed to think that there are a far larger number of cases to be relieved by the method I am now speaking of than by the reduction of rents, for, as yet, I have not received a line, either directly or indirectly, from agricultural Crown tenants requesting reduction of rents. I have received several communications with regard to the reduction of rents of agricultural holdings, but they are all from tenants of endowment-reserve lands—lands not under the control of the Government. That question of the reduction of rents affects, as I have stated, more largely endowment lands than Crown lands; and it is being dealt with by the Government in another Bill, of which I gave notice this afternoon. The measures of relief in this Bill are confined to the one I have mentioned, and section 21, which permits holders of pastoral deferred-payment licenses to exchange for leases of small grazing-runs. If honourable members are aware of the conditions of these two systems of holdings, they will see what an immense advantage this offers to holders of pastoral deferred-payment lands. The payments made in the past count as rent for the grazing-run, which is calculated at the low rate of 2½ per cent. on the capital value; so that in almost every case not only is rent paid to date, but the balance of the payments under the deferred-payment system stand to credit as against future rent coming due. There are other matters of some importance in the various parts of the Bill, but not of such importance as those I have referred to. The debatable points are the definition of "simultaneous application" in section 7, and the dealing with simultaneous applications under section 14. On these, honourable members will hold a diversity of opinion, I have no doubt. Section 14 provides that, in the event of simultaneous application for lands under different tenures, the land shall be put up by auction between the applicants. Putting it up to auction will, in my opinion, tend against the advantage of the cash purchasers; but if, in the opinion of honourable members, ballot would be preferable to auction, I should be willing to see this provision amended in that direction. Clause 16 is also a very important section of the Bill, as it deals with the purchase of freehold land in mining districts; and, subject to the restrictions contained in the section, I have no fear that difficulty will result. Honourable members will also note, coming to clause 17, that provision is made for the sale of unsurveyed land. This is a very important matter, especially affecting the bush-lands of the colony. The custom which has hitherto obtained has been the carrying-out of detailed sectional surveys in the bush at considerable expense, sometimes at a cost as high as 4s. 6d. per acre. Money has been spent in "roading," and, after due publicity, these lands, when offered, are occasionally only partially taken up; so that a very large cash outlay has taken place with no adequate results. It appears to me that, by having a network of roads through our bush, by carefully surveying and grading the best lines for our main and district roads, and, on this mathematical network, allowing free selection, not only would the country be thrown open for selection at a much more rapid rate, but the expense of block-and-section surveys where not immediately required for settlement would be avoided. The cost to the selector will be nil, for it is provided that an applicant for an unsurveyed section will have, on his completing his purchase, the cost of the survey refunded to him as part of the purchase-money. The provisions in section 17 are to cover, principally, technical difficulties existing in the present Act, and the last paragraph of the clause further provides for the payment to existing special settlements of thirds of moneys received from deferred-payment lands. The regulations issued by the late Minister of Lands provided that a third should be so returned; but these regulations, in this respect, were ultra vires. A payment of thirds was made to one of these associations, and then further payments were stopped by the Audit Department; so this paragraph is inserted to legalise the payment of thirds in the case of special settlements taken up under the regulations to which I have referred. Section 22 provides for the extension of the area of small grazing-runs from five thousand acres, as at present, to twenty thousand acres. A number of small runs are now thrown upon the hands of the Government by its late tenants, it having been found impossible to work them in the limited areas in which they were leased. For the suggestion to insert this clause I have to thank the late Minister of Lands. I hope that, when next the question of the land-laws is touched, the principle which is applied to the terms on which the small grazing-runs are dealt with will be applied to all pastoral lands. Under the small grazing-runs system the tenant has a secure tenure for twenty-one years, whereas under the ordinary pastoral leases the Crown may resume possession on giving twelve months' notice. Further technical corrections are to be found in the 23rd and 24th sections. Section 25 is in the nature of retrospective legislation, put in to cover illegal expenditure on the part of the Clutha River Board. But this expenditure on the part of the Board was made in good faith and under the belief that they were acting within their powers at the time. The Kermadec Islands are dealt with in the 26th clause. In that clause provision is made for giving a grant to Mr. Bell of 100 acres, and a pastoral lease over a specific area. There is an important provision that I have not yet alluded to, and which, but for my pointing it out, might, until the Bill is carefully examined, escape attention. It is in the repeals. Sections 237 and 240 of the Act provide that endowment reserves may be dealt with by the Government and disposed of by it. The provisoes to these sections are that these reserves can only be so dealt with on the recommendation of the parties in whom they are vested. The repeal of these provisoes gives to the Government the power, without the recommendation and without the consent of the parties interested, to take the control and disposal of those lands for settlement; and I may say that I think this very necessary. In the past endowments have been held and dealt with in a way injurious to settlement, and my idea is that this power being given to the Government—should it be so given—will prevent the necessity of the Government interfering. I think it will be a somewhat similar case to what we are all well acquainted with—that of a horse which will scarcely move without a whip, but if you have one in your hand it goes well without any application of the whip. I think the Government having the power to interfere—if endowment reserves are required for the settlement of the country—will prevent any necessity for such interference on the part of the Government. I have now run over the principal points of the Bill; and, as it is a matter on which a good deal of discussion is sure to take place, and there will be many points for me to answer, I shall not make any further remarks at the present time, but will simply move the second reading.

Dr. HODGKINSON.—Sir, speaking of this Bill generally, I think it may be said of it that it is a very good Bill; but there is one exception that I must take to it, and I think a good many other honourable members will take the same exception to clause 27. It is not my intention to speak much about the Bill until it goes into Committee. I think, except with regard to that clause 27, all other objections might be made in Committee. I would ask the honourable gentleman to withdraw the clause entirely, for I cannot see what good object is secured by it. All this Bill proposes to do for the benefit of the colony we could do quite as well without that clause. I would urge that the question of Land Boards should be deferred until the Government, next session, have brought up their scheme to reform local government and of decentralisation. I think that such a scheme as that will be expected, and I hope the abolition of the Land Boards will be deferred until that scheme comes before us. If we reform local government in the right direction, these Land Boards, Charitable Aid Boards, Education Boards, &c., can be dealt with then. I feel quite sure that the settlers would not be willing to adopt this centralistic system, which puts so much power in the hands of a Government official. It is quite contrary to the genius of British legislation. I consider such a system vicious. When the Bill is in Committee I may have something to say on other portions of it, but there is only one clause to which I will refer just now. That is clause 10, which provides that no one shall be allowed to purchase for cash in any survey district more than 640 acres of land. I have my doubts whether this is a wise provision. If we are to attract settlers of considerable capital, as the honourable the mover of the Bill has mentioned, it seems to me that a man with £10,000 would require more than a square mile of land, and it would be injurious to prevent him from settling amongst us by passing such a restriction. At the same time I should like to see small settlers on the land; but we should make way for all classes. I question very much whether you are not fixing the amount too low. I will express my sentiments freely when the Bill goes into Committee.

Mr. J. MCKENZIE.—Sir, I am sorry that I shall have to criticize this maiden effort of the Minister of Lands rather adversely; and I am very much astonished that the honourable member at the head of the Government should allow his colleague to introduce this Bill to the House, because it upsets the whole of the old legislation which his late colleague, Mr. Rolleston, so ably advocated in this House, and so earnestly pushed forward through the House.—(No.)—I say it does. The present Bill completely upsets and alters the whole of our land system; and I caution every member of the House to carefully look into this Bill and compare it clause by clause with the Act that is to be done away with. Members will then find the true effects of this Bill. If it is the wish of the honourable gentleman to get more revenue from the waste lands of the Crown, I say that, in the present state of the country, he cannot possibly do it except at a sacrifice of the future of this country. He told us this evening, when addressing the House on this Bill, that he had known of people coming here with money and leaving the colony because they could not get land to purchase. The argument is a great fallacy; because any person coming to this country at this moment can purchase land second-hand privately from individuals at a less cost than the original cost-price of such land from the Crown; and, besides, he will have fencing and other improvements given in. At this moment there are plenty of large estates in the market for sale, with all improvements, at less money than they originally cost. If people wished to come here and settle down, they have every opportunity of doing so. It is a well-known fact that at the present moment, owing to the low price of every sort of produce coming from the land, there is no real bonâ fide demand for land to any extent for actual settlement or occupation; and if the Minister of Lands expects to get a large increase of revenue by this Bill he can only do it by offering land at such a price as will induce speculators to purchase for the future benefit of themselves. And I ask this House if it is a proper thing to do to sacrifice at the present time our landed estate for an immediate benefit, with a great sacrifice in the future. I think it would be wrong to do it. If the Minister of Lands expects to find people with cash to purchase land, no doubt he will find them; but, as I said before, it can only be done by offering land at such a low price as will show them some chance of being able to do well for themselves when things come to a better state than they are now in. We have had, during the last year, 49,475 acres selected on perpetual lease in the colony, and this land has been selected by 249 selectors. Supposing the 249 selectors took up the land for cash, at an upset price of £1 per acre, it would mean that the honourable gentleman would get, in round numbers, £50,000. I want him to point out to me and to this House how it is possible for these settlers to be in a better position than they are in at the present time if £49,000 or £50,000 was taken out of their pockets in cash, even if they had it? But they had not got it, and they could not possibly pay for the land in cash. Consequently, the return would not be there. So far as I can see in the Minister of Lands' arguments, it all goes to this: The whole sum and substance of his argument was that we should have no perpetual leases, no deferred payment; that all land should be sold for cash.—(No.)—Well, it is true it is stated that a man can select land as it suits him; but I say that the arguments of the honourable gentleman meant that this colony should have more money out of the land than we have got, that the land should have yielded more to the State, that the State should have sold more land for cash, and that the money should go into the Treasury out of the pockets of the settlers. That is the whole sum and substance of his argument and the reasons he gave for this alteration in the law, so far as I can see. So far as offering more land for cash throughout the colony is concerned, it is quite possible for the honourable gentleman to do that under the existing Act. He complained, so far as I could understand, of the late Administration having endeavoured to have more land taken up for settlement by perpetual and agricultural leases and deferred payments than they had offered for cash. Now, Sir, he knows perfectly well, I have no doubt, after carefully reading the present Act, as he must have done, that it was quite possible for him, as Minister of Lands, to have larger areas of land offered for cash, if that was his object. So that object could be gained without this amendment of the Act at all. The honourable gentleman said this Bill would give relief to settlers on the land; but I fail entirely to see that the clause empowering people to purchase their holdings will give relief. If people are not able to pay their 5 per cent. rent to the Government, how would it be easier for them to pay a higher rate as interest on money borrowed to pay for the freehold of their land? In place of being in arrears to the Crown, as now, they would very soon be in still greater arrears to the money-lender. I cannot possibly see where the relief comes in, and I have no doubt whatever that the honourable gentleman will see that his measure, in that respect, is anything but a measure of relief—rather it will be just the reverse. Then, the Minister said the Bill fixes the price to be paid for any land; but, as far as I can read it, it does nothing of the sort. It simply gives power to the Minister of the day to fix the price; the Bill does not fix it at all. So elastic is the Bill in that direction that the price can be either raised or lowered at the discretion of the Minister. I think that is not a proper position to put any Minister in, and I must object to it. The honourable gentleman said the best settlers we have in the country have sprung from the working-class—men who have worked on the land themselves, and have been able to gather sufficient money themselves to take up land and become settlers. I admit that at once; but I ask the honourable gentleman, and I ask all who are prepared to support the Bill, if it is not a fact that the deferred-payment system and the perpetual-lease system have enabled hundreds of such men to go on the land who but for those systems could not possibly have done so,—who could not have taken up land if they had been compelled to pay the full price for the land before they could get possession of it. I say it would be absurd to suppose that a very large number of those settlers would have been able to go on the land but for the liberal land-law now in force. Again, the honourable gentleman says the small grazing-run system should be extended to the whole of the pastoral lands of the country. Now, I admit that the small grazing-run system is a good one, and I believe it might be extended still further in the direction the honourable gentleman points out; but to say that the whole of the pastoral lands of the country should be leased in that way is absurd, because the moment you have disposed of all your lands in that way you will have none whatever left for any other class of settlement: and a large area of land which now, owing to its distance from a market, is only looked upon as pastoral land, is really fit for agricultural purposes. It would be taking land fit for agricultural purposes for small grazing-runs. On the Otago Land Board, of which I am a member, the system pursued is this: Where there is very good land fit for agricultural settlement the Board does not lease it for small grazing-runs, but retains it for the purpose of disposing of it for agricultural settlement; and if it is not wanted immediately for settlement it is relet as an ordinary run until it is required. I will go over the different sections of the Bill as the Minister did in introducing it, and deal briefly with each. Section 2 gives the Minister power to declare the whole of the Crown lands open for selection before survey, with two classes of exceptions, those being lands which have been previously gazetted as suitable for special settlements, and small grazing-runs. With these two exceptions, all the lands in the hands of the Crown can be declared at any time to be lands open for sale as unsurveyed lands, and he is enabled to classify it as first- and second-class land. I do not think it is proper that we should put any Minister in the position of being able to deal with the whole estate of the country in that way. Clause 3 deals with the price of land, and enables the Minister to reduce the price of second-class land to 10s. per acre. Clause 5 enables any one wanting to go on land to take up land under any system he likes, either on deferred payment, or perpetual lease, or for cash. This, as far as I can see, would simply mean giving the preference as to any land to those who can find the cash to buy it. Clause 7, in my opinion, gives a very mischievous power: it provides for priority of application for unsurveyed land. I wish to draw the attention of the honourable gentleman to this, as I hope he will see the necessity of amending that clause. Priority of application for unsurveyed land would simply mean this: that, when a block of land was declared to be open for application on a certain day, when the Land Offices opened on that day there might be a dozen people waiting to give in applications for a particular part of the block, and the one who was successful in first catching the eye or the ear or the hand of the clerk would be the one who would get the land. Now, I think that that should be altered, and that the plan should be the same as with surveyed land, and all applications lodged on the same day should be in the same position. Clause 8 provides that all lands now open for settlement on deferred payment or for perpetual lease shall be open for sale for cash. That, I think, is a mistake, because in many cases persons who have taken land on deferred payment or perpetual lease in certain blocks will find the rest of the blocks taken up for for cash, and that will be unjust to the first settlers, who, when they took up their sections, did so on the understanding that the remaining sections would be held by the Crown until they were taken up on the same system that they took up theirs. Clause 9 is a very mischievous one. It gives the Minister power, if he chooses, to open any run in the country as second-class land, and to sell it immediately after for cash, at 10s. an acre;—there is nothing in this section to prevent the honourable gentleman doing so. I think that this clause, like some others I have referred to, gives a great power, which certainly should not be intrusted to any one individual. Then, section 10 defines how much land any one individual may purchase in any survey district; but, so far as I can see, there is no definition of what a survey district means, though perhaps the honourable gentleman may tell me what it means; but I fear that different interpretations will be put upon that phrase. I suppose that this means that no person can purchase more than 2,640 acres for cash—640 acres of agricultural land and 2,000 acres of second-class land; but there is nothing in this Act to prevent any person from purchasing as much as he likes for cash, and it re-establishes the power to create large estates. Then, it is made compulsory upon a person purchasing land under this section for cash to make a declaration before the Commissioner in terms to be prepared by the Commissioner; but why is the declaration not put into the Act, as it is in the case of the declaration required to be made by those who take up land under the perpetual-lease, small-run, and deferred-payment systems? I see no reason why the declaration should not be put in the Act. Then, clause 11 says, "In the event of any of the statements in such declaration being false, the purchaser shall forfeit all right to the land;" and so forth. But who is to prove that statements in the declaration are false? There is no provision in this Bill for inquiry in any shape or form. Then, there is another flaw in the clause, because, if the purchaser once gets his Crown grant, he can sell the land, and the second-hand buyer is in no way responsible. There is nothing in the Bill to prevent people from buying as large tracts of land as they like, building up what have been called in this House "great estates." No doubt the honourable gentleman means to provide that no person may be able to purchase more than 2,640 acres of land; but he must make better provision than is to be found here if he wishes to carry that out. He must define what a survey district means, and he must provide means for inquiry into the truth of declarations made. So far, I think the Bill fails to carry out what the honourable gentleman wishes to do, if that is his object. Then I come to section 13; and that sweeps away every safeguard that has been provided in this House for years past in the way of getting settlers upon the land. The repeal of subsections (5) and (8) of section 114 of the Land Act, and also of subsections (1) to (3) of section 149, sweeps away all the safeguards which have been provided for securing bona fide settlement. Then, section 14 reintroduces the auction system into our land-laws. As honourable members are no doubt aware, this auction system has been discussed in this House for years past, and, after a great deal of consideration, the House condemned both the auction system and the ballot system, and the present tender system was arrived at as a fair compromise. I think we might let matters rest at that; at any rate, I hope the House will not revert to the auction system again. I have no hesitation in saying that the auction system has been one of the greatest evils that we have had to contend with in connection with our land-laws; and, as a member of a Land Board, and having pretty considerable experience, I express my conviction that, in nine cases out of ten, those people who got their land without competition at auction have been able to carry out their engagements, whereas those who purchased by auction have very seldom been able to carry out their engagements. So that I hope that, whatever may be the consequence, honourable members will throw out this clause so far as it restores the auction system. Section 15 the honourable gentleman has described as one which will enable small settlers to acquire their freeholds; but I say it certainly means this: that it will enable all those who are not complying and have not complied with the conditions as to residence to get their freehold, so long as they can comply with the conditions as to improvements. The honourable member for the Wairarapa says, "Hear, hear." That clause may suit him and several other of his kidney in this House; but I may tell the honourable gentleman that I know several instances where a number of "dummies" have been planted, and where it is desired that this sort of thing may be allowed so that "dummies" may be bought out. I do not know whether the honourable gentleman has any knowledge of this sort of thing, but I have no hesitation in saying that this will enable that sort of thing to be done; and I have no doubt that some people very much desire it. Then, section 16 does the same as regards the goldfields. I do not pretend to know much about the goldfields, and I look to the goldfields members for guidance on this matter; but I do know this: that there is a good deal of difficulty in resuming the possession of land for mining purposes when it becomes freehold; and I think it is desirable to be very careful how we pass a clause of this kind. Then, section 17 will allow the purchaser of unsurveyed land to have it so surveyed as to suit his own requirements and tastes. I think that also is a very mischievous clause, for it may enable a man to have his land surveyed in a manner which, though according to his own taste, may not be at all suited to fit in with the general surveys of the country; and I think there should be some restrictions on the surveying, so that the interests of the country may be conserved. Then, section 18 deals with public reserves, and will enable them also to be made freehold. It seems to me that the whole tendency of the Bill is to wipe out of existence all that has been done by this House during the past few years. The idea seems to be that all the land shall be held in freehold, and none in leasehold. The whole tendency of the Bill seems to go in that direction. Section 19 gives the Minister power to say where money is to be spent—the money which belongs to the local bodies. Under the Land Act now, one-third of the money accruing from the deferred-payment sales and from the leasehold rents goes to the local bodies; and up to the present time the Land Boards in the various districts have had the power of saying where the money is to be spent. I have known of cases of conflict between the selectors and the local bodies as to where the money derived from this source should be spent, and when these have occurred there has been the Land Board to inquire into the matter and decide. Now it seems that the whole of this power is to be vested in the Minister of the day, and the people concerned are not to have a voice in the matter. Section 21 is one which, I am glad to say, I can agree with, but the honourable gentleman need not take any credit for it. It is a clause which has passed this House on several occasions, but it has been rejected by the other Chamber. Then I come to section 22. I also agree with this section, but I think it requires carefully guarding. I think that a considerable portion of the country might be leased in blocks of twenty thousand acres for grazing purposes. Seeing the great evil that we have to contend with in the shape of the rabbits, I have no hesitation in saying that we must be prepared to give a better tenure to our leaseholders if we expect them to cope with the rabbit-pest. I therefore think that this portion of the Act might be applied in certain places; and I should not object to give a permanent tenure in respect of land that would not be required for settlement purposes. So far, I think the section is not out of place. I now come to section 23. That simply means that we are to take away from School Commissioners and Trustees of Education Reserves the power of dealing with their own land. I do not know how these bodies will like that, but I know that, in the past, they have not liked Ministers of the Crown interfering with them in their functions. They, as local people residing in the district, know the land, and its qualifications, and suitability for settlement, and I think they are the best judges as to the most suitable use to put the land to. I therefore think that that clause ought not to be passed. I now come to clause 27, which transfers a very large number of powers now exercised by the various Land Boards to the Commissioner. I do not know whether I understand the Minister aright when he introduced the Bill, that the Commissioner should still hold the meetings of the Land Board.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON.—No; he would sit himself.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—Then I should like to know how he is to decide all the cases that come before him. The honourable gentleman's Bill fails in that matter, for if he turns to sections 43 to 49 of the Act he will find that there is no provision in his Bill for transferring to the Commissioner the work done by the Boards under those sections.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON.—Will the honourable gentleman read the first line of subsection (b)?

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—That provides that the functions of the Board are to be performed by the Commissioner; but why does he say, under the previous subsection, that the Commissioner is to have the power of the Board under section 49 and a number of other sections of the Act, and not include sections 43 to 49? Why not put it in a general way, that the Commissioner shall still sit in open Court and conduct all the business now conducted by the Waste Lands Boards? I think that portion of the Bill will require considerable amendment before it is acceptable to the people. I ask honourable members to look for themselves at the various sections of this Bill in which it is proposed to hand over the whole of the control to the Commissioner of Crown Lands, which, of course, will mean the Minister, and to see the immense power they are asked to place in the hands of the Minister of Lands for the time being and his Commissioners, who can do nothing without his consent. They will find that the whole control of the pastoral leases of the country is to pass into the hands of the Minister. Whether any portions of those runs shall be reserved for sale or settlement is left at his disposal; whether he will let them again will be at his disposal; the upset price will be at his disposal; all classification of land of every description will be at his disposal; and the manner in which the land is to be disposed of is to be at his disposal. All these things are to be handed over to the Minister of the day and his Commissioners. Of course, the Commissioners are merely a name, for they can do nothing without the sanction and approval of the Minister. I am glad to hear that the Minister of Lands is still determined that business of every description that comes before the Commissioner is to be dealt with in open court, and that the public and the Press will be allowed to be present. Do I rightly understand that that is what the honourable gentleman means?

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON.—Certainly.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—Then he will have to amend his Bill to enable that to be done. Then, I come to the proviso dealing with sections 237 to 240 of the Act, to which the Minister referred. His proviso simply means this: that it takes the power from the School Commissioners and trustees of education and other reserves to deal with their own land. There is another portion of the Act for which I do not know that the honourable gentleman has made provision. There is a portion of the Act called the Land Boards Inquiry Act. That was first passed by this House as a special Act, and was afterwards embodied in the Act of 1885. Section 71 of the Act of 1885 provides,—

“Whenever a Land Board has reason to believe that any lessee or licensee whose lease or license was granted at any time subsequent to the last day of the month of June, in the year one thousand eight hundred and eighty-three, is not fulfilling the conditions of his lease or license in a bonâ fide manner according to their true intent and purport, the Board may hold an inquiry into the case, and may declare all the rights of the lessee or licensee under his lease or license to be forfeited, and shall cancel such lease or license in every case where, upon inquiry, and after hearing witnesses, or without such hearing, the Board shall be satisfied that the lessee or licensee is evading the requirements of this Act in their true intent and spirit."

There is a provision to the same effect in section 78. But his amending Bill fails to provide that the Commissioner can do this work. I wish to know whether the Minister of Lands means that the Commissioner shall do this also. As the honourable gentleman does not answer, I presume that he has not made up his mind. I want to know whether these clauses of the Land Act are to remain a dead-letter, or are they to be enforced in future? and, if so, by whom—by what Court or by what person or persons is this to be done? It must be remembered that these inquiries were held by the Land Boards in the various districts, and, so far as I can see, there is no provision in the Bill for the same system being carried on. If it simply means that, if there are any evasions of the Act there will be no remedy. Now, Sir, the Minister of Lands told us, in introducing his Bill, that the work of the Land Boards throughout the colony had dwindled down till they had nothing to do. That may be the case in some parts of the colony, but I can assure the honourable gentleman that in that part of the colony from which I come such is not the case. The Otago Waste Lands Board during the year ending on the 31st March last had 1,538 cases brought before it within the twelvemonth, or at the rate of thirty odd cases a day for each day on which the Board sat; and, although those cases, in many instances grievances of settlers or selectors, may seem very light in the mind of the Minister of Lands, I can assure him that many cases came before the Board which were of vital importance to the persons interested, and that they were very much interested as to how their cases were decided. I have no hesitation in saying that if the Minister of Lands abolishes the Land Boards he will bring upon himself something of which he is not aware. I certainly should not like to be in his shoes if I had the administration of the whole lands of the colony without the assistance of the Land Boards. He will find that he will bring about his head a hornets' nest that he has no idea of. I know perfectly well that in many cases the actions of the Land Boards have perhaps not been to the best advantage, and in some cases they have become unpopular; but that is simply because they are nominated by Ministers. I quite agree that the Land Boards should not be nominated by Ministers, and I would suggest to the honourable gentleman that he should bring in a Bill to make them elective. He might reduce the number of members of a Board and have three instead of six, and let them be elected by the people. I see no difficulty in the way of their being elected on the same day as members of this House are elected. The elector might go to the polling-booth and vote for both representative in this House and member of the Land Board on the same day, merely putting the ballot-papers into different boxes. I do not hesitate to say that greater interest would be taken in the election of members of the Land Boards by people in most parts of the colony than in the election of members of this House, for the interest of the people is so much centred in the proper administration of the land that they would be very careful to make the best selection. If the Bill goes into Committee I shall, to the best of my ability, endeavour to have a clause inserted for the purpose of making the Land Boards elective under some system, and I hope I shall be assisted by every true Liberal in the House in doing so. I quite agree with the honourable member for Wallace that if we had a proper system of local self-government we might do away with a very large proportion of the present expenditure by placing in the hands of the local Governments the control of the various matters which we have now to pay nominated Boards for managing. The work could be much better performed if we had a better system of local government than we have at present; but, pending anything in that direction, I think the Waste Lands Boards should be elected, until at some future time we can do away with them in favour of a better system of local administration. Now, Sir, the Minister of Lands, in introducing the Bill, gave us some figures with regard to the returns from land. He told us that the expenditure placed against the Land Fund was more than the proceeds.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON.—No. If the honourable gentleman will allow me to explain, I will tell him I pointed out that, last year, after deducting the territorial revenue and the expenses of the administration of the Land and Survey Department, we had a surplus of only £15,000.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—I am glad to have got that explanation, and I am sorry he did not tell the head of the Government that before he prepared the Financial Statement, because we have it in the Financial Statement that it is to the bad something like £33,879.

Mr. FERGUS.—So it is.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—Very well; I am going to give an idea how that is brought about. In the first place, we have £305,208 8s. 10d. revenue from all sources in the colony, and from this money arising from the Land Fund we take £201,265 2s. 10d. and place it to territorial or consolidated revenue, and then we take £103,943 6s. and place it to the Land Fund. The whole of the rents received from lands of every description throughout the colony is not accounted land revenue at all, notwithstanding the fact that the Land Department has to do the whole of the work from which that revenue is received. We have, during last year, leased 475 acres to fourteen selectors under the agricultural-lease system on the goldfields. Every one of those sections required to be surveyed and placed upon the market, and it is a well-known fact, and the honourable gentleman knows it himself as well as I do, that it takes just as much to survey a section of land for the purpose of leasing as to survey it for sale; but that cost of survey is charged against the Land Fund, although the rents from the land go to territorial revenue, or are added to the consolidated revenue of the colony. Then, we have 49,475 acres leased to 249 selectors. Then, we have small grazing-runs, 105,857 acres to sixty-eight selectors, and so on. I might go through the whole of the Crown Lands Report and show where an enormous amount of work has been done by the Land Department and by the Survey Department for which they get no credit at all in the shape of revenue. The rents from all sources are placed to the consolidated revenue, and the Land Fund Account only gets credit for what is actually sold for cash. So that it is no wonder that the Land Fund should appear small. I do not think it necessary for me to say much more on this subject, but I would just say this: that I will not take upon myself the responsibility of moving that this Bill be read a second time this day six months, because I know that the Bill has to go before the Waste Lands Committee, but I tell the honourable gentleman that, unless it is amended very materially, in such a manner that he would hardly know it himself, I shall consider it my duty, in the interests of the colony, and in the interests of the people who sent me here, to oppose it. So far as the Land Board question is concerned, the question was raised during my election. My opponent distinctly declared that, if elected, he would support the abolition of the Waste Lands Boards, and I distinctly stated that I should do nothing of the sort, and gave my reasons for it; and I was the chosen of the people, so that I can speak as one who has been tested on that question. If this Bill become law as it is put before us, I predict for it a complete failure so far as settlement is concerned. The honourable gentleman will not get the revenue from it which he expects, unless he is prepared, as I said, to sacrifice the Crown lands for an immediate revenue; and, if he does that, I think he will be acting a wrong part, and not in the best interests of the colony. What have we heard on the floor of this House from time to time? We have had it said that it did not matter so much to the colony how much revenue we got out of the land, if we only got settlement; and I say this: that the Bill will not provide for settlement, but that it will provide for the creating of large estates to a greater extent than any measure I have ever known introduced into this House. The honourable member shakes his head; but I say Yes,—that is what it will create; and I predict for the honourable gentleman that, if he passes this measure into law, he will be one of the most unpopular Ministers of Land that have ever sat in this House.

MR. VALENTINE.—I do not propose to keep the House long with my remarks on this Bill, because I am so satisfied with it a whole. I think that the measure displays as great amount of intelligence on the part of the honourable gentleman who has framed it and has brought it down to this House. It has been, in our part of the country, a crying question for some time as to what we are to do to promote settlement, and there is a feeling that, unless something is done to discontinue the wild freaks that were being played by the late Government in the matter of land-settlement, some fearful disaster will befall the country. And, Sir, I might say that I know of no gentleman better qualified to take this matter in hand than the present Minister of Lands, who has had a large experience in this subject, and has gained considerable knowledge by travelling through the country and listening to the wants of the settlers in the various parts down south, at any rate. The policy adopted by the late Government for the settlement of the land, instead of promoting settlement, has driven away those who had the intention of becoming bonâ fide settlers upon the soil, and I have not the slightest doubt that the desire of the present Government is to provide for genuine and bonâ fide settlement upon a sound basis. I believe that the Act has within it provisions for the genuine settlement of the land, and not for settlement based upon quack nostrums such as were placed before the country by the late Government. The Minister of Lands stated that there were fourteen million acres of open lands and six millions of bush lands for disposal; but I apprehend we have more land than that at the present time open for settlement, but composed mostly of hill-tops. I presume the Minister of Lands does not include that in the twenty millions of land at his disposal. However, if he can get anything like £1 per acre for rural land and 10s. an acre for second-rate land, I should think he had made a very good sale indeed, because the best lands of the colony have been already disposed of. Now, with regard to the condition of the deferred-payment settlers, I, at one time, thought that this Bill would bring down measures of relief for them and also for the leaseholders. But, although there are no provisions in this Bill for the relief of those settlers, the Minister has assured me that it is his intention to bring down a Bill later on dealing with this matter. For that reason I will not say much upon the point here, because I am satisfied that, if he says he is going to bring down a measure, we shall get it very soon; and I hope it will be in such a state that we shall be able to accept it without demur. With regard to the Land Boards, I dare say that the abolition of the Boards will be to some extent unpopular; but I think it is very necessary. I am of opinion, from the little knowledge I have of these Boards, that, instead of helping the settlement of the country, they have been the enemies of settlement, and have put such prices on the land as have prevented people who were anxious to take it up from doing so, and that they have thus been the means of delaying settlement, at any rate, if of nothing worse. Then, as to the School Reserves Commissioners, my only regret is that the Minister did not with the same stroke of the pen abolish the School Commissioners.

An Hon. MEMBER.—They will go next.

Mr. VALENTINE.—I hope so, because if there is one set of tenants in a worse condition than another I believe they are the tenants on the education reserves. I am thoroughly convinced that they are now in a worse condition than the deferred-payment settlers. I am sorry the School Reserve Commissioners have not been abolished, and I hope he will soon take an opportunity of disposing of them, as he has now done with the Land Boards. Sir, the Minister of Lands said that the only proper way of settling on the land was to do it after having served an apprenticeship to the farming industry. I am quite at one with him in this, and I regret to say there have been too many instances in this country of tradesmen—such as tailors, shoemakers, and so forth—having taken up land, expecting to make successful farmers, without having served any apprenticeship to the industry in question. This, no doubt, has to do, to a considerable extent, with the failure, in many instances, of the farmers of this country. Then, we come to the question as to how lands are to be disposed of. The Bill, I am sorry to see, contains, in clause 14, a provision to continue the old mode of disposing of land: that is to say, it is to be put up for competition when it is applied for by more than one person. This I regret very much, and I gave notice this afternoon that when the Bill gets into Committee I shall move, in substitution of that clause, one to provide for the land being disposed of by lot or ballot. Whilst recently going round during the election campaign invariably one of the questions asked of me was, Are you in favour of the continuation of the present system of disposing of the land? My invariable answer was that I was not; that I believed in disposal of the land by ballot. I am sure that any one who had been, as I have been, in the habit of going round the country and intermixing with these farmers and labourers would have seen the misery they have been brought to through the unhealthy competition they indulged in at the time these farms or sections were put up for sale. No doubt a reasonable upset price was put upon the land; but, in their eagerness to become the possessors of a certain farm, they would run it up from £1 to £5 and £6 an acre; and perhaps at that time they thought there were good times in store for them, and that they would be able to make, at all events, a moderate living out of their investment. But what has been the result? From the time that they purchased their farms to the present time—I am speaking now of a few years back—there has been a continuous decrease in the value of produce. In every sense of the word, the pressure of adverse circumstances has been around them ever since. These settlers have fallen into arrear in their rents and payments. The Minister of Lands informed us the other day that they were £40,000 in arrear at the end of September last. They are unable to recover their lost ground, and all this in consequence of the competition for the lands which were put up by the Government. And I say that, if the Bill passes in the form it is in now, the Government will not have mitigated this trouble in the slightest degree. The present settlers will have to abandon their farms, and when the lands are again put up for sale the same unhealthy competition takes place, and the same disaster will follow the investment which the settlers have made. Now, the honourable member for Waihemo said that the effect of this Act would be that there would be no leasehold; that the whole country is becoming a vast freehold. I only wish that were realised, because I do not believe that this leasehold system is likely to do any good whatever for the country. I believe that it is impossible to get a man to work with earnestness and expend his best energies upon the soil unless he feels that it is his own property. If it were only his leasehold the chances are that he would take the substance out of the soil, and then throw it back into the hands of the Government; and that is what has been, and is being, done every day, as I dare say the Minister of Lands will admit. Then they have to put that land up for sale again; and do you suppose that any intelligent farmer is going to pay the same price as that at which the original occupier took it up, after he has exhausted it? Not likely! The land remains in this miserable state until some unfortunate comes and takes it up without the knowledge which those in the vicinity have of the farm. And then his time for failure comes in due course. The honourable member for Waihemo also said that, if the Minister of Lands allowed this Bill to pass, he would be one of the most unpopular Ministers of Lands that had ever been in the country, and that the measure would be a complete failure. Sir, I predict the very opposite. I say this, Sir: that if this measure passes the present Minister of Lands will be held up as the saviour of the small farmers of this country. Honourable members may laugh; but I have not the slightest doubt but that he will, and that this is a sound, honest measure such as we shall very seldom find brought down in connection with the land affairs of this colony. There is nothing hidden under it; it is a straightforward statement: and, Sir, I say that the Minister of Lands is to be complimented on the manner in which he has brought forward this measure. And, then, the honourable member says the effect of this will be the creation of large estates. Now, how can that be? The Bill provides that a man shall only take 640 acres of one class of land and 2,000 acres of another class in any one land district. Allowing that this is the case, I say 2,000 acres of one class of land and 640 acres of another is not a large estate as understood in these colonies. If a man has two thousand acres here and two thousand a hundred or fifty miles away, you cannot call that the accumulation of a large estate. I cannot see that the honourable member was at all justified in saying that under the provisions of this Bill it was possible to accumulate a large estate. Now, I would just say this: that, if this measure becomes law, so far at least as the settlers in the South are concerned, they will be satisfied that they have at last obtained measures whereby they may acquire land on reasonable and at the same time equitable terms from the Crown. And, then with regard to subsection (5) of section 23—"The renewal of education reserves leases to be submitted to the approval of the Minister:" now, I think that is a very just and at the same time a very judicious stipulation to make on the part of the Minister. I think that when these renewals come to be considered he ought to have a voice in saying whether they shall be renewed or not, or whether he requires them for the purpose of the settlement of the country. Altogether, in this measure I find means whereby, as I said before, bonâ fide settlement may be brought about, and that we shall not have to go back upon the recent legislation which took place with regard to the land-settlement of this country. When I look back to the time when the Government wasted the money of the country on these village-settlement "fads,"—(No.)—I believe it is perfectly true. My impression is that these were nothing but "fads," and that the money of the country was simply wasted in carrying out these experiments. And I believe that you will find this to be more and more the case, and proved to be the case, as the Minister of Lands investigates the position of affairs with regard to these village-settlements. These village-settlements will never be a success so long as they are situated as they are, at a distance from commercial centres. If these settlements had all been planted in close proximity to places where men could get work outside the necessary work devolving upon them in carrying on their little farming operations, then they might be a success; but as they are now situated I believe they will be an utter failure. I do hope, Sir, the House will pass this Bill, with the amendments I have suggested with regard to the disposal of the land by ballot instead of by auction.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—I do not propose, in making a few remarks on this measure, to take up very much of the time of the House; but, representing a country district, as I do, I feel that I should not be doing my duty were I not to congratulate the Minister of Lands upon the measure which he has brought down. I cordially agree with the last speaker that this is a measure which will meet with large acceptance throughout the country. Speaking for the district I represent, I can state most emphatically that, in reference to the changes in the land-laws shadowed forth in this Bill, they were welcomed at every one of my meetings during the elections; and, if there is any other proof wanted that this measure will find acceptance both in this House and throughout the country, I think the failure which the honourable member for Waihemo made in the attempt to pick holes in its clauses supplies that proof. I am sure the honourable gentleman did his best to condemn the measure; and what was the result? The burden of his song, as far as I could gather it, was that it would tend towards the creation of large estates, and that its tendency throughout was to reverse the policy which had been pursued by this House under the two last Ministers of Lands, Mr. Rolleston and Mr. Ballance. But the interjection of some honourable member drew his attention to the fact that under this Bill the would-be settler had the option of choosing the tenure on which he took up his land; that there is nothing whatever to make it compulsory upon the settler to pay cash; that all the most liberal provisions of the present Act will be just as available to him under this Bill as they were previously. Now, I would draw the attention of members of this House to the important difference this Bill will bring about. It will make it impossible for the future Minister of Lands to carry out his own particular ideas in the matter of land-administration. It was well remarked by the Minister of Lands that the late Minister, the honourable member for Wanganui, bent all his energies upon administering the Land Act from his own particular point of view. I know for a fact that many settlers were driven from the country because they could get no land for settlement except under perpetual lease or deferred payment. I could multiply cases in which this occurred, and I thoroughly believe and indorse the statement made by the Minister of Lands when he said that this administration of the Act tended largely towards increasing the number of unemployed throughout the country. It must be evident that, if we discourage the settlement of men amongst us who have money with which to improve the land, we are cutting off a large source of work to the unemployed; and no one can question for a moment that the settlement of the people upon the land is one of our most important industries, and that we should endeavour to encourage it in every way possible. The Minister told us that the main principle of the Bill is that the choice of tenure rests with the intending settler. I agree thoroughly with that principle; and I hope it will be preserved by the House in passing this Bill. I also highly approve of the proposals to classify the land. In this District of Wellington, since the passing of the present Act in 1885, it has been impossible to purchase land under 20s. an acre, with the result that many would-be settlers have been prevented from taking up land. Not only has this been the case, but the Government have been put to large expense in dealing with the rabbits on the land, and have succeeded very imperfectly in doing so, I regret to say. This has meant that the Crown lands, instead of adding to the income of the colony, instead of being a means of furnishing rates to the local bodies to enable them to make roads to open up the country, have really been a great injury to the localities by furnishing fresh supplies of rabbits from time to time to infest the land that is in occupation.

Mr. DUNCAN.—But the local bodies have got rates on the Crown lands.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—I am sorry to say that in my district the total of rates from Crown lands has not been very large; and now the Crown and Native Lands Rating Act is to be repealed, for which I cannot say that I am at all sorry. As to abolishing the Land Boards, there is a good deal to be said on both sides. I am not a member of a Land Board, but I can imagine cases in which country settlers who might be on a Board would be of very great assistance to the Crown Lands Commissioners. Some of the Crown Lands Commissioners, I know, are in every way competent to do all that is now required to be done by the Boards. But I fear that is not the case in all instances. I have not yet quite made up my mind as to whether the proposal to abolish the Boards is one that I can support or not, and I shall be glad to hear the arguments on both sides of the question, because we must all admit that there is a great deal to be said on both sides. There is one objection made by the honourable member for Waihemo,—that this Bill would enormously increase the power of the Minister of Lands,—to which I must refer. I think he must admit that the Land Boards now have very little power.

Mr. KERR.—They have all the power.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—The honourable gentleman will presently have the opportunity of showing us where the power comes in. I would ask him to realise the fact that the late Minister of Lands, in administering the Land Act, only very partially gave effect to the wishes of this House; and I think his administration well showed how little power the Land Boards really have. I certainly cannot see that if the Bill is passed as it is it will add at all materially to the power now possessed by the Minister: so that objection, at all events, falls to the ground. I very much approve of the provision giving power to take unsurveyed lands. The honourable member for Waitaki shakes his head. I have always respected the honourable gentleman's well-known sound judgment as to settlement of the land. He has had large experience in that direction, and I am sure we should pay attention to any arguments he might use. But I ask him to remember this: that the land throughout the colony is not all the same in character as that of the district with which he is best acquainted. We have great difficulties in the bush-country as to the roading of the land, and under the present system of survey an enormous expenditure is cast upon the Road Boards and County Councils, because many of the surveyors have had very little knowledge of road-surveying and engineering. As I understand the Minister's proposals, the first man to go on a block to open it is to be the road-engineer, to lay off the main lines of road first; and then the ordinary survey follows. Such a plan commends itself to my mind, because, from my experience as a member of County Councils and Road

Boards, I know that the imperfect road-surveys of the Government surveyors have cast a very large amount of unnecessary expenditure on the local bodies. As to the limitation of the right to purchase freehold of not more than 640 acres of first-class land or 2,000 acres of second-class land, I would remark that some honourable gentlemen seem to have a perfect horror of anything like an area of any size falling into the hands of any one individual. I am sure no one in this House can point to an argument ever used by me or any action of mine in favour of large holdings, or tending to prevent the utmost facilities from being given to all classes of settlers. I have always, in my place in this House, done all I possibly could to open up the land to every man who wished to settle on it. However, I would point out this: that the New Zealand settler, in selling his produce, has to meet the competition of the world, and unless he can produce under favourable conditions he must fail in his business. I therefore ask honourable gentlemen, looking at the conditions under which farming is carried on in other parts of the world, especially in India and America, which are the principal countries we have to compete with, can this House afford to lay down arbitrary rules as to whether a man should occupy fifty or a hundred acres, more or less, or whether the farmer should be restricted to the smaller limits in this Bill? It seems to me that, if the farmer is to succeed in his business, he must have an area having some relation to the nature of his land and the nature of the produce he can grow upon it. I would be the last to advocate any policy which would tend to throw large areas of land into the hands of a few persons, and I hope that members of this House who have such a horror of anything but the smallest class of holdings will give the same attention to the arguments I have just used as I shall be glad to give to theirs. I ask them to regard the conditions under which the farmer has to work if he is to make his business a success, and then, I think, they will recognise that this House will be making a very great mistake if it fixes too small an area. The honourable member for Waihemo said this Bill proposes an exact reversal of the land policy pursued by this House for the last two or three sessions: but I certainly cannot agree with him. If this Bill is passed the settler will not be debarred from taking up land under any system in force under the present Land Act—the settler will have a free choice of tenure; and therefore the deferred-payment system, the perpetual-lease system, and the sale-for-cash system will all have as free play if this Bill is passed as they have now. Another remark by the honourable member to which I must take objection is this: He said that the price of produce was now at a low ebb, and therefore there is no great demand for land in the colony. In reply to that, I would point to the result of the last two or three sales of land by the Manawatu Railway Company. Honourable gentlemen belonging to this part of the colony will bear me out in saying that no land-sales could possibly have gone off with greater success, some of the sections realising as much as £4 per acre. That is so strong a fact that I am sure I need not dwell on it to effectually meet the statement of the honourable gentleman. I am sure that if this Bill passes we shall manage to attract and secure a large amount of capital from the other colonies, which will come and be invested amongst us; and I am also sure it will prevent the leakage of a great deal of money made in the colony itself. Sir, I have no further remarks to make on the Bill. I had made a few further notes to reply to the honourable member for Wai-hemo; but, on consideration, I do not think his objections generally need answering, or, if they do, they will probably be answered by others who may take part in this debate. I will simply conclude by congratulating the Minister of Lands on the measure he has brought before the House, and express my hope that it will be passed with very few amendments indeed.

Mr. DUNCAN.—I have only a very few remarks to make. I, too, must congratulate the Minister on this attempt to remedy some of the evils of the Land Act; but I hope that when he settles down and we have passed this Bill, if it is to be passed, he will not go to the other extreme in a direction opposite to what the last Minister of Lands went. If he goes to the extreme in the other direction for the purpose of selling the land as fast as he can for cash, he will find that the remedy is worse than the disease, as at this depressed time it would be very wrong to offer our best land for cash, for it would sell at a very low price indeed. And there are some alterations in this Bill which, I think, if they are not amended in Committee or by the Waste Lands Committee, will not work very well. But, before I refer to them, I should like to say a few words on what has fallen from several of the speakers who have preceded me. I do not agree with what the honourable member for the Wairarapa said about the Minister having an easier position if this Bill is passed and the Land Boards are done away with. I think the Minister will find that his position will not be much easier if this Bill is passed in this direction. It is well known that at the present time there is a great deal of friction between people who occupy land, or want to occupy land, and the Government, notwithstanding that there are Land Boards which are composed of gentleman who are generally very well acquainted with the land in their particular districts, and who have, on the whole, administered the law very well. No doubt a change is necessary to improve the machinery connected with the administration of the land. We know that there is now a great deal of difficulty in getting land for settlement purposes on almost any terms. I know, speaking from my experience, that I have applied alternately to the Board, to the Commissioner of Crown Lands, and to the Minister to get land opened for settlement, and that my efforts have been unsuccessful. There has been a petition sent up from my district to have land opened.

It was agreed by the late Minister of Lands, at a previous session, that land should be opened up in the district, and yet we now have an answer from the present Minister of Lands that it cannot be done as required. I do not think that that is a state of things that should exist. Then, the honourable member for the Wairarapa said that the Land Boards have no power. I think, on the contrary, that they have great power. They have the classification of the lands, and the recommendation to the Minister of what the land should be valued at. They have the power of recommending where blocks should be opened, and for what purposes they should be opened; they have the fixing of the upset price, and of the size of the sections. I think that that is a great power. And what I want to know is this: Who is to do this work in the future? Is the Minister to be expected to know the value of the whole of the land in the colony, what the various blocks would be best fitted for, and the price that should be put upon them, or are the Commissioners to settle this?

An Hon. MEMBER.—It is done by the Commissioners now.

Mr. DUNCAN.—I think not. There must be a very bad Land Board in the district from which the honourable gentleman comes. Members of the Land Board in our part of the country travel for days and weeks over the land, and then bring their local knowledge to bear at the Land Board. I think there should be some provision in this Bill to secure local knowledge; and the Minister might very well have given the County Councils power to classify the land, to fix a price as upset, and to state what the land is suitable for, and to hear applications and objections, and afford the Minister guidance. I think that something of that sort should be done, and I will help the Minister or any honourable member who will bring up a proposal of that kind, as that would secure local knowledge, because the more local knowledge is made use of the more satisfactory will the administration be. I am in favour of doing away with Land Boards, but I should like to see something take their place which would be better than they are. I am quite sure that, unless something is done to insure the advantage of local knowledge, this change will be a failure if carried out as now proposed. As to the honourable member for the Wairarapa, I know he is one of those gentlemen who have acquired a very large quantity of land, and I believe that he has done very well with it. I only hope that every one else who has as much land as he has has done as well. At the same time, I say that, if he thinks that it is a beneficial way to occupy land in very large holdings, I think the very opposite; and if he were to go to the district from which I come he would see the evils that result from large property-owners, because in that district there are eight gentlemen who hold three-fifths of the whole county. And it is not second-class land that they hold, not third-class land, but the very best. And what are they doing with it? They are only running sheep upon it.

Sometimes some of it is broken up by some outsider to take a crop and run all the risk of bad harvest and poor crop through the bad weather, and many other causes. The owners run no risk themselves of cropping, but only have it put down in grass again; and that is the way the land is farmed. Instead of employing a number of people, it only employs a few shepherds. I think it is quite necessary that there should be some rule laid down with regard to the area to be held, and in that respect I do not find fault with this Bill, for I do not think that the area laid down here is too large, provided the provision be worked as stated here in a bonâ fide manner. But there are some things that require to be made a little more clear in connection with this clause. It is simply laid down that a man may take up two thousand acres before survey, but there is nothing laid down as to how this land is to be taken up. I think it would not require a very great stretch of imagination to suppose that cunning men may take advantage of this clause—there have been such men before—and may select their two thousand acres in such a manner as to make all the country lying behind that two thousand acres useless. A man could select two thousand acres in such a way as to take off all water-frontage, and make it useless for any one to go behind him, so that he would get control of, perhaps, four or five thousand acres. That is a matter which requires consideration. The honourable member for Wakaia thinks the Bill good throughout, and tells us that people have been driven from the colony because they could not get land for settlement. Now, I am one of those who have been a good deal about the country, and I have never found that people who wanted land very badly could not get it. I should like to see the Minister of Lands produce some of those applications from persons who could not get land. There must be plenty in the offices, if such applications have been made. I have myself seen people who have said that they had plenty of money and wanted land; but I think that the fact was that there was something else that they were looking for, and not land—some of them at any rate. But I am very glad to see the proposal in the Bill that people should just choose where they wish to take up land under reasonable restrictions, and under what conditions they like; because I am of opinion, with the honourable member for Wakaia, that freehold is the best tenure for land. But the people are not in a position to pay down cash in order to secure these freeholds, but want to get the land in a suitable way at first; the ultimate object with them being that they should secure the freehold. But it should not be given on the very easy terms which this Bill proposes, for fear of the land being taken up in too large quantities. I should like to see the land occupied at once. I know that there is a land-hunger among the people in every part of the colony, and that the land is taken up as soon as it can be got. I know of a gentleman in the district from which I come who had 14,000 acres in one block, and yet he went to the Land Board of Dunedin and got them to cut up a small five-acre patch, which had two emigrants' cottages on it. The Land Board foolishly enough acceded to his request, and put the land up in Dunedin without anybody in the district knowing anything about it, and this gentleman got the land and the two cottages on it, which cost about £50 apiece, for £25. There were two families occupying the cottages at the time, and the result was that he took the cottage of one of them and moved it away close to his woolshed. The other cottage was partly on his land and partly on Government land. There are many men of that class in the colony who are as anxious to accumulate large estates now as they were in the past. I think therefore that some time should intervene before this freehold is acquired, if it were for no other purpose than to keep this monopoly down. Now, we have heard a great deal of talk of there having been no settlement under the previous Government; but honourable gentlemen who say that certainly do not know much of what has been done in the past, because during the twelvemonths which preceded the last session there was more settlement successfully carried out than there had been during any two years of the previous five. I did not agree then with all the settlement going in one direction, and I hope it will not all go in the other direction now. I know the honourable member for Wakaia is a gentleman connected with a large estate, having the management of one, and, as such, the area provided here looks very small to him; but I would just tell him that the good land in this colony is very limited at the present time—that is, the unsold land—and it is quite time that some limit was put to the purchase of such land. As this Bill now stands I do not think that such a limit as is required can be put on the purchase. Supposing two blocks adjoined each other, one being in one survey district and the other in the adjoining one, there would be no difficulty in a person purchasing four thousand acres instead of only two thousand. That is not what is supposed to be done by the Bill; but that is what would be the effect. However, that is only a Committee objection, and can be remedied when we get to that stage of the Bill. It has been said that it is useless to put men without money on the land. I agree with that; but I have seen many men go on the land with very little money, who have succeeded; and I have seen men go on the land with a great deal of money, and they have failed: so that the fact is that it is the man who knows what he is about, and who is accustomed to working the land, who succeeds; and it is not necessary that he should have much money if he gets land on reasonable terms. A great deal has been said about these special settlements, and they have been condemned by many who say that there has been a great waste of money in connection with them. I should like to ask the honourable member for the Bay of Islands, if the action which was taken to put five hundred people on the land up there in his district had not been taken, what state would Auckland be in now with regard to the unemployed in the town? Supposing those settlements had not been formed in that way, Auckland would have been in such a state that it would have cost it nearly half this money for "unemployed" labour, and the work would have been useless, and the men would have been worse off after the work was finished than they were before, because the money they would have received would have been barely sufficient to keep them while the work was going on. I hope this village-settlement scheme is not going to drop. Although nothing has been said about it, I hope the Minister of Lands will see that this class of settlement is carried on: not as before, for that I did not approve of; but there is land in the South—I refer specially to education reserves, both high-school and secondary—which is very suitable for this class of settlement, for it is in districts which are already settled by people, some of them with large estates, who will give employment occasionally; and if these reserves are taken in hand and settled in this way there will be a very good class of settlement there, while the land will be as inalienable as it is under other classes of settlement. I hope the Minister of Lands will see to this. I shall give the honourable gentleman every assistance to pass this Bill with certain amendments. There are many of the clauses which require amendment, but still I give the honourable gentleman every credit for the attempt he has made to improve the land-legislation, and will assist him as I have done to previous Ministers who have brought in measures on this subject. I helped the Hon. Mr. Rolleston when he brought in his Bill in 1883, and if it had not been for some of us on this side of the House he would not have carried his Bill. There were four gentlemen—the honourable member for Waihemo, myself, and two others—who, at the last moment, helped him to carry his Land Bill or he would have lost it; and we did that although we were on this side of the House. The side of the House on which I may be never sways me when a Bill of this kind is brought in. I am sorry to say that there is no provision here for giving relief to the deferred-payment settlers. I have had great complaints to make in this direction, because in the district from which I come there are a number of settlers who were induced to purchase land on deferred payment through an advertisement having been put in the newspapers stating that there was to be a railway running through the district, without anything being said as to its being a district railway. Through that they were induced to buy land at auction, at some £8 or £10 an acre, about twenty-seven miles from Oamaru; and that was far more than the land was worth. I am glad the honourable gentleman is going to substitute ballot for this abominable auction and tender system. There are a number of those settlers who have had to struggle on under that ever since; and not only that, but they grumble at having to pay a tax to make up the deficiency in the railway. If they are ever compelled to do that—I hope they will not be, and certainly I shall not assist in bringing it about—but, if they are, then I say a Bill ought to, and must, be brought in to indemnify these people, for they can make out a clear case that the money was obtained from them under false pretences at the time they bought the land. Then, with regard to the deferred-payment settlers generally, I think the Fair Rent Bill of the honourable member for Auckland Central ought to be passed, so that the tenants of the Crown, and, indeed, I would say, all tenants in the colony, should have a tribunal to go before, and see whether the rent they are paying is too high or too low. That would stop a great deal of hardship, and would prevent many people losing all they have got. It is not good for the landlord, whether he be the Government or any other, that the tenant should pay too high a rent. It injures every one concerned. The tenant loses his money, and allows the land to go to ruin, and he leaves it in a far worse state than he would if he had only a fair rent to pay. I therefore think that Bill should pass, and should include every tenant in the colony. I have nothing more to say except that there are some things in the Bill of which I approve, and there are others which we can amend; and I hope we shall pass it this session. I will support the second reading.

Mr. COWAN.—No doubt this Bill deals with one of the most important subjects that this Parliament can deal with—namely, the management of the waste lands of the Crown. There is this peculiarity in it: that the policy set forth in it is somewhat a reversal of the policy with regard to the settlement of land which has been in force in the colony for some time past. Two previous Ministers of Lands held very similar views with regard to the question. Though we have been in possession of a land-law of a most liberal character—in fact, I think we may say that it is the most liberal land-law that could possibly be in existence—still it has not had that amount of success attached to it which its merits deserve; and I attribute that to this reason: that it has been badly administered—badly administered, I mean, in so far as it has been administered in one direction—namely, in that of the particular idiosyncracies of the the last two Ministers of Lands. The grand principle of this Bill is that the option of the selection of the tenure under which the settler shall hold his land rests with himself instead of being left with the Minister of the day. That is a proper policy, and in that respect I approve of the provisions of the measure. The honourable member for Waihemo has given the Bill a trenchant criticism; but a great deal of that criticism I will leave to the Minister to answer. A large part of his speech I may say consisted principally of Committee objections. With regard to the honourable gentleman's idea that the Bill has for its principal object the throwing-away of our estate, I must say I cannot agree with him at all in that respect; because, although this Bill certainly offers inducements for the taking-up and occupation of land, yet it is competent for this House, when the Bill is in Committee, to hedge round any of its provisions with such safeguards as honourable members may think desirable in the interests of settlement. The Minister has provided a certain safeguard as to the selection of land to be bought for cash, in so far as not more than 640 acres of first-class land, or 2,000 acres of second-class land, can be selected by one individual in any one survey district. I understand that "survey district" and "land district" are not synonymous terms. I was under that impression until I was informed differently by the Minister of Lands. A survey district represents an area of ten miles square, and therefore the safeguard provided in this Bill is the limiting of the right of selection within that area. As to throwing away the public estate, my opinion, after many years' experience—I may say after thirty years' experience in dealing with land in this country—is, the sooner the Crown parts with its estate in the way of obtaining settlers on the land, with certain safeguards for its occupation, the better it will be for the country. Therefore it will be our duty, when this Bill reaches Committee, to see that sufficient safeguards are contained in the Bill against the acquiring of large estates. I have been rather amused at the arguments of the honourable member for Waitaki and the honourable member for Wakaia as to Land Boards. Both those honourable gentlemen seem to be of opinion that those Boards are in possession of large powers and should be abolished. After experience for some years on one of these Boards, I may say that the Boards have really very little power. Those honourable members say that Land Boards are of no use, because they set too high an upset price on the land. In reality it is quite the reverse, because the Boards have no power to fix the value of land. The only duty the Boards have in that respect is to recommend certain prices to the Minister, and the Minister acts either on their recommendation or on his own opinion, as the case may be; and, from my experience, Ministers exercise their independent opinion with regard to the value of land. Now, speaking on the provisions of the Bill generally, I will try and make my remarks as concise as possible. I was pleased to hear the statement by the Minister that, outside the land required for the Midland Railway Company and Native lands, we have twenty million acres available for settlement—fourteen million acres of open country and six million acres of bush. We ought to be satisfied that this estimate is correct, seeing that it comes from such an authority as the Minister of Lands. I agree with him in the conclusion to which he has come—namely, that the lands should be offered to those who desire to occupy them on whatever terms may suit the means of the individuals. It is an opinion I have come to after long experience that unless a man has means it is really of no use his attempting to occupy land. While I agree thoroughly with the statement made by the honourable member for Waitaki that men have gone on the land without means and have succeeded, yet those are exceptions to the rule. It is equally certain that men have gone on the land with large means and have lost their all. The principle that the Government should have little consideration to the first price received for the land is one that cannot be gainsaid. The desire of the Government, if they are considering the best interests of the country, should be to get people on the land. If you cannot get people on the land at the price which Parliament and the Minister have fixed, then give the land for nothing; but do not on any account ask the utmost price for the land. With the general provisions of this Bill I may say I am pretty well in accord, with the exception of abolishing the Waste Lands Boards. To that proposal I have the greatest objection. My objection to the abolition of those Boards is, that I see there is an absolute necessity that there should be some local court of appeal as between the people and the Government, and that is really the use the Waste Lands Boards have been hitherto. If the Minister succeeds in carrying this provision of his Bill he will discover that he will bring on his department an amount of work of which he has no comprehension at present. The honourable member for Waihemo, who has been a member of the Dunedin Waste Lands Board for many years, has given the honourable gentleman an idea of the quantity of work which is likely to be brought under his notice from that particular Board. With regard to the Board I have a knowledge of, I may say that the people look to that Board as a court of appeal, a court at which they can air their grievances; and the Board acts as a go-between between them and the Minister. It is the intention to vest the whole of the powers of the Boards in the Commissioner. Who is the Commissioner? The Commissioner is, in reality, the Minister. He is the official who represents the Land Department, and the powers of the Boards are now to vest in the Commissioner. I should have had pleasure in supporting this provision if the Minister had selected some one of the local bodies for the duty. If the honourable gentleman had provided that the office of member of these Boards should henceforth be honorary, I think he would have found that the result would have been more satisfactory to himself as head of the department, and would have led to that economy which, no doubt, has induced the Minister to propose doing away with the Boards. I do not intend to go into the provisions of the Bill, but there is one feature to which I desire to draw the attention of the Minister, and that is the question of relief to Crown tenants. Undoubtedly, the Crown tenants must be relieved. The Act of 1885 provided a large number of modes of relief, and those modes of relief have been largely taken advantage of; but, notwithstanding that, the result is this: that the number of cases of arrears, and the amounts, are increasing. My firm opinion is that unless a considerable rise in the value of produce takes place the Government cannot expect to see many of these arrears paid. The position of the Crown tenants with regard to finance on the 30th March, 1887, was as follows: There were 1,202 deferred-payment settlers in arrears to the extent of £20,240; 31 deferred-payment settlers on education endowments, £2,709; 177 perpetual-lease tenants, £2,859; 49 perpetual-lease tenants on educational endowments, £3,105: making a total of £28,914. I regret to say that this amount is likely to be an increasing one so long as the price of produce remains at a non-paying point, as it is now, and the arrears will not be recoverable, because ninety-nine out of a hundred of those individuals, if they cannot meet their obligations out of the land, have no other means whereby they can satisfy the demands of the Crown. The honourable member for Auckland Central has introduced a measure with regard to this question—the Fair Rent Bill; and I regret very much that, through the forms of the House, that Bill, I am afraid, has no chance of being considered by the House this session. I take this opportunity of congratulating the Minister upon what he has told us to-day—namely, that it is his intention to introduce a Bill to meet this very serious phase of the administration of lands—and I urge on him the absolute necessity of pressing the Bill through. Now, in addition to this difficulty, there is another to which I wish to call the attention of the Minister, and that is the stringent condition of clause 123 in the Act of 1885, the purport of which clause is this: that, when a deferred-payment tenant forfeits his section for reasons assigned in this Act, he is subject to a penalty of 25 per cent. on the value of the improvements made by him on the land which may be sold to his successors. This is considered by the deferred-payment people as a very great hardship, and the difficulty of obtaining a successor to these tenants makes the hardship all the more serious because so soon as the tenant is deprived of his holding—and that is the only condition which is contemplated by the Act of 1885—if the Crown tenant fails to carry out his obligation to the Crown the Waste Lands Board carries the law into force, and he is evicted from his possession, and a fresh tenant pays the value of improvements assessed by the Waste Lands Board Ranger, which value is paid to the outgoing tenant subject to a deduction of 25 per cent. And what is the result? That, these sections being left unoccupied, the improvements deteriorate rapidly, and we have instances where the valuation put upon them after one year was 50 per cent. less, the deterioration was so great and rapid. Any honourable members having a knowledge of farming must know that if a place is left uncared-for the deterioration in the improvements goes on at a rapid rate. I will, when the Bill gets into Committee, move that the value of improvements, less the cost of sale, &c., be paid to the outgoing tenants. Another provision of this Bill is one which I highly commend the Minister for, and that is the provision he has made with regard to the selection of bush-lands before survey. Large sums of money have been needlessly thrown away on the sectional surveys of bush-lands, which before they are taken up have become valueless, and in many instances the expense has had to be incurred a second time. The idea he has embodied in this Bill—that of cutting roads through these bush-lands to be offered to the public for settlement, and making those roads the base-lines of application—is one which commends itself to my mind as being a very good one. There is a provision as to the area of small grazing-runs, and that is one to which I give my hearty support, for it has particular application to the district from which I come, where the country is very much deteriorated from what is known as the rabbit-pest; and I fear, from what I hear, that it will only be a matter of time before a large portion of our beautiful country will be subjected to the same ruin as the district from which I come from has been afflicted with. In regard to the provision contained in the Bill to retake the management of the education endowments, I hope the House will give this power. In the last Parliament this was proposed in a Government Bill, and it went through the Waste Lands Committee; but when the measure came back to the House that provision was struck out, the House feeling that it would be an undue interference with those bodies which had the management of those endowments. Without wishing to say anything prejudicial to those bodies, I must say that my opinion strongly is that the properties under their charge have not been judiciously managed, and I believe that when these lands are managed under the same system as the Crown lands a greater amount of satisfaction will be brought about. I therefore approve of the provision contained in this Bill in regard to re-taking the management of the educational endowments, if the House thinks it proper to do so. I shall not detain the House any further than to say that when this Bill gets into Committee I will give it my most hearty help, and I hope the House will join in assisting the Minister to make it a workable measure, and a measure sufficiently hedged round by safeguards against the acquiring of large estates, so that the administration of the lands, which I cannot say has recently been a success, will in future not only be a success, but will effect a large settlement of the lands,—and that is what we must look to in order to bring about a prosperous state of things in the colony.

Mr. SEYMOUR.—Sir, I propose to support the second reading of this Bill, not because I entirely agree with everything I hear of it, but because I think the good points in it very much predominate. I think I may say that I am extremely well pleased to find that the Minister of Lands proposes to throw open lands for choice by those who desire to settle upon them in any of the various modes which have been passed in the Land Act, but which modes have in times past only been operative in particular districts or parts of districts. It was the practice of the late Government to set apart certain blocks of land in various land districts in which only one mode of acquiring the land should prevail. That, in my opinion, has very much impeded settlement, and I am extremely pleased to see it is intended to alter it. I never could see any valid reason why a district should be confined to the selection of land on one of the various modes of cash payment, deferred payment, or perpetual leasing. Persons will satisfy that sentiment which is in everybody to get a piece of land in freehold first, and then perhaps take up a piece of adjoining land on deferred payment or perpetual lease. It has been supposed that the effect of this change will be to very largely increase the land sales of the colony, and it is thought that, if that is so, that is an objectionable proceeding. In my opinion it would be quite the reverse. I think it would be an exceedingly good thing for the colony as a whole if it could dispose of a very considerable area of these lands. Very much of it belongs to what is called the "second class." There is not a very great deal of good land left. Now, what is the position the colony is in in regard to the settlement of these second-class lands? Very large areas of this second-class land are scarcely available now for settlement because there are no roads or tracks through them; and the position of the colony's finances in regard to public works seems to be that, not only can we not furnish adequately our railways, but there is no money at all out of which to make roads and tracks which will be required to open these lands for settlement. Now, it seems to me that, if we encourage the cash-purchase system, and devote the sums which come from that to the opening-up of the lands by roads and tracks, we shall be doing the right thing to settle very much of the land which is now lying open for settlement, and which cannot be settled now without that. I should like to say a word in this connection, too, with regard to a portion of section 19—and I am very much obliged to the Minister of Lands for introducing that portion of the clause—which will permit of the spending of one-third of the deferred-payment money which has been in the Treasury from lands taken up on deferred payment, through there being no local body in the county to whom the money could be paid, and where there are works requiring to be executed. There is no object to which this money could be more properly devoted. This, I presume, will now be the case, and the money will be properly applied. With regard to abolishing the Waste Lands Boards, I agree with others in expressing dissatisfaction at this proposal, and I hope the Minister in charge will reconsider this question. The proposal no doubt will be discussed in the Waste Lands Committee, and I trust the Minister will see his way to excise these clauses from his Bill. My own impression is that it will neither be popular in the country to abolish the Land Boards nor will it be desirable. I have spoken to many members having an intimate knowledge, and they point out that many questions come before them which cannot be properly determined by the Commissioner of Crown Lands, who would simply send them forward to the Minister, who would be equally ignorant of the circumstances of the case. These are dealt with by those members of the Boards who have a local knowledge of the subjects, which proves extremely valuable. Then I will take the question of the assessment of the lands. In the district from which I come the lands are assessed between certain limits. So it is in the Nelson District, and, I believe, in other districts. The prices are not fixed; they are assessed by the Land Boards. Without a Land Board the Commissioner of Crown Lands can have no one to rely upon for a report upon these lands except the surveyor, and the report of the surveyor will not be sufficient, as I know from experience, to give him a good idea of what price ought to be fixed on these lands. The surveyor will state in his report how much flat land there is and how much hill. He will not be able to tell him what that land ought to be assessed at altogether, owing to the very different circumstances surrounding each block. On this account, Sir, I think it would be better that we should excise this portion of the Bill. It has been said that the Land Boards are very expensive. I would mention, as has been mentioned in an earlier part of the debate, that this could be met by the stopping of the payment of members of the Board, and I believe that throughout the length and breadth of the colony they would get just as good men as the members who are paid. I have no intention of taking up the time of the House any longer, but I would make this suggestion with regard to what I may call almost third-class land, which prevails to a considerable extent throughout the district I come from, and especially in the Sounds County: that a still further reduction should be made in the price of land below 10s. per acre, in order to bring that land fairly into the market and get it settled. Even at 10s. per acre the price would be too high, and I think it is worth the Minister's attention whether, in that case, as obtains in Auckland, I think, and Napier, and in some other parts of the colony, a reduction below 10s. would not be desirable. I would also ask him to consider whether he will not amend clause 180 of the present Land Bill by omitting the word "three" in subsection (1) and inserting the word "five." Briefly, the object of that would be this: The clause provides that protection should be given to the holders of pastoral licenses over their improvements when the country is relet to the extent of not more than three years' rent. Now, in my district small blocks of country are let on pastoral licenses, a few running into a thousand acres, but mostly five, six, or seven hundred acres, and the rent is very small for lands of an inferior kind, and to take as value for improvements a sum not exceeding three years' rent appears to me to be to take too small a sum. I suggest that the Minister should look into that question, and possibly he will make some extension in favour of these men.

Mr. BEETHAM. — I will not weary the House at any length with my remarks upon this measure, because I recognise, as I have done in previous sessions, that it will appear again in possibly a very different form from that in which it is now before the House. I allude to the action that always takes place in the Waste Lands Committee. I have no doubt that the members of the Waste Lands Committee will exercise a wise supervision; and I trust that some clauses, which in the course of my remarks I shall refer to, will not come to the House again in their present form. I wish to congratulate the Hon. the Minister of Lands upon the manner in which he has introduced the Bill. He has treated the whole question in a businesslike and sensible way, and I do hope that the introduction of this Bill has marked a new era in our dealing with the waste lands of the colony. Up to this time, or at any rate for the last few sessions, we have, I fear, dealt with land questions in anything but a businesslike way. We have not endeavoured, as far as I can judge, to induce settlement of the land, but have taken the opportunity, in our dealings with waste lands, to air our chimerical ideas, our fads, and our follies. I may say to a most unwarrantable extent. In referring to the different provisions of this Bill, I would first congratulate the honourable member on his proposal to deal with rural lands. He has proposed to sell for cash; and I am entirely with him in this respect. I have endeavoured, in my place in the Waste Lands Board for some years past, to insure that there should be a fair proportion of land open for sale for cash, as well as land open on the deferred-payment and perpetual-lease systems. I believe those systems can run concurrently with great advantage to the colony; but to tell people that they can only have the leasehold system is destructive, I must say, of our best interests. The question of the land being opened before survey is also a very important point, especially in dealing with lands in bush districts. We have, Sir, turned away time after time—I speak as a member of the Waste Lands Board—for some years we have turned away desirable settlers from want of having a sufficient survey staff to keep pace with the demands for land for settlement. As quoted by the Minister of Lands, I have known many desirable settlers visit the Land Board in Wellington and go away disgusted because, knowing we had a quantity of valuable land for sale and were anxious to settle the land, for the reasons I have just mentioned we have not been able to give them the facilities they desired. The proposal to increase the area of small runs from 5,000 to 20,000 acres has my thorough approval, and I was surprised to hear the Minister of Lands say that his predecessor suggested this course to him. I think it is a great pity that that honourable gentleman did not take that action himself when he introduced the Bill in 1885. If he had done so it is quite possible that a number of runs which are now abandoned in the South Island might have been profitably occupied at the present time; but it appeared to me, when the Land Bill was introduced in 1885, that the intention of the Minister was, whether wisely or not, to limit the area in every direction without considering whether to do so would be for the interest of the colony or not. Now, with respect to the upset price of land, I am dissatisfied with the proposed clause relating to this subject, because I find it does not appear to apply to this provincial district. The omission in the Act of 1885 of power to fix a minimum of less than £1 an acre, I thought, was an error; but the late Minister of Lands afterwards said it was done purposely. The minimum price of land in the Wellington District was originally 5s. an acre; it was afterwards raised to 10s., and during the session of 1885 was again raised to £1 an acre. By doing that, as I pointed out at the time, it was rendered impossible to settle a large area of land in the Wellington District. The Waste Lands Board had not power to offer the land at a reasonable price, and the result has been that settlement has not progressed on third-class land. What I complained of was this: I could see no reason why the Wellington Provincial District should be treated specially. In the Marlborough District they had the power to sell the land at a lower figure; the Auckland and Hawke's Bay Waste Lands Boards had power to sell it at as low a price as 5s. an acre; the Nelson District had power to sell at 10s.; and yet Wellington, under, in many cases, the same circumstances, was debarred the right of settling its third-class land, and the result has been that its third-class land has not been settled to any extent since 1885. I notice—and I merely wish to mention it just now as a sort of hint to the members of the Waste Lands Committee, who, I am sure, will consider the matter, and I am sure the Hon. the Minister of Lands will also give the matter his attention—the wishes of the deferred-payment and the perpetual-lease settlers have been met to a certain extent by the proposed changes. The abolition of the provision that one-twentieth of the land should be cultivated within a certain time, and substitution of a condition that improvements be made within six years equal to 30 per cent. of the price of the land, I admit, will be a very considerable advantage to the settlers in bush districts; but I would point out that the Waste Lands Boards have had the right to give deferred-payment settlers in bush districts leave to reside off their land for a certain period—four years is mentioned; but the perpetual-lease settlers have no such right. I can see no reason why the same provision should not be given to the perpetual-lease settlers. I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Lands to this point, for it has been brought under my notice a great many times by settlers on the perpetual-lease system. I may say that I think it is not advisable to limit the area of land to 640 acres in any one survey district. Of course, it was somewhat difficult to understand what a survey district meant. In the first place, I considered that it meant any provincial survey district; but I gather from what the Hon. the Minister of Lands says that it means a subdivisional survey district of 100,000 acres in extent. If that is so, then what has been pointed out by the honourable member for Wai-taki is correct, that the object of that clause, assuming it to be necessary, might be defeated by an individual taking the four corners of different survey districts, and thereby taking four times as much land as was intended by the clause—that is, 640 acres of ordinary land and 2,000 acres of second-class land. And I may incidentally mention that I do not think the term "ordinary land" should be used in the way proposed, because I think it would allow people outside to think that we have no first-class land—that it is all of an ordinary nature. It might appear to outsiders that "ordinary land" does not mean first-class land, and it might be inferred that the best land was all occupied. I think, as the honourable member for Waimea suggested, that there should be three classes of land—first, second, and third; and I would suggest that the Minister of Lands should consider the advisability of agreeing with his suggestion. There is another point that I wish to call attention to, and it is this: that, in the event of land being sold for cash—I allude more especially to the bush-districts of New Zealand, for, of course, I am more immediately interested in the bush-lands—that if land is sold for cash after roads have been made through it in only the perfunctory manner indicated by the Minister of Lands, the local bodies would suffer very seriously in the absence of their one-third refund for the purpose of making roads. Unless the refund is given in the bush-districts I fear that settlement will be very much retarded in the future. I know it may be said that this is returning to the old provincial system; yet I do think I am right in calling attention to it, because if in bush-districts settlement is to proceed at all there must be some refund from the land sold, if sold for cash, as well as from the deferred-payment and perpetual-lease systems. I, in common with others, was very glad that the Minister of Lands, in making his statement, was able to show that at the present time there is such a large area of land left available for settlement. I think this will weigh very much in the minds of individuals outside this House, that we can show that we have so much land available for settlement. The Minister carefully excluded mountainous and lake districts, so I presume from his knowledge, having the whole information of the department at his disposal, he alludes to land which is absolutely available for settlement at the present time. I am glad to think that it will go abroad to other countries that we have so much land available for settlement. I think it is an argument that we should use strongly to show this: that, whilst we have such an amount of land available, there is no necessity for Land-acquisition Bills, which I believe would prevent settlement in this colony more than any other measure which could be devised. I have seen communications from business-men in the Old Country who have stated this: that while we attempt such pernicious legislation as any measure that may mean the taking of land from settlers, and dividing it amongst others, we cannot expect any satisfactory settlement of our waste lands, or hope for capital to flow into this country to enable those who are heavily involved to relieve themselves even by a partial sale of their property. Capital will not come into the colony while we are guilty of even considering seriously such an unnecessary proposal for almost confiscation. A great deal has been said about economy effected in the Survey Department. The honourable gentleman certainly did not himself talk about economy; but he alluded to the economy that had been effected—£30,000 apparently saved last year.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON.—Since 1880.

Mr. BEETHAM.—I think that the late Minister of Lands, the honourable member for Wanganui, said that he expected to be able to save £36,000 on the land estimates. If this has been saved, as he calls it, it has been saved at the expense of a great deal of settlement that would have progressed if a fair amount of money had been available for pushing on surveys in various parts of the colony. We have endeavoured to make our surveys precede settlement. While we were following out that principle, we should at any rate, if we were wise business-men, have insured that a sufficient amount was placed at the credit of the department to push on surveys, so that a sufficient amount of land might be available for settlement. This has not been done. I speak both of Mr. Rolleston and the honourable member for Wanganui, who have been, perhaps through Ministerial necessity, both guilty of the same error; and, to prove that what I said is correct, I have only to point out this fact: Time after time I pointed out that men with money who were wishing to settle could not do so because no land was available, no land was surveyed. I wished the special-settlement system should be tried in order that land might be opened in that way. The late Minister of Lands, when he came into office, assisted by the provisions of the Land Act of 1885, very wisely allowed land to be occupied under the special-settlement provision. In the Wellington District alone within the last two years—I am speaking now in round figures—100,000 acres of land have been taken up under these special settlements. I think that proves conclusively that an inclination to settle was inherent in our population, but the means were not available. Now, these settlers, who will soon be occupying this 100,000 acres, are surveying their own land. They have the land, generally speaking, for £1 an acre; the land we are selling on deferred payment and to perpetual-lease settlers has ranged from £1 5s. to £1 10s. We have given these settlers, and wisely too, the land they are settling on at the rate of £1 an acre, with an understanding that they were to survey themselves. Where is the saving? Although no money is granted to them for surveys, they have land for it, and land at a very much cheaper rate. Although an apparent saving, there has been an absolute loss to the colony by not having surveys properly completed by the regular survey staff, whose system we know and understand, and who attempt, at any rate, to work out on a comprehensive system by extending settlement surveys from the different centres. Sufficient appropriation for surveys would have obviated these difficulties. I was very glad to hear the honourable member for Waihemo alluded to a great many times, and most of his arguments have been refuted very completely. I was glad to hear what was said about the necessity for giving a fixity of tenure in the southern part of New Zealand. I allude to the runholders there. Why, they are now merely tenants at will. It is absolutely impossible, with the great curse they are suffering from—the rabbit nuisance—that they can succeed. I believe the late Minister of Lands has at last begun to appreciate the difficulties the settlers have to contend with there; and therefore I begin to have more hope that those who have suffered from such disabilities in that part of the colony will now have a fair chance of success: and in their success the future of New Zealand will be very much improved. It has been pointed out that too much importance has been attached to the price paid for land. The price obtained is a material point for consideration, but successful settlement is the chief point; and I trust that will be carried into effect, whether by the Minister of Lands, or by Commissioners, or by the Waste Lands Boards, or any new Board that may be hereafter elected. Alluding to the question of Waste Lands Boards, I have heard it said in the House several times that we shall have every member of a Waste Lands Board on his legs, and that every such member will undoubtedly speak in favour of Waste Lands Boards. I have been a member of a Waste Lands Board for many years, and during my continuance in that position I have endeavoured to do good work. At any rate, if I have not done some good it has not been through want of experience or knowledge of the quality of land, but perhaps I may have neglected my opportunities. But I maintain that it would be a most unwise measure to do without any system of Waste Lands Board in the colony. I have myself—and I state it without reservation—the greatest confidence in the Minister of Lands. I believe him to be a hard-headed, wide-awake man; and I believe he understands the survey and land-settlement questions most thoroughly. I believe also that he has had good farming experience, and I believe he is not likely to run away with any particular fads. But I have seen Ministers of Lands whom I have not had so much confidence in, and I say this: that it is a most unwise thing to place the power that this Bill places in the hands of the Minister of Lands in any man's hands, whatever may be his character or whatever we may know about him. We are all liable to cranks and peculiarities, and he may be subject to some of these things as well as others. I have seen and known the difficulty that the Waste Lands Board in the Wellington District has had in dealing with the late Minister of Lands. I know that on many points where the Board held strong opinions our opinions have been resisted and vetoed. He had the power to do so under the present Act. Under this Bill the Minister of Lands can do whatever he likes. I maintain this: that there should be some system of Waste Lands Boards in New Zealand. There should be some body between the Minister and the people. I have always maintained that the system of nomination was not a proper one. I believe there should be, at any rate, a certain elective principle in the Waste Lands Boards. I believe it is perfectly right that the Minister of Lands should have the right to nominate a certain number of members that might be fixed. Perhaps one-third should be nominated by the Ministry of the day. The interests of the colony are materially affected by any dealing with waste lands, and by the course I propose a continuity of action would be insured, as well as the representative principle. I do not at all believe in what fell from the honourable member for Waihemo on this subject. He suggested that the members of the Boards should be elected at the same time as members of the House of Representatives. I do not think he ever considered that, or, if he has, then he has not the good sense I gave him credit for, because in many cases there might be no elections. The nominations might be all that was necessary. How about the elections for the Board in such a case? Is it thought advisable by the honourable member that each district should elect a member? I do not think the honourable gentleman thought over the matter at all. I think I will leave that question to the honourable gentleman's further consideration. To simplify the matter, it appears to me that the best way would be for County Councils and local bodies to be grouped together for the purpose of electing Waste Lands Boards. The County Councils and local bodies should have the right to elect a member of the Waste Lands Board. I think that by so doing we should insure having the views of the settlers on the subject, and we have also this certainty: that the County Councils are certainly as much interested, from their own point of view, in the new and rapid settlement of the country, as any private individual can be, because, as far as I know, throughout the whole of New Zealand County Councils are generally impecunious, and anxious to have a large rating-area as soon as they can. It has been argued against Waste Lands Boards that they are expensive, and that a large amount is paid in their maintenance. I admit it seems a considerable sum, but, as has been mentioned by the Minister of Lands, £905 has been spent in fees and £1,305 in travelling-expenses, the whole amounting to £2,210. If this is the case, and if the services of forty-five men throughout the whole of New Zealand can be procured for the sum of £2,210 to carry out what is certainly one of the most vital questions in New Zealand,—the settlement of the land,—I say it is not at all an outside value for their services. Now, I heard a remark not long ago that certain honourable members have been seen travelling on the railways with their passes in their waistcoats, and charging their expenses to the Waste Lands Boards. I have never seen that done; but, if it has been done, then I say our Audit Department and Lands Department have been very careless not to succeed in checking such a pernicious practice at once. Now, it has been said, and justly too, that the Land Board arrangements in Wellington are unsatisfactory, because two members come from one extreme end of the district to attend the Land Board meetings in Wellington, and their travelling-expenses amount to a very large sum. That is perfectly true, and I think the late Minister of Lands did act very unwisely in choosing two members for the Waste Lands Board from a remote part of the provincial district. One member from that district was a necessity, I believe; but, as it is, both gentlemen come from the centre of the bush-district now being settled in North Wairarapa. It was necessary that there should be one representative of the district on the Board, and I think the amount of £160 a year paid to secure the attendance of that gentleman at the Board was not a very large sum to pay for the services of an experienced man. Sir, I could say a great deal more on this point, but I feel that the debate is rather wearying the House, and it is quite possible that a similar debate may take place when the Bill comes back from the Waste Lands Committee; and, if it does not come back in the shape in which I hope it will come back, it will be my duty to again call attention to the clauses to which I object, and I give notice that it is my intention to propose a clause which will have for its effect the election of members of the Waste Lands Boards in the way I have indicated, with a certain proportion nominated. I gladly support the Bill, with the exception of the clauses I have mentioned, and I trust the honourable gentleman will be able to carry his measure—the first he has introduced—through this House in a satisfactory manner.

Major STEWARD.—Although previous speakers have gone pretty fully into the merits of this Bill, it is one in which so much interest is taken in the district I have the honour to represent that I feel I cannot allow it to pass through its present stage without saying a few words on it. Now, although I happen to sit on the opposite side of the House to the honourable gentleman who brings in this measure, I am not one of those who think that no good can come out of Nazareth. On the contrary, I heartily concur in the opinion expressed by one of the honourable member's own supporters as to his eminent qualifications for the office he holds; and I congratulate him very heartily on having brought down this Bill, in which I think there are many distinct improvements on the provisions of the present Land Act. Now, it has often been said in this House, and out of it, too, for that matter, that our system of land-laws in New Zealand is far too complicated. It has been said that we have too many systems, and that it is quite impossible for any one to comprehend what is really the land-law of New Zealand. I have never agreed with that view, because I have held it was desirable that we should have as many systems as might be required to suit different circumstances and different classes of people wishing to occupy the lands of the colony. But the one thing that has been wanting is this: Instead of a certain piece of land being opened in one part of the country which could only be settled under one system, and another block being opened in another part of the country which could only be settled under another system, and, again, a third block being opened to be only settled under a third system, what was wanted was that there should be a free choice of system. Under the present system the whole thing depended on the will of the Minister for the time being, and so long as that sort of thing obtained there was the greatest possible cause of complaint and the greatest possible dissatisfaction. It was therefore with a great deal of pleasure that I noted that the cardinal feature of this Bill is that henceforth—if the measure pass—there will be unfettered option on the part of those who wish to select land as to the system they will select under. That being provided, we do away with all the complaints with regard to complication, and every person can be satisfied no matter what his predilections are: the deferred-payment system, the cash-sale system, and the perpetual-lease system will be equally open to all in every part of the country. I think that is a very distinct advance, and I congratulate the honourable gentleman on that leading feature of his Bill. Now, another feature of this Bill which commends itself to me is that which proposes to allow of the classification of Crown lands. That is not a new feature. Honourable members who were here in 1885 may remember that, when the present Land Act was being passed, certain clauses, almost in the very words of some of the clauses of this Bill, were introduced in the measure then before the House. They were introduced at my instance when the Bill was before the Waste Lands Committee, and were brought down in the Bill as it was reported by that Committee. Those clauses proposed, as it is proposed here, that there should be the power to fix the price of second-class land at not less than 10s. nor more than £1 10s. an acre. In this House a division was taken on that proposal, and it was carried by a majority of 31 to 28, I think; and that provision was retained as an integral part of the Bill as it was sent up to another branch of the Legislature, where it was struck out with some other useful provisions; and, although a Conference took place, this provision failed of being restored. There was also in the Bill of 1885—and I am glad to see it in the present Bill—a provision extending the area of second-class land that could be taken up under the deferred-payment system by any one person from 320 acres—the maximum under the present Act—to not exceeding 2,000 acres; but that provision was also excised in another place. But I do trust that on the present occasion it will pass through all the ordeals in both Houses successfully and become law. The provisions enabling the price of second-class land to be reduced, and also allowing each holder to take up a larger area under the deferred-payment system, are just the provisions that are needed to enable settlement to proceed in the Canterbury Provincial District. There the land is open for free selection for cash at £2 an acre; but all the really good agricultural land, indeed nearly all the land that could be used for agricultural purposes, has long ago passed into the hands of private individuals; and thus, while with one breath you say the land is open to the people, you with the next breath say they cannot have it unless they pay £2 an acre for it; and they are not likely to pay £2 an acre for land that is not worth it, and few wishing to take up land have the necessary means to take up a sufficient area of such land as is available and could be occupied profitably. Again, the maximum holding of second-class land needs to be extended very much beyond 320 acres; for, while 320 acres of agricultural land is enough to enable a man to support himself and his family, 320 acres which can only be devoted to pastoral purposes is certainly not sufficient; and the limitation to 320 acres has acted as an absolute barrier to the land being taken up on the deferred-payment system. Now, there are considerable areas of land that can be cut out from large pastoral holdings—in some cases from five thousand to ten thousand acres, or even more—which, under provisions such as are proposed in this Bill, would be eagerly taken up by farmers' sons, thrifty shepherds, and people of that class, who have saved perhaps from £400 to £700 each; and there are many of them who would be glad to take up a thousand, fifteen hundred, or two thousand acres on which to make homes of their own, and upon which they would be enabled to support themselves and their families in comfort. I congratulate the honourable gentleman, therefore, on having brought down clauses which, I believe, will largely conduce to the extension of settlement in the Canterbury District in particular. Now, in connection with that I will refer to the objection of the honourable member for Waihemo to clause 10, which says,—

“No person shall be entitled to purchase for cash within any one survey district more than six hundred and forty acres of ordinary land and two thousand acres of second-class land under this Act. And every person applying for land for cash shall, before he makes his application or within three days thereafter, make and lodge a declaration, in a form to be prepared by the Commissioner.”

The honourable gentleman said that, while the object is to prevent the aggregation of large blocks of land into single holdings, this clause will not effect what it is intended to effect; and I fear it will not. The object of the section has my entire approval, and I think it will have the approval of all those who desire to see that it shall not be possible for a number of persons to agree to purchase sections as agents for one individual, who in this way might be able to obtain an estate of twenty thousand acres at 10s. an acre, by taking two thousand acres from each nominal buyer, and so be enabled to obtain a very large block almost as rapidly as if he had himself bought it all direct from the Crown. I hope the honourable gentleman will be able to draft another clause and submit it in Committee—a clause calculated to be more effective than the one now in the Bill. If the thing works out in this way, it seems to me that, whilst we might be doing a great deal of good, yet at the same time much evil would also be done: and it is absolutely necessary that we should have further safeguards than are provided in clause 11. Clause 13 provides a necessary sequitur, as I think, of clause 9. This clause 13 was objected to by the honourable member for Waihemo, on the ground that it took away all the safeguard for bona fide settlement of deferred-payment lands. I think the honourable gentleman was speaking a little without book there, for I can scarcely think that, well as he is acquainted with the Land Act, he could have recently referred to the clause or portions of the clause which it is here proposed to repeal; for, if he turns to subsections (5) to (8) of section 114, which are not to be applicable to these extended areas, he will see at once why these lands are to be exempted from the operation of those subsections. These provide, in the case of a licensee of rural land, that he is to cultivate one-twentieth of the land during the first year from the date of his license, another one-twentieth in the second year, and one-fifth of the land within four years, and so on. Now, as the land to be dealt with is not agricultural but pastoral land, it is quite evident that this provision could not be insisted upon in regard to land to be held in holdings of a thousand, fifteen hundred, or two thousand acres mainly intended to be devoted to pastoral purposes. Necessarily, there must be modifications, and I think that the modifications here provided for are reasonable. These require that he shall put substantial improvements upon the land, to the value of 10 per cent. in the first year, another 10 per cent. during the second year, and altogether 30 per cent. within the first three years. That, I think, is a sufficient safeguard for the bona fide-settlement intentions of the holders. Another feature of the Bill of which I heartily approve is that which deals with the provisos to sections 237 and 240 of the Land Act. Those provisos will be found attached to the sections of the Act which deal with the management of education reserves and other endowment reserves. The object of those clauses is this: that, whenever lands have been set apart for these purposes, they should be capable of being utilised for settlement without interfering with the trustees in the disposal of the revenue. Instances have occurred, however, with which the Minister of Lands is quite familiar, in which efforts have been fruitlessly made to induce the bodies having the administration of these reserves so to deal with them that they might be utilised for settlement purposes; the Boards having control of these lands having refused to do so. Power is now given to the Governor in Council to require that these lands shall be so dealt with; and the Minister is quite right in saying that that power will seldom require to be exercised, because the knowledge that it exists will induce the bodies who have control of these lands to pay some regard to the interests of settlement and the wishes of the people. I touched to some extent upon this matter when moving, the other day, the second reading of a measure which had this very object in view. I will bring the matter clearly before the minds of honourable members by the following statement: If they will turn to the returns to be found in the Appendices of the Journals of the House, 1885-86, they will find that the area of education reserves amounts, in the Provincial Districts of Otago and Canterbury alone, to 880,000 acres. Among these education reserves there are 153 the acreage of which ranges from fifty acres to one hundred thousand acres, and, of these, 139 range between fifty and a thousand acres each. These reserves are scattered all over the country, and many of them are situated in precisely the positions where they could be utilised with the greatest advantage for such purposes as village settlements, small holdings, and small farms; and if they were so utilised the necessity for such a measure as the Land Acquisition Bill or a Land for Settlement Bill would be almost entirely done away with. The honourable member for Masterton spoke of the Land Acquisition Bill or any measure of that sort as a most empirical proposal, one that was under no circumstances necessary. I do not agree with him. I believe there are, as in the South Island—even if the education reserves were dealt with as I have recommended—places, like Oamaru and others, where it would be very desirable, if the land could be obtained at a reasonable price, that it should be so obtained and cut up into small holdings and leased for the benefit of the labouring population, and for small farmers also. But the instances in which it would be necessary to so acquire land would be very few if the education reserves could be rendered available for purposes of settlement as here proposed. I do hope, therefore, that the Minister will persevere with this proposal, and that we shall have it this year assented to; and then the necessity for coming down with anything like a Land Acquisition Bill will be postponed for some years to come. I touched, a short time ago, upon the necessity for some further provision, as following out the intention of clause 10, to prevent the pastoral estate of the Crown from being bought up at the low price of 10s. an acre. If most of the pastoral country is to come under the definition of second-class land, the whole of which may be purchased at 10s. an acre, I incline to think that the honourable gentleman will find that it will be speedily disposed of in the way I have indicated;

and it would not be at all desirable that that should happen, for, if there be any land that should be kept as a national endowment, it should be our pastoral estate. I think the honourable gentleman, if he agrees with me in that, will feel it his duty to devise some clause which will prevent this result, which, I again say, may possibly happen if the Bill is passed in its present form. I do not intend to delay the House by going into other features of the Bill, but there is one matter to which I must just refer, and that is the proposal to do away with Waste Lands Boards altogether. I am free to admit that under the administration of the Waste Lands Boards everything that we could have wished has not happened, and that many things that we should have wished otherwise have happened; but I doubt whether the proposal which is made in this Bill will not bring with it, if carried into effect, greater evils than those we are at present regretting. The honourable member's chief argument in favour of the change which he proposes to make is, as I understood him, that he wants to do away with the roundabout method at present in vogue, which interposes difficulties and delays between the making application for land and the time of actually getting the land. It is a very good object; but I fear that, if everything is to be referred to Wellington, and if the number of cases brought before the Waste Lands Board of Otago is any criterion of the number of cases brought before other Boards in the colony, and if the whole of these have to be brought before the Minister, he will not be able to give matters that prompt attention which he desires to give, and that the condition of affairs, in that case, will be worse than anything now to be observed. I do not know that it would not be wiser to take some less sweeping step in the meantime. I should like to see the Waste Lands Board, if possible, brought more into touch with the people than they are at the present time under the nomination system. I think that there should be some nominated members on the Board, but that mostly it should be an elective body. If a Board of this kind cannot be devised, then I think that, if the Boards were made to consist of a smaller number of members, as suggested by the honourable member for Waihemo, say, three, we should arrive at a better solution of the difficulty than we shall by leaving the whole matter to the Minister. That is a matter which, no doubt, will be carefully considered. In the meantime, I simply express my own view, and I shall, between this and the next time that the Bill appears before us, endeavour to give it the closest possible attention, with a view to seeing what will be the best step in that direction. With this one exception, upon which I cannot quite see my way at present to go heartily with the Minister, the Bill in the main has my approval. I congratulate him very heartily upon those features in the measure of which I have expressed approval. I believe this Bill contains a number of proposals which will be of great benefit to the colony, and that its result will be to give an impetus to settlement, and greatly help the country to recover from the depression under which it is suffering.

Sir J. VOGEL.—Sir, I cannot help thinking the honourable gentleman who introduced this Bill does not fully realise its effect as it is brought down before us, or, if he does so, then I say that it introduces a policy of quite a new character and of momentous importance; for, as I read the measure—and I have studied it carefully—it means neither more nor less, in its present shape, than to enable the Government to make forced sales of the principal lands remaining to the Crown. Before I proceed to criticize the Bill I should like to make a few remarks upon the quantity of land which remains at the disposition of the colony. I find, by a return which has been laid on the table of the House, that the area of land already disposed of, either by sale or otherwise, is 18,400,000 acres; of which, 12,700,000 acres have been sold, and 5,700,000 acres have been given away in grants or reserved. No less a sum than £12,800,000 in cash has been received as the result of the sale of these Crown lands, of which amount Canterbury contributed nearly half—£6,000,000—and Otago and Southland £3,600,000. We are told that the area remaining open for selection now is 11,500,000 acres; besides which there remains for future disposal, irrespective of Native lands, 19,600,000 acres. Of course, of this land remaining open for selection, irrespective of Native lands, and amounting, in round figures, to about thirty million acres, there is not much which can be considered as equal to that which has already been selected. It is, of course, natural that the best land should go first. On the other hand it has to be recollected that, as population increases, and as there is a larger demand in the way of local wants, and as interest falls, the price of the land which remains to us should not show a very great disparity as compared with the land sold in the past. Then, there is another point I should like to call the honourable gentleman's attention to, and it is this: that the average areas held by single owners in the colony are very large, unduly large, in my opinion. There are 1,924 persons holding each over a thousand acres, under different holdings, including freeholds and leaseholds, but not pastoral leases; they absorb no less than 12,600,000 acres, or an average to each person holding them of 6,564 acres. Surely it is not desirable that we should increase this average. Legislation, or, at any rate, the desire to legislate, appears to be in the contrary direction, for we have had, at various times, attempts made, with more or less of approval by members on both sides of the House, to buy back some of the land held in excessively large holdings. And yet this is a measure which goes in an exactly opposite direction. It is a measure which, in my opinion, will increase the size of the holdings instead of diminishing it. I may be wrong, but in my opinion the result of this Bill will be a war between the landed and the landless classes. We are proceeding in an exactly opposite direction to the course adopted in other countries, where the inclination is to reduce the size of holdings, and to enable small proprietors to hold the soil. I express this opinion, and it must be taken for what it is worth: that if, by the greed of great land-speculation, this Bill is passed, the inevitable result will be a very severe graduated land-tax, if the colony finds that it is dispossessed of its lands at unfair prices as the result of passing this measure. We shall then have to insist upon the land-owners paying a heavy graduated tax in proportion to the extent of their holdings. This Bill, as I read it, enables persons to buy land to an unlimited extent. It is a Bill to encourage dummyism, if, indeed, dummyism is necessary; for it is so open under this Bill to obtain unlimited areas that real dummyism would only require to be concealed under the thinnest of veils. Permission is given to purchase 2,000 acres within each survey district. It appears to be open to the Government to appoint as many survey districts as they choose.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON.—The survey districts have been determined for years.

Sir J. VOGEL.—Is there no power of altering them?

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON.—The whole of our records are based on them, and the survey business is transacted on them.

Sir J. VOGEL.—I am obliged to the honourable gentleman for the information. Will he further say how many there are in the colony?

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON.—I cannot say that; but they average 100,000 acres each.

Sir J. VOGEL.—That is about 250 survey districts, or, in other words, permission is given to each individual to purchase 500,000 acres. I am obliged to the honourable gentleman for the information, and hardly think it will be necessary to increase the number of survey districts in order to give full play to persons desirous of obtaining large holdings. Well, Sir, as regards dummyism, it is open under this Bill, apparently, that each man can buy land, and his wife and his uncles and his aunts, his sisters and brothers and children, and his manservant and his maidservant can all buy land. In fact, I cannot see anything to prevent one family from becoming very large possessors of land without going outside their own limits. It is true there must be a declaration, and I do not know why the honourable gentleman has not put that declaration in the Bill; it has been usual to do so. I have taken a very high legal opinion this afternoon, and it is to this effect: that it would not be possible to put anything into the declaration which would at all meet with the statutory powers set out in the Bill. So that if the honourable gentleman relies on that declaration I do not think he will find it will enable him to stop dummyism. And even supposing a penalty is imposed and can be enforced—that is to say, that the person who had bought for some particular monopolist, having sold the land to him in defiance of the declaration which is not set forth, and which a high legal opinion says is of no effect, is convicted of having broken the law—what is the penalty? Twenty-five per cent. It seems a large amount, but to persons who desire to have land in large quantities 2s. 6d. an acre is a small amount. Persons who are willing to give 10s. an acre for land would be quite willing to give 12s. 6d. Persons who secure land in this way—and many of them are forced to do it, as I shall show before I have finished—buy the land with the expectation of getting a large additional value for it when population increases. The price of produce at the present time has very little to do with speculations of this kind, for produce is certain to rise. As history tells us, wars will break out in other countries, and then the produce of these distant parts of the world is sure to rise, and with it the price of land. There is nothing, therefore, to prevent an era of speculation because of a penalty of 2s. 6d. an acre. The honourable gentleman will tell me that it is only second-class which is to be put up at 10s. an acre; but it appears to me that this is a matter which is to be left entirely in the hands of the Minister, because he abolishes all the Land Boards in the colony. There is thus an end to all local control and all local representation, and the Minister places himself in direct communication with the persons who may be forced, as I shall show, to buy land, or who may be desirous of entering into the speculation. Then, not only is this Bill framed so as to enable all the pastoral land in the colony to be locked up, but so as to destroy our present pastoral revenue of nearly £200,000 a year. Also, for the first time, power is given to obtain freeholds on the goldfields. A number of persons who now have land on goldfields, and cannot get freeholds from it will by this measure be permitted to do so. I have no doubt that honourable members have observed a sort of foot-note to the effect that the land on the goldfields will be subject to the Act which provides for the resumption of lands in case they prove auriferous. I do not know how such a clause could have got into the Bill. It seems to have been put in by a layman and not by a lawyer, for it is mere surplusage. All lands sold since 1873, whether on goldfields or not, are amenable to this provision as to the taking of land if it is auriferous, and that provision is of such a curious nature, and gives so little facility to miners, that, notwithstanding the law has been in force for some fifteen years, it has rarely, if ever, been used. So much, therefore, for the protection provided by the measure for the resumption of private land if it prove to be auriferous. It appears to me to be a very sad thing that we, in this hurried manner, should obliterate the work of years. We have for the last six years been going on in the direction of carefully preserving the lands of the colony for the purpose of settlement and of discouraging speculation. There are some features in this Bill which give relief to persons who have bought with a view to settlement, and those are the spots in the Bill of which I am able to approve. But I look, as I am entitled to on its second reading, to the whole scope and pur-

port of the measure. It is a measure to reverse the direction in which we have been proceeding during not only the reign of the last Government, but during the reign of the Government which preceded it, the head of which Government was the same gentleman who is the head of the present Government. We are going, as I say, in the direction of undoing all the work of the last two Governments. If the Bill merely gave a choice of various tenures to persons who wished to acquire land, if the Bill contained adequate safeguards against the acquisition of enormous tracts of country, I should speak of it in a different tone; but it appears to me that the aid which should be given to those who really desire to become settlers is a small feature in the Bill. The prominent feature in it is the desire to establish a system by which the Crown lands of the colony can be sacrificed for the purpose of obtaining ready money. I shall proceed to remark upon a few of the points of the Bill, although it may be said that they can be remedied in Committee. I do not think it is right that the Surveyor-General should be in the position of valuing land. It is right, I think, that he should define its nature and describe what it is, but when it comes to putting a commercial value upon the land I think that is not a duty which ought to be intrusted to that officer. I am not speaking of the gentleman who now holds that office, because I am aware that no one could be better fitted than that gentleman to do anything of the kind; but I say it should not be in the nature of the Surveyor-General's business to take heed of the commercial value of land. As regards clause 3, this is particularising where I have before generalised, but I may say that it will enable the whole of the pastoral lands of Canterbury, which will shortly fall into the hands of the Crown, to be purchased for 10s. an acre, notwithstanding that the price hitherto has been £2 an acre, and that a large quantity of the land was withdrawn some eight years ago, I think, under the declaration that it was not desirable that it should be taken up at £2 an acre. This land is now to be offered at 10s. an acre. I put it to the House, is it a fair thing to those who, over a long course of years, have purchased from the Crown at a so much larger price, that this reduction should now take place? As regards the proposal for the unsurveyed land, I have treated it as being under the nominal restriction of 2,000 acres; but it is not at all clear that it is so. It is not clear that the honourable gentleman means to limit persons applying for unsurveyed land to the 640 acres of first-class land or 2,000 acres of second-class land. Again, I took a legal opinion upon that subject this afternoon, and that opinion was that it was exceedingly doubtful what was meant, and that it was transparently absurd to suppose that persons who wanted a large quantity of land for their wives and sisters, and aunts and uncles, and so on, would be content to make an application for 2,000 acres. Perhaps the honourable gentleman will say if it is the intention of the Bill that persons applying for unsurveyed land are to limit their application to 640 or 2,000 acres.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON.—The quality of the land will be ascertained before it is opened, even as unsurveyed.

Sir J. VOGEL.—All that is in the patronage of the Government; and that does not go to the root of the question I am asking. What I want to know is this: If a person wants to purchase twenty thousand acres of unsurveyed land, whether he must send in twenty applications in different names, or whether he could send in one application in his own name and undertake to find the money for the twenty thousand acres. It is always usual in measures of this kind to attach a fly-page showing the alterations in the law proposed to be effected by the Bill. The honourable gentleman has explained to me that he inadvertently omitted to do that. It is a convenient plan, because we know then, without argument, what is the intention of the Bill. Now, however, each person must form his own opinion, supplemented, of course, by the remarks of the honourable gentleman in moving the second reading. I was unfortunate enough not to hear the remarks of the honourable gentleman, and therefore I have had to interpret the Bill to the best of my ability. This Bill means, first of all, an enormous amount of patronage to the Government. The abolition of the Waste Lands Boards throughout the country throws upon the Minister in Wellington the whole weight of deciding from one end of the country to the other who shall or who shall not be allowed to enjoy the advantages which this Bill will bestow. I do not think, whatever may be the cost of the present Land Boards, that the various districts of the colony which hitherto have enjoyed their assistance will be willing to part with them; and, no matter what can be said in the interests of retrenchment, such a piece of centralisation—it is neither more nor less—will not be acceptable to the colony, in my opinion. Then, the small-run system is ended. Twenty thousand acres cannot be considered a small run in a colony like this. Virtually, the provisions in regard to perpetual-lease and deferred-payment lands are also to be ended. Instead of those safeguards which now exist in the shape of an obligation to cultivate and to effect permanent improvements, amounting in the one case to 20 per cent. and in the other to £1 per acre, all that is asked of the settler is to put on 30 per cent. within six years. Supposing the land to be worth 10s. an acre he has to spend 8s. 4d. an acre upon it; or, if the land be worth £1 an acre, he must spend 6s. 8d. upon it. Whilst I think the present obligations are too heavy, and especially the withholding of the freeholds for six years is rather too onerous, I think this Bill errs in the opposite direction, for I consider that some security should be taken that persons who obtain the land under exceptionally advantageous terms should really intend to settle upon it. Then, as I have said, practically, for cash, any quantity of land is open to any one person to obtain. The Bill might be, I think, correctly entitled “An Act to encourage Land-speculation.” Before I finish I should like to say a few words about the past. In 1876, when I had the honour of making the first Financial Statement that year, with the full approval of the members of the Government, its chief and leading feature was to point out the danger that had arisen from excessive land-speculation, and to recommend that a very material increase should be made in the prices of land. It was pointed out that it was not fair to those who had purchased land at a certain price that others should be able to come in and obtain the land with greater advantages. It was proposed to make a general addition to the price of land throughout the colony. It was an evil day when the Government which succeeded me abandoned that intention. The consequence was seen in the huge speculation and gambling in land. During the two years no less than two millions and a quarter of revenue was obtained from land-sales. I am speaking from memory—my figures may not be quite exact: at any rate, the amount was over two millions for the two years. It has left a legacy of disaster and misfortune to the colony which we have not yet escaped from, for it should not be supposed that it was altogether speculation arising out of gambling instincts. A great deal of it was caused by men who had no desire to purchase land, no intention to do so, being forced to purchase, because otherwise their properties would have been confiscated by speculators. They were forced to purchase runs a long time in advance of the time when they required them, because if they did not do so speculators would take them up. Now, this Bill revives, or endeavours to revive, that period again, and it does so in this manner: that it reduces the price of land enormously, gives the utmost facilities for obtaining it, and offers inducements to persons who are inclined to speculate. The banks are full of money now; and it is quite possible—I am not prepared to express an opinion—the Bill may answer the purpose for which it seems to exist, and it may lead to another huge gamble in land. Either it will do that, or it will stand upon record that the value of the Crown estate has become so enormously reduced that it will affect the fiscal operations in connection with the land-purchases from the Crown; it will create disaster in reference to the securities now placed upon the land according to what is supposed to be its present value, or lead to an era of speculation. And bear this in mind: The poor man will suffer. You will have what occurred in New South Wales, and what occurred on a small scale here—a new era of forced speculation. There will be no unemployed if this Bill passes. Any person possessing a very moderate amount of means could go round the various runs of the colony and exercise that occupation which is known as “black-mailing.” It would only be necessary for two or three persons to appear at a station and commence to drive in pegs and so on, to either force the owner of the station to purchase the land or buy off those who are “black-mailing” him. That is what took place in New South Wales.

Persons visited a station, and the holder of the run had to buy them off or submit to the eyes being picked out of his run. All the runholders of the colony who had not the means should either have to embarrass themselves by obtaining loans, or would have to submit to their runs being taken from them. That is a new version of finding employment, and a fresh local industry, though I cannot say that I think it a desirable one. I trust this Bill will not pass in its present shape. Because of its redeeming features, I shall not move that it be read a second time this day six months, but I hope it will come back to us from the Waste Lands Committee in an improved condition. But, if it is to pass as it now is, I venture to say that it will prove a curse to the colony, and that the present is a time when it is entirely undesirable to encourage fresh speculative operations—not only encourage them, but to force those men who are not inclined to do anything of the kind to do so in self-defence. I regret I should have spoken in so harsh a manner of this measure, because I do not fail to recognise the ability with which it has been drawn up; and, for my part, I recognise the solid qualities, and desire to be of advantage to the colony, which, I believe, eminently distinguish the honourable gentleman who is in charge of the Bill. It is really no reflection upon him that he should have failed, in the very short time he has had at his disposal, to bring down a measure altering so radically the land-laws of the colony; and I rather think the honourable gentleman might, without any discredit to himself, confess that the Bill goes much further than he intended, or admit that it is not right, at so short a notice, to bring down a Bill which I might, without offence, term as of a revolutionary character. Sir, I have purposely made my remarks as brief as I could make them.

Mr. FISHER.—Sir, the honourable gentleman need not have regretted his harshness of expression, because it is now generally recognised that he has become so blunted in feeling and perception that any harshness of expression on his part has little or no effect whatever upon the House. I hardly know what effect these rambling denunciations of the Government are intended to have upon the House, especially when applied to a measure prepared with such care as to have extracted from the honourable gentleman the admission that great care had evidently been bestowed upon its preparation. Why, Sir, in regard to the simplest provisions of the Bill the honourable gentleman has displayed the most complete ignorance, for he asked the very simple question, whether the right to select the 640 or the 2,000 acres was to confer the right to select any description of land of that quality before survey. The question is answered by the Bill itself. If that were the only point upon which the honourable gentleman had displayed such entire ignorance of the provisions of the Bill I should not have risen to answer his ranting denunciations, for the speech was composed of denunciation throughout, not criticism. He said the effect of the Bill would be to lead to a huge gamble in land. Sir, I hurl back that accusation; and I ask the the honourable gentleman whether such a charge should have emanated from him, above all men! I ask whether he has forgotten that now famous Land Acquisition Bill introduced by his colleague, the honourable member for Wanganui. Sir, if ever there was an attempt to play off upon this country anything in the shape of a huge gamble in land, it was contained in the Bill of the honourable gentleman's colleague. If ever an attempt was made by any Government, or by a member of any Government, to play into the hands of large landowners and speculators, I say the attempt was made in that Bill.

Sir J. VOGEL.—Will the honourable gentleman pardon me a moment? I wish to say I had in my mind what the head of the Government expressly stated—that the Bill was a desirable Bill.

Major ATKINSON.—No; I did not. I said, with safeguards.

Mr. FISHER.—Next the honourable gentleman said one of the principal objects of this Bill was to sacrifice the Crown lands of the colony for the purpose of obtaining revenue. Am I correct in attributing that remark to the honourable gentleman? The honourable gentleman gives an affirmative nod. Then, Sir, the answer to that statement is: that under the land-laws of his own Government, the honourable gentleman had so mismanaged the land revenue of the country that it had in one short year fallen off to the extent of £56,000; and because we propose in this Bill to administer the land-laws of the country that they shall, at all events, meet the necessary expenditure connected with their administration, we are accused of sacrificing, or with attempting to sacrifice, the lands of the colony for the purpose of obtaining revenue. Now, let us see by the records of the country, let us prove, out of his own mouth, how he managed—or, I should say, mismanaged—the land-laws and the land-revenue of this colony. In his Financial Statement for 1886 the honourable gentleman testifies to the very able and efficient manner in which he and his Government had administered the land-laws by making this statement:—

“The Land Fund Account had a balance at the commencement of the year of £31,931, and at the end of the year there was a deficit of £20,384. This eminently unsatisfactory result is but the consummation of a series of diminished receipts not compensated sufficiently by reduced expenditure.”

And the honourable gentleman, after this humiliating confession of his inability and the inability of his Government, comes down and says—because we propose to administer the land-laws in such a way as to insure that they shall not entail loss upon the colony—that we are proposing a scheme to sacrifice the Crown land for the purpose of obtaining revenue. He followed up the statement I have just read by saying in his Financial Statement for 1887—and here, again, is another tribute to the honourable gentleman's great genius in land-administration,—

"The deficiency in the Land Fund has increased. I shall have to explain later that the change in the land policy is accountable for the result, and that it is necessary to make some permanent provision to meet the altered financial condition of this class of revenue."

That I hold to be a plain and distinct admission of the failure of the land policy of his Government. Then the honourable gentleman proceeded to say that it was a very sad thing that we should, in this hurried manner, obliterate the work of six years. What did the honourable gentleman mean by that? He meant to impute, I presume, that we were attempting to disturb the perpetual-lease and deferred-payment systems. Those were the systems to which the honourable gentleman alluded in his reference to the attempt to upset the work of the last six years. The statement is totally incorrect. But did the honourable gentleman himself approve of the systems which he says had been in operation for the past six years? For instance, what is his real opinion, when he cares to give it to us, of the perpetual-lease system? It is this; and neither I, nor any member of the Government, nor any member of this House, has ever spoken of that perpetual-lease system in the contemptuous terms in which the honourable gentleman has spoken of it himself: In his now celebrated Ashburton speech, he said no one but an idiot would ever think of taking up land on the perpetual-lease system. The honourable gentleman—

Sir J. VOGEL.—But you are misreading what I said.

Mr. FISHER.—I will read what the honourable gentleman said, if he wishes it. I am referring to the Ashburton speech, in which he said that no one but an idiot would ever think of taking up land on the system of perpetual lease. But this Bill does not propose to do away with the perpetual-lease system. We only propose to render the system less onerous to those who take up lands under it. And, because we do that, the honourable gentleman says we are attempting to do away with the work of the last six years. What a change has come over the spirit of the honourable gentleman's dream! How tenderly he now watches over the "idiotic" perpetual lease! And how has that wonderful change been brought about? It has been brought about by the honourable gentleman's translation from these benches to those. He has proved a perfect political teetotum. He is of one opinion to-day and another to-morrow on any given question. He never has and never had a fixed idea on any subject whatever, and we never had a better illustration of that than is contained in the speech of the honourable gentleman to-night. It is said this Bill will encourage speculation, and that the lands of the colony are to be mopped up by huge speculators and their sisters and their cousins and their aunts. That is the purest moonshine. What does the Bill propose to do? Its salient feature is that it will promote settlement upon small holdings, for it says that not more than 640 acres shall be taken up in any one survey district—that is to say, 640 acres of first-class land. I agree with the honourable member for Masterton that the term "ordinary lands" is a mistaken term, and that it should be "first-class lands." Not more than 640 acres of first-class land is to be taken up in any one survey district, nor more than 2,000 acres of second-class land. I ask whether a Bill so framed is not a Bill devised directly in the interest of settlement and in the interest of small holdings throughout the country. Surely 640 acres cannot be called a holding of unreasonable extent. Is it more than a man can make a fair living upon? And then, when you come to the 2,000 acres of land of inferior quality, is that too large a holding? I say it is not; and when we declare by legislative enactment that no man shall hold more than 640 acres of first-class land or more than 2,000 acres of second-class land in any one survey district, I say that such a provision is fair and equitable, and beneficial to the interests of the country. Moreover, we have so altered the law that people who come here with moderate means will have the opportunity of purchasing for cash land set apart under any one of the systems which exist in the country; and Heaven knows we have enough systems. Yet, because we say a man shall have the option of acquiring land under the perpetual-lease system, or the deferred-payment system—which is the best system of all—or that if he has money and can pay cash he may acquire the freehold at once, that is called an illiberal system, or a system devised in the interests of speculators. I confess I never, in the whole course of my life, listened to a speech so devoid of common-sense. Is it not known to every member of this House that the provision which debarred men from taking up fifty or a hundred acres of land and paying cash for it has injured the country? Has it not been the cry throughout the land that the country has suffered through the stoppage of cash sales, and that people who came willing to purchase and to become valuable settlers have been, in consequence, driven out of the country? The answer is a universal answer, and every member of this House, I am sure, is in a position to give some instances of persons who have been compelled to go away from the country because they were not permitted to pay cash and acquire a freehold. Sir, I did not intend to discuss the Bill in detail, because to do so is the special function of my honourable friend the Minister of Lands. I should not, indeed, have risen but for the speech of the honourable member for Christchurch North, which, to begin with, displayed entire ignorance of the provisions of the Bill, and, in the second place, evinced a strong and wholly unwarrantable spirit of antagonism to the Government. I regret that the honourable gentleman should have spoken in such terms. Any member of the House who will analyse the Bill must clearly see that it is an honest and well-meant endeavour to settle the lands of the country, and to insure that the expenses of administration shall be recouped by a moderate return from the sale of land. The principal and the only variation from the existing system is that a man who desires to acquire a moderate-sized freehold by paying for it in cash shall have the privilege of doing so. And to say that that is an unwholesome or undesirable feature to introduce into the land-laws of the country is to tell me something that is past belief. I am sorry such a speech should have been made. The Bill does not justify it. The honourable gentleman's remarks appear to have been dictated purely by his antagonistic feeling toward the Government.

Mr. SEDDON.—Sir, the Bill now before us well merits every word that has been said against it by the honourable member for Christchurch North; and I will say this: that I do not think that ever a more pernicious Bill was introduced into this Chamber, or a Bill whose effect was more detrimental to the welfare of the great mass of the people of New Zealand than this will be if it be passed. Sir, I think I shall be able to prove that when I go into details on the Bill: but, for the present, I will deal with the Minister of Education. That honourable gentleman's position upon the Government benches in reference to the honourable member for Christchurch North reminds me of a sable-coloured gentleman who was engaged by and always accompanied the Salvation Army. That gentleman's functions were well known to the larrikin class. The Hon. the Minister of Education has taken up the negro's forcible-ejection position in this House. It may say something for the physical, but without doubt it says very little for the mental, capabilities of the honourable gentleman. In the case of the gentleman that accompanied the Salvation Army little intelligence was required, but brute force was indispensable. But even those who sometimes were ungenerously treated found a way of punishing that gentleman, and that was simply upon occasions treading on his corns. It would appear to me as though the honourable member for Christchurch North had in some way or other trodden upon the corns of the Minister of Education, for he never misses an opportunity of reviling him as far as he possibly can, and of ridiculing any statement made by that honourable gentleman. If the Minister of Education were somewhat consistent in his statements, or would endeavour, as far as possible, to be consistent, I should, perhaps, excuse him; but he does nothing of the kind. He did not treat the honourable member for Christchurch North fairly, for in quoting the sentence from that honourable gentleman's speech at Ashburton, he should have completed the sentence, if he had the newspaper report here, and he would have seen that it would bear a different interpretation altogether. And, Sir, the law has been altered since, and altered by the Government of the honourable member for Christchurch North, from the state in which it was when he said that persons would be devoid of intelligence if they took up perpetual leases.

Mr. FISHER.—I will read the speech.

Mr. SEDDON.—My honourable friend should have read the whole of the paragraph when speaking. He ought to have done justice then: it is too late now. Then, as to this question of the deficit, as pointed out by the Colonial Treasurer there is no deficit; it is simply a question of the method of keeping the accounts and making certain charges against the Land Fund. No deficit would be shown if the rents were credited to the Land Fund Account: the revenue from the land is paid out in a different direction, and not credited to the Land Fund. To say that there is a deficit of £56,000 is saying that which is not correct. There would be no deficit if the accounts were kept as they ought to be. Then, I will put it in another way: if we have in days gone by been reserving the land for the people, whilst at the same time our population has been increasing, does it mean that, after so improving the value of lands, that profit is to be swept away by the Bill before us? Are we to have nothing to compensate us for that improvement? Far be it from me that I should be a party to sacrificing these lands because the country wants a few pounds now. We should not sacrifice hastily and without due consideration the savings of past years. Here is another instance of inconsistency on the part of the Minister of Education: I heard him say—and it tingled in my ears—words to this effect: "We shall not be found one Minister in one lobby and another Minister in another lobby;" and yet the night after that, Sir, I saw that honourable gentleman going into one lobby and his colleagues going into the other. Where is his consistency? And yet he points to the honourable member for Christchurch North and says that he is inconsistent. Then, where is the consistency of the present Premier? He was at the head of the Government from 1879 to 1884, when Mr. Rolleston was Minister of Lands—a gentleman who was one of the most able administrators of lands we have ever had, for he had given a lifelong study to the question; and are all his labours, the labours of a master-mind in that direction, to be swept away at a moment's notice—swept away, when the Premier holds the same position that he held when Mr. Rolleston was Minister of Lands?

An Hon. MEMBER.—Altered circumstances of the colony.

Mr. SEDDON.—Altered circumstances! The colony was in a much worse position from 1879 to 1883; and I can prove it. The present Premier, when Colonial Treasurer, told the people of New Zealand that we were on the verge of ruin, the verge of repudiation, and there was a deficiency of over £800,000. We have not been told that now. Yet did the Premier then endeavour to enact land-laws sacrificing the public estate for the sake of cash? No, Sir; because he was guided by his able colleague, the late Minister of Lands. During those times, when the colony was in a far worse position than it is in now, we conserved the principles of the Land Act of 1877, and maintained the same principles in the Act of 1882; but now they are to be swept away. Here again I join issue with the Minister of Education. The late Minister of Lands considered that plots of land of from ten to fifty acres were sufficient for poor men; but here we have the present Minister of Education saying that a mile square of country is a small slice for a poor man, whilst, as the land-laws have been in Canterbury and Otago, five and ten acres was the most that was given in the proximity of towns. Now we are told by an authority on the subject that 640 acres of first-class land and 2,000 acres of second-class land is a small area. Every word that was uttered, every syllable, showed clearly and conclusively that the Minister of Education knew he was speaking that which was somewhat strained, because it had an entirely different meaning. It simply meant that the poor men here are the squatters, those engaged in sheep- and cattle-raising; not the settler, not the man who is in the large towns, the man who, in the interests of the colony, ought to be put on the land to lessen the number of the unemployed. I will now proceed to review the measure before us. Coming to the first part of it, I scarcely think the Minister of Lands—and I give him every credit for wishing to do his duty—I scarcely think that the honourable gentleman knows exactly the full effect of the Bill that is before us. I feel inclined to think that if he were aware of its effect he would not ask the House to proceed further with it. The 2nd section proposes an entire change in so far as the definition of land is concerned. I should like to ask the Minister of Lands whether he can find out any law relating to land in New Zealand where any land is designated "ordinary land." There is no interpretation in the Bill before us of what is meant by ordinary land. I find in the most vital part of the Bill that first-class land is to be £1 per acre. Then we come to second-class land: this is an alteration put there designedly, so as to be concurrent with the rest of the Bill. It is here provided that the whole power shall be vested in the Minister of Lands for the time being. He is to say what is ordinary and what is first-class land, and is to fix the value, and to say that so long as the minimum price of land is not less than appears in the Appendices this land may be sold at that price. Have honourable members turned over the Appendices to the Land Act? If they have, they will find that, excepting first-class land, the Government wish to take the power to themselves to sell the land at 5s. per acre.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON.—No. Show the Appendices.

Mr. SEDDON.—Auckland is classified as first, second, and third, at 15s., 10s., and 5s. respectively; Hawke's Bay, first, second, and third, at £1, 15s., and 5s.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON.—The honourable member stated just now that second-class in the Appendices was 5s. an acre. I presume he meant third-class land.

Mr. SEDDON.—The honourable member misunderstood me, or I did not put it to the House clearly. I said the Government were taking the power to sell land under this Bill at 5s. an acre, and I say so still. We have Nelson land from 10s. to £2 an acre. In Marlborough the classification is rural and pastoral, rural land not less than £1, and pastoral not less than 10s. I wish to draw attention to what I believe is a cardinal point of the Bill: under the existing law no land can be sold in Canterbury at less than £2 an acre; and yet, in the face of that, the Government wish to take the power to sell the land of Canterbury at 5s. an acre.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON.—Where?

Mr. SEDDON.—Why, under the powers contemplated to be given to the Governor—and which means the Minister for Lands for the time being—under the Bill. Clause 3 clearly repeals the Appendices applicable to Canterbury under the Land Act of 1885, or otherwise no land could be sold at less than £2 per acre. In the repeals mentioned by section 29 of this Bill the following words will be found:—

"All enactments, words, phrases, and references throughout the said Act and the Appendices thereto which shall be inapplicable in the construction of or inconsistent with the context of the said Act as amended by this Act, or which have been rendered nugatory by this Act."

Again, the latter part of section 2 of this Bill is as follows:—

"The Governor may, in such notification, assign a price to each section within a block, and he may, subject to a new notification being given, and to the provisions of this Act, raise or reduce such price. He may also, where the land within a block is declared open at the same price per acre, by a subsequent notification or notifications, raise or reduce such price."

Mr. FISHER.—The honourable gentleman said that the Government proposed to sell land in Canterbury at 5s. an acre: will he point that out?

Mr. SEDDON.—I shall do my best to do so; but, like all other things, it takes time.

Mr. HISLOP.—Imagination.

Mr. SEDDON.—It does not require imagination or to have much of a legal training to point out clearly what is covered by sections 2, 3, 28, and 29 of the Bill. Clause 8 says,—

"The notification mentioned in section two shall fix the price at which, and the time when, the land mentioned therein shall be open for selection, but such price shall not be less than twenty shillings per acre for ordinary land, or ten shillings per acre for second-class land, except in the case of lands within land districts, where the same may, by virtue of the said Act or its Appendices, be sold at a less price; in which case the minimum price may be less than the foregoing prices, but shall not be less than the minimum price at which the same may be sold in terms of the said Act or Appendices."

What do they propose to do by this? To repeal a certain portion of the Appendices by this Bill, which is so nicely and quietly wrapped up that honourable members are not to see or know it. I say, by the power of classification, by the power they take of fixing the price, they are reducing the price of land in Canterbury—it may be to 5s. an acre.—(No.)

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON.—The honourable gentleman is completely misreading the Bill. He either has not read the Bill, or has not paid attention to what has been said.

Mr. SEDDON.—The Minister of Lands may say what he likes, but there can be no other interpretation of this Bill. Now, I say you cannot buy an acre in Canterbury under £2 as the Appendices stand now. And does the Minister mean to say that he does not take power to sell that land—ordinary land, or, if the proper interpretation were given to it, first-class land—at £1? and, as to the second-class land, does he not take power to sell it at 10s.? I say he does definitely take power to bring down the price of land in Canterbury from £2 to 10s., and it may be still, if it is not so positively said, brought down to 5s. an acre, and perhaps before the Bill passes it may be amended so that land can be sold at 2s. 6d. an acre. I would like to know, is it wise to take a power to do that under present circumstances? Is it fair to those who for years in Canterbury have had to pay £2 an acre? That would bring down the price of third-class land at one swoop to 10s. I say, I am positive honourable members do not understand thoroughly what is contemplated by this measure, or it would not have gone so far as it has gone without having more discussion upon it. Westland land, I may say in passing, you cannot purchase under £1 an acre. That is the lowest amount that the lands of the Crown can be sold for in that provincial district.

Mr. HISLOP.—You cannot purchase them at all.

Mr. SEDDON.—Is this a time for scoffing? The honourable member knows full well why no land has been purchased there since 1884; he knows that it is owing to the East and West Coast Railway Act having been passed that settlement has been prevented there during these years. There have been applications for a large amount of land at £1 per acre. It is unfair, very unfair, to those who are deferred-payment settlers, and have paid £1 10s. per acre, with 10s. more put upon them. I say it is unfair to them for the Minister of Lands to bring down the value of this land to 10s. by the Bill now before the House. The Otago lands are classified as rural and suburban. The price is fixed at £1 for rural land. And what is the acreage that has been sold during the last few years to the deferred-payment settlers in Otago? Is there any provision in this Bill to say that the State now finds that we have charged those settlers more than the land was worth? Or is the State prepared to say that, because it requires cash, we must sacrifice the rest of the land, to the injury of the deferred-payment settlers, and even of those who have bought for cash? for we cannot give a refund or revalue of the land purchased from us or give the advantage of the reduction. Place

the colony on the same footing as any commercial firm that was to carry on business under such circumstances as these, the result would be disaster; and I predict it means disaster to New Zealand if what is provided in this Bill as regards classification and sale of the land is carried. My honourable friend from Southland, the member for Hokonui, may feel a little uneasy. Where agricultural land was sold at £2 and pastoral land at £1, he will consider it a boon to get the price reduced, and, with a view to getting a reduction on the upset price of the agricultural land, we find him very anxious to assist the Minister of Lands, who also hails from that particular district; and no doubt, under these circumstances, a reduction might, in his opinion, be necessary; but, admitting that perhaps the minimum amount of £2 has been too much in Southland, it is not right it should be reduced to 10s. per acre. What injury is there not to be done in Southland! What would be the position of those unfortunate persons who have not paid for the land which they bought for £2 an acre, paying interest on the capitalised amount, when we suddenly give powers to the Government to bring down that price to 10s., whilst charging those people £2 10s. an acre? To my mind, such a change as that must, if made, in the long-run prove detrimental to every man who owns an acre of land in New Zealand. There is no definition of what is meant by the term "ordinary land;" but in the 9th clause "second-class land" is defined. But before coming to that I will refer to section 7. I have always held that the system of auction sales in the purchase of Crown lands has proved a curse wherever it has obtained; and it must always prove a curse. I am positive it has caused the ruin of scores of our best settlers, and that the system should not obtain at all. To go back to that system, after the trouble it has caused hitherto, would be a most retrograde step. Let us fix a fair price for a piece of land, and let the man who is fortunate enough to get it have every chance of being able to hold it profitably. We have plenty to supply all demands, and we should not seek to get from the buyers of our Crown land a price at which their holdings cannot possibly pay. It is better to let a little good fortune come to those who may get it than to have, as we have now in different parts of New Zealand, many poor settlers toiling and labouring away in their struggles to pay the price which they, in a moment of excitement in an auction-room, agreed to pay, and which the Government ought never to have received. But we go further than that, and say that the getting of unsurveyed lands shall be decided by priority of application. What does that mean? With that you provide for private survey under section 17, as follows:—

"The Commissioner, on the estimated cost of the survey being deposited with him, may allow any applicant for the purchase of unsurveyed land to have such land surveyed at his own expense by a surveyor employed by the Surveyor-General in that behalf, and an allowance in the amount of purchase-money for the same shall be made to the purchaser for the cost of the survey at any rate, not exceeding the ordinary rate for the survey of rural lands, which may be prescribed by the Survey Regulations for the time being in force. Should the land be reserved or withdrawn from sale, the applicant shall be paid the cost of the survey at the aforesaid rate; but, should the applicant in any case refuse or delay to complete the purchase of the land after survey, if open for sale, he shall forfeit the cost of such survey."

There is a great power given under this, and there is great force in the argument of the honourable member for Christchurch North on this point. A man will "spot" a piece of land with a water-frontage, or with a good road-frontage, and will carefully watch it, knowing that the effect of his getting it must be to lock up a large area around it. He applies for this as unsurveyed land, and gives a description of it, engages a private surveyor, gets his survey made, and to all intents and purposes he has a pre-emptive-right to that piece of land. I object altogether to this system of deciding and allotting land by priority of application in the case of unsurveyed lands. The same rule should apply as with surveyed lands: there should be no distinction. To my mind that is one of the most dangerous provisions of the Bill. Section 7 reads as follows:—

"All applications for sections of surveyed land shall be deemed to be simultaneous if made on the same day, but priority of applications on the same day for unsurveyed land shall determine the right thereto."

Therefore, if two parties apply, even on the same day, for the same piece of unsurveyed land, the one who applies a minute before the other has a pre-emptive right to it. I cannot see why there should be this distinction, and I oppose it altogether. Section 8 reads,—

"All rural lands which at any time heretofore have been proclaimed, or which may hereafter be proclaimed, open for selection on deferred payments or on perpetual lease shall be open either for purchase for cash, subject as in this Act mentioned, or for selection on deferred payments or perpetual lease, at the option of the applicant. The cash price per acre to be paid for any such land shall be estimated from the price at which the same shall have been open for selection according to the respective equivalents mentioned in the said Act."

The meaning of this clause is this: Under our present and past land-laws there have been, in the different land-districts, areas of land surveyed and reserved, to be taken up only on deferred payment or perpetual lease. If it is necessary, in the interest of the colony, that a certain portion of this land should be sold now for cash, there should be a proviso limiting the extent of the land so reserved which can be sold for cash; otherwise the whole of the land which has been reserved for settlers on deferred payment or perpetual lease will be sold for cash, to the detriment of the poor people of the colony who may wish to take up land, because there will then be no land for them on the terms on which alone they could take it. Land which has been reserved for poor settlers, who could not pay cash down, will be sold for cash to others at 10s. an acre, and those who would have made good and valuable settlers by being able to take up land either on deferred payment or on perpetual lease will be quite shut out. Land that has been kept back to be sold in Otago at £1 an acre, and in Southland and Canterbury at £2 an acre, is now, without giving an opportunity to those who would take it up on deferred payment or perpetual lease at the reduced rates, to be all thrown into the market; all will be thrown into the pool and sold for 10s. an acre. Again, look at section 14, subsection (2). The poor deferred-payment settler is to pay 25 per cent. in addition to the price brought at auction; his poverty is to be taxed 25 per cent. I do not think the Minister could possibly have seen the full effect of this Bill, or he would not wish it to be passed, to perpetrate such a wrong as it undoubtedly must do. Section 9 is on a par with the rest of the Bill in giving extraordinary powers, which, though nominally given to the Governor, are really given to the Ministry of the day, who, on the certificate of the Surveyor-General, can say which lands are to be second-class, and which cannot be worked in small holdings. We find in the definitions that a small holding of second-class land is 2,000 acres, and a small holding of first-class land 640 acres. Those who drafted this Bill must have very large ideas of landownership, when they talk about a mile square of country of first-class land being a small holding, and 2,000 acres of second-class land being a small holding. I admit that there are two or three clauses in the Bill which are an improvement on the existing law: clauses 15 and 16, for instance, I think are improvements. There is the right given to deferred-payment holders to get relief, and there is also what I have always contended for—that those who took up land on deferred payment or perpetual lease in mining districts should be treated in the same way as others holding under the same systems in non-mining districts. There is an alteration made as to the application of the proceeds of the sale of the land, which is a departure from what the Legislature has authorised up to the present time. Power is given to take a portion of the proceeds of the sale of land for bringing in water-races for irrigation purposes. Where they have tried these schemes hitherto the people have rated themselves to provide the money for the construction of these works, but now the Government propose, by this measure, to set aside the law existing at the present time, and introduce a literal power to apply a portion of the proceeds of land-sales for the purpose of bringing in water-races. I say at once that they should tell me—they should inform the House—who has been the moving spirit in wishing to get this Bill introduced into the House. Sir, section 21 of the Bill further proves why and wherefore this Bill has been introduced. I remember full well when the honourable member for Egmont, who was a member of the then Whitaker Government, with Mr. Rolleston as Minister of Lands, considered that 5,000 acres was sufficient for a small run. It took a whole night to discuss that question, and, by a large majority, the House decided that 5,000 acres was a sufficiently large area; and yet here we have that area increased to four times that amount—it is made 20,000 acres instead of 5,000. To a certain extent I must leave this question to those representing districts where the experiment of 5,000 acres has been tried; but when the system was introduced it was done with the view of assisting those who may have a small freehold, and who wished to have a small area of land as a run, and I believe that instructions were given to so subdivide the land for pastoral purposes as to carry out that object. Now we are coming back again to what we fought against in this House for so long—undue monopoly. I am afraid that the House does not fully realise the importance of this matter—does not see the effect this Bill will have on the colony if it is passed in its present shape. I am sure that the people of Canterbury and Otago do not know the effect of passing this measure, which provides, among other things, for the repeal of the proviso to section 237 of the Act of 1885, and takes out of the hands of the School Commissioners and Education Boards all power of determining how the lands vested in them shall be dealt with. The proviso to section 237 of "The Land Act, 1885," enacts as follows:—

"Provided always that no such Proclamation shall have any effect unless it be issued at the request or upon the recommendation of the body or person in whom such reserves are vested, or who have the administration of the revenue arising therefrom."

Here is an ingenious and covert repeal by section 29 of this Bill, of which, I am convinced, the people in the districts are not aware.

Mr. MARCHANT.—The Minister explained that.

Mr. SEDDON.—The Minister may have explained it, but it is very objectionable in the way it is done—objectionable and pernicious. In section 29 we have a list of the clauses repealed, and then we have it stated in another clause that, notwithstanding that there has been no repeal, where the language of the two Acts is inconsistent the last Act shall rule. This is an objectionable form of legislation, which is bound to bring about litigation and confusion. It would have been far better if the Minister had altogether repealed the previous Act, and had come down with this measure in a form in which it would have been thoroughly understood by the House. It is my intention to move an amendment even if I have to go into the lobby alone. The House will meet early next year, and the country should be made aware of the radical change that is proposed to be made. The question was never considered at the hustings, and we have no right, in this way, to change the whole land-system of the colony—to reduce the price of land without putting it before the people, so that those who represent them may have an opportunity of knowing their views on the subject. The question was not before the electors at the last election. In fact, the Government have denied officially that there was any intention to reduce the price of land.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON.—No.

Mr. SEDDON.—When it was said that the Government were going to help the revenue by sacrificing the land it was officially denied by the Government.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON.—Hear, hear.

Mr. SEDDON.—Does not this Bill sacrifice the land for the sake of revenue? No one who reads the Bill carefully can come to any other conclusion. I went into the Bill predisposed in favour of it, and of the honourable gentleman who has taken the trouble to bring it down; but I found that by passing it we should be doing an injustice to the people of New Zealand, and I can only do my duty by moving, That the Bill be read a second time this day six months. I take the responsibility of moving that to put my view before the electors. The late Minister of Lands, who takes a great interest in this matter, is, unfortunately, away, owing to circumstances over which he has no control, and there are many honourable members who desire to speak and consider this subject.

Mr. TAYLOR.—I second the motion. I think it is my duty to protest against this Bill, and for this reason: that the Minister of Lands—I was not present when he commenced his speech this evening—but during the time I was in the House satisfied me, at any rate, that there was not the slightest necessity for this Bill except for the purpose of reducing the price of land, and the important principle laid down by the honourable member for Waimate. According to the Minister of Lands' own showing, the present law provides for the sale of land for cash quite as well as does the Bill proposed by himself. He said that the late Minister of Lands and the previous Minister of Lands both gave an undue preference to a special system. Why could not the honourable gentleman himself give a preference to the system of sales for cash? He could do that if he wished.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON.—No.

Mr. TAYLOR.—The object simply is to reduce the price of land; and I must say, seeing the large interest which the people of the colony have in the land, and seeing that the leases are falling due shortly, it strikes me that this is a move to enable those gentlemen who have leases of the land to become the absolute freeholders of it. I am sorry that the honourable member for Auckland Central is not in his place. I have listened to that honourable gentleman, and I consider him the ablest word-painter in this House, and, moreover, I believe with him that the interests of the people are being sacrificed in this direction. We have the great bulk of the people to consider in dealing with an important question of this kind, and I am not going to be a party to assist in passing it, for I look upon it as a first step in the direction of granting large monopolies of the only portion of the estate left to the people. A great deal has been said about perpetual leasing. How is it that it is carried on successfully in all the large cities of New Zealand? Take the City of Auckland, for instance. Large reserves were set apart there years ago by Sir George Grey for the very purpose of easing the rate-payers in the future. If the system works well there, why should it not be applied to the colony at large? None of these bodies have a right to sell their land: they lease them, and those who get hold of those lands lease them. Only the other day I saw an advertisement from an absentee at Home, a Captain Buckley I believe, asking for the lease of a piece of land in the centre of Christchurch for a number of years; and, if that principle is open to private individuals, why not apply it to the bulk of us? The honourable member for Gladstone tells me he is not in favour of large monopolists, and I give him credit for that. I take it he holds those views because he is one of the Young New Zealand party, and I am glad they are setting their faces against these huge monopolists, because they are against the interests of the people. I shall say no more. I have entered my protest, and, I think, on solid grounds, and I am not going to be a party to sacrifice what the honourable member for Auckland Central would say is the birthright of the people of New Zealand.

Mr. GUINNESS moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. BLAKE.—I had not the slightest idea of speaking on this Bill to-night; but it seems to me very certain that, if I do not say the few words I have to say now, I shall lose my opportunity of getting a provision inserted in the Bill which I am quite certain is a great necessity. I do not see anything in the Bill to provide for the necessities of the working-man—who, I know well, requires some looking-after—in the shape of labour-settlements in the country. These settlements are very necessary all through the country districts, where the men can be employed by the farmers in various ways for some months of the year. These labour-settlements could easily be established by the Government throughout the country, and it would very much alter the Bill, in my opinion, if this were done. I have read through the Bill, and am very much pleased with some of it. I am pleased that the Minister of Lands wishes to induce people to come into the country to buy land. I hate the sight of a poor man, because I wish they were all rich. I think, however, it is unlikely the honourable gentleman will bring into this colony a class of men who will buy the class of land we have to sell, at any rate during the time the prices of produce are so low as they are at present. As I say, there is no provision made for the land to be leased in the manner which I should like to see. I am not very fond of the deferred-payment system; and I would much rather see added to the clause dealing with that subject words something like these: that leases be also offered of not less than 200 acres of the best land and 2,000 acres of the second-class land conjoined, at a rental of 5 per cent., based on the present proposed selling-price of £1 and 12s. 6d. per acre respectively; the leases to be not less than ten years or more than twenty-one years, with a right of purchase at any time during the lease. If not purchased by the occupier at the end of the term, 75 per cent. for useful improvements to be allowed by any tenant or purchaser overbidding for the second term; but, if the occupier gives it up or fails to pay rent, no valuation for improvements to be allowed. That would give a chance to the farmers' sons of the country to take up land by lease, instead of its being bought up by speculators. We have a large number of farmers' sons with a certain amount of capital, but not enough to buy the land and fence and stock it. If the Government would do this they would get interest on the land, and would get the money for it in the end. These people, if they could not get money enough in twenty-one years to buy it, would be sure of getting their improvements allowed for if the land were taken up by any one who would give any more money for it. In that case they would be paid for their improvements. There is no provision in this Bill to give facilities to the inhabitants of the colony to take up land instead of speculators taking it up and charging a bigger price or larger rent. One or the other is sure to happen. I have no wish whatever to find fault with the Bill. Other honourable gentlemen who are better able to judge of the legal portions of it than I am have looked through the Bill. But I do think a different system of Land Boards should be established. I think the members of this House should be members of the Land Boards—not the town members, but the members from the country. They travel free by the railways, so that their expenses would be very small; and if there was any patriotism in them they would do the work without any pay. I think if a man is popular enough to be elected a member of the House of Representatives he would be acceptable as a member of a Land Board. I have something which I very much wish should be inserted in this Bill, if I am not trespassing too much on the good-nature of the Minister of Lands. It is to make labour-settlements. These labour-settlements are required throughout the farming districts. I have often had nine or ten people living in tents upon a spare piece of land I have. They work for me or my neighbours probably for eight or nine months a year. They have nowhere to go during the other four months, except to the publichouse to spend their money. If they had only an acre to live and work on when they had no other work to do it would be a great thing for them. Hundreds of men would be glad to take up land upon this principle. I would suggest the following: That labour-settlements be established, in localities where employment may be obtained, at a cost of not more than £50; not more than five occupiers to be placed in one settlement; not less than 10 per cent. cash to be paid as first deposit; not less than 10 per cent. per annum to be paid in half-yearly instalments until the whole be paid; each settler to get from the Land Office a license to occupy, and at any time after 20 per cent. has been paid the owner to be allowed to sell by transferring his license to occupy at the Land Office at a cost of 5s.; no land to be found until three applicants have deposited 10 per cent. each. Anything in this shape would make these small labour-settlements about the country useful—say, five or seven miles apart; and the settlement might be established in districts where the men could obtain work for the greater part of the year. When they are not employed they get away all over the country, and it takes a great deal of trouble, when the owners of the stations or farms want the men, to get them together again. If they could settle in the manner I have suggested they would always be there, and they could fill up their spare time by working on their sections. If the Minister of Lands will look into this matter he will, I believe, see that it is necessary, and that if my suggestion is carried out it will do the country a great deal of good. I am sure if he were to ask the farmers in any portion of Canterbury, or any of the station-holders about the Hurunui, they would say that they would be very glad to have settlements like this upon their runs, because they are always in trouble when they want labour. The Government would be sure of their money, and the men would always look on their land as freehold; because, when once they had paid 20 per cent. of the price of their sections they could at once sell their sections, and put the proceeds in their pockets, and any improvements would be paid for by the purchaser. I hope the Minister of Lands will allow me to see him on this matter, with a view of allowing this provision to be inserted in the Bill. I think if I lost this chance of getting it before the House, with a view of getting it inserted this session, I should have no other opportunity. I do not wish to offer any factious opposition to the Bill. What I want to see is people settled on the land, and the class of people I want to see settled on the land are the sons of farmers in all parts of the country. I do not want to see people brought from other parts of the world to settle on the lands.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Why?

Mr. BLAKE.—Because it seems to be neither patriotic nor reasonable; it seems to be a way of getting revenue from the land just because we are a little poor. I know hundreds of young men who have from £300 to £500, and with this they could lease a section, and, if they did not buy it in twenty-one years, surely they could live on it and improve it, and it would be worth more to the Government at the end of that time. There can be no loss made, and I am sure they would be glad of any provision of the kind. I have lived in New Zealand for a long time, and I am speaking simply because I wish the thing to be done in the best way. If the Minister of Lands could meet the case by a better method than that I suggest I should not oppose it. I come from a farming district, and look at these matters more particularly than honourable members coming from other parts. We want the land settled, because the unemployed drain away into the towns, and we want to get them in the busy times, but they are all over the country, and it is difficult to find them, whereas if they lived at a place where they could get work they would have lots to live on, and could improve their place when times were dull. We are always hoping that the times will be better, and that the Government will do the best it can to help us in these bad times with our lands—not to take them away from us just because times are so bad, but to give us a chance to lease them and eventually to buy them. I do not believe in special settlements and that sort of thing, and I am not asking for it. If my scheme were adopted the cry of the unemployed would decrease. Not that the men I have referred to specially constitute the ranks of the unemployed. The men who work the hardest "spree" the hardest, and they drift into the towns when they have nothing to do, where they are idle. I hope the House will adopt this scheme, because then we should perhaps once more be able to say,—

Good luck to the flocks and the fleeces,
Good luck to the growers of corn,
With a blessing of plenty and peace.

And I do hope the Minister of Lands will assist us in the way he ought to do. I should be glad to give him my suggestions, but I suppose he knows more about it than I do. I will leave the matter in the hands of the Minister, and will see him in the morning, with a view of introducing a clause to effect this scheme. The rest of the Bill I leave to the lawyers to deal with.

Dr. FITCHETT.—I intend to support the second reading of this Bill, but wish expressly to reserve to myself the right to discuss the principles of the measure at a later stage. The Premier has said that in supporting the second reading we do not necessarily affirm the principles. I accept that assurance. As to the Bill itself, I see no one leading principle in it. There are many conflicting principles; but I admit the right of the Government to press the Bill forward a stage, and therefore I shall support the second reading. But there are many things in it to which I take exception, and, without attempting to discuss it exhaustively, I will briefly indicate one or two. I think a great deal of harm will be done by selling these lands by auction. This opens the door to very great evils—evils from which we have suffered in the past. Again, there is danger of dummyism, of gridironing, and of picking the eyes out of the country. A man can take up 640 acres of one class of land and 2,000 of another; but the section does not say that it is to be taken in whole blocks, and it seems to me to be competent for any man to so split up his 640 acres or his 2,000 acres as to pick out the eyes of the district. Again, I must object emphatically to the ingenious method by which the Bill takes from all trust bodies in the colony the power to deal with their reserves. A measure to effect a similar object was introduced some time ago, and was then defeated; and I shall strenuously oppose any attempt on the part of the Government to interfere with the right of all bodies, whether educational or otherwise, to deal as they think fit with their reserves. This Bill effects that end by simply repealing the clauses in the Land Act which require the consent and request of the trust bodies before the Crown can sell the reserves. In regard to the proposed abolition of Land Boards, these may be expensive, but to abolish them on this account is like cutting off a limb because it aches. If you consider the large tracts of land they have to deal with in Otago and Southland, it would be impossible to do the work properly from Wellington; and I protest against economy being made a pretext for centralism. At present a person interested can attend the Board meetings and hear all the pros and cons., and the decision of the Board. An enormous evil would follow the abolition of these Boards; therefore I hope the Government will consider the necessity of retaining them, even if, in doing so, they increase the expense of the country.

Mr. MOSS.—The honourable member who has last spoken tells us that he cannot see any principle in the Bill.

Dr. FITCHETT.—I see many principles in it; but I said I could not see any leading principle in it.

Mr. MOSS.—Had the honourable member heard the speech of the honourable member for Kumara I do not think he could have said there was no leading principle in the Bill. We felt so much confidence in the honourable gentleman who has charge of this Bill that we were inclined to be exceedingly careless. It was stated, in the blandest manner, that the Bill simply opened up the country to settlers of all kinds. Now, confiding in that statement, very many of us did not look into the Bill as we should have done. Besides, there is another reason. We have had for over three years on those benches a Government which, whatever its other faults, had strong sympathies with the people of the colony; and we know they were a Government incapable of playing the Land Act into the hands of any particular section or class of the community. Therefore we had got into a habit—rather a careless one—in dealing with their Land Bills which I think we shall throw off after this experience. Sir, it is said we should pass the second reading of this Bill as a matter of form, without any debate at all. It is quite true that when the Bill comes from the Waste Lands Committee it will be competent to discuss the Bill; but we shall have affirmed the principle of the Bill if we agree to the second reading now, and unquestionably the principle of this Bill is to sell the land regardless of bond fide and productive settlement, and to put the money into the Treasury. The honourable gentleman in charge of the Bill may deny—and so may the Minister of Education, who is the only member of the Government at present in the House—that that is the principle; but it runs throughout the Bill, and it is an entirely new principle in our legislation. In proof of my assertion I will quote the Minister of Education, who said, “We are reproached because we are endeavouring to administer the lands of the colony in such a way as that they will not entail a loss.” That is the principle of the Bill. We have been told that the Government have no time to consider other important measures, but they must get through the session to deal with retrenchment. Then, why do they want to force this Bill through the House in this way? We have done our duty as members in protesting against what we consider an ill-advised attempt to force a great measure through the House. A radical change is proposed in the principle of our land-administration. Settlement is to be discarded altogether, to fill the Treasury. There is no doubt that that is the guiding principle of the Bill. It means retrogression in our land-legislation, and I strongly object to such proposals. Whilst there is power given to sell land at low figures, there is no power to reduce the price to special settlers, and no inducements are held out to village settlers. I am quite sure of this: that one of the most beneficent schemes of land-administration has been the village settlements, and that the village settlements established in Auckland have been an unmixed good. No doubt there will be occasional failures in this; but I would bear my testimony in the most emphatic manner to what I believe to have been one of the most beneficent and successful attempts to relieve the distress that was then prevailing, and to give homes to those who otherwise could not hope for them. The speech of the honourable member for Kumara is the clearest exposition of the Bill, and it stirred up several honourable members, myself amongst them, to the character of the Bill. And now, without giving honourable members the opportunity of considering that speech, the Government are pursuing their old high-handed tactics, against which I have heard the Colonial Secretary himself most loudly complain in former times. I am satisfied that we have done our duty in expressing reprobation in the strongest possible terms of the conduct of the Government in this matter. After having declared that the sole purpose of the session was retrenchment, and refusing recognition of other measures urgently demanded by the country, they bring down a Bill which is an entire reversal of the existing and of the past policy of our land-legislation, and which, Sir, in its effects, must be serious and far-reaching. This Bill, if it be passed to-night, and pass through the House ultimately in its present form, will, I firmly believe, be a curse to those who come after us for many generations, and whose interest in the land we are thus asked to forestall and dissipate.

Mr. KELLY.—It appears to me that the honourable gentleman who has just sat down has not carefully studied the Bill that is before the House. I have studied the Bill carefully, and I find that the deferred-payment system and the perpetual-lease system, which he has alluded to, are not interfered with. The honourable gentleman has said that he has made a protest against an ill-advised attempt to push this measure through the House. In my opinion there has been no attempt to push the measure through the House. I understand that the Bill has to go to the Waste Lands Committee; and in all probability it will come back from that Committee in a different form from what it is now in. I have some amendments myself which I wish to have put into this Bill when in Committee, and I have no doubt that other honourable members will attempt to get their amendments in the Bill when it is before the Waste Lands Committee; so that it may come back to the House in a very different form. The honourable member for Kumara says that he objects to the price of land being reduced. He said that the upset price of land in Canterbury was £2 an acre, and that now it was to be reduced to £1. I object to the price of land being raised. In the district that I represent the upset price of land is 15s. for first-class, 10s. for second-class, and 5s. for third-class. Now, it appears, according to this Bill, that the price of land is going to be raised to £1 per acre for first-class land. As far as I know, the first-class land of my district has been sold long ago, or given back to Natives. There is very little first-class land remaining in the district, and round about where I live there is not even second-class land. I have been to the Minister of Lands myself, since I came to Wellington, to induce him, if I possibly could, to reduce the price of land; and now the honourable member for Kumara complains that the price of land ought to be more than £1 per acre—that that is too low altogether. The honourable member for Christchurch North said that land was put up some ten years ago in Canterbury for £2 an acre. Now, Sir, that land, if it was any good at the time, would have been taken up at £2 an acre, because land all over the colony, I must say—at all events, in the North Island—is not worth half what it was ten years ago. Cultivated farms are selling at half the price they were selling at ten years ago. But I think the Government are right in reducing the upset price all over the colony, and in their wishes to encourage settlement in every possible way. I say that a landed estate is not a proper estate for the colony to hold. The Government have a right to dispose of the land as they wish. It appears that we have twenty million acres of Crown land at present. Now, considering the depressed state of the colony, I think the whole of this land should be disposed of, to reduce the debt of the country. Supposing fourteen million acres of land are sold at 10s. an acre, we get from that £7,000,000. Then we have six million acres of bush-land, which I heard one honourable member say was valued at £4 an acre. If we value it at £2 an acre, that would give us twelve millions more, and this would reduce the debt of the country very considerably. I am not going to occupy the time of the House at any great length now, as I shall have another opportunity of speaking on this question; but it is my intention to support the Government as far as I possibly can in these liberal measures: and I contend that this is a liberal measure, notwithstanding what has been said to the contrary.

Mr. WARD.—This is a most important Bill, and before the question is put I desire to make a remark or two upon it, and I trust honourable members will not think I am trespassing too much on their good-nature in doing so at this late hour. There are many clauses in the Bill with which I cordially agree, and I think it is a step in the right direction to reduce the price of land as indicated in this Bill. I also believe in the principle of allowing persons to take up land either for cash, or on deferred payment, or on the perpetual-lease principle, for I think every possible facility should be afforded to induce people to take up land. I advocated that the three methods provided in this measure should be the law of the country, when contesting my election: and I am consequently the more gratified to find them in the Bill. But I do not like the idea—which is too vaguely particularised—about the selection of 640 acres or 2,000 acres in various districts. I am of opinion that the acreage, in both instances, is too great, and there will be much room for abuses to be practised as they now stand in the Bill, and I hope they will both be reduced. It appears to me that when this Bill goes before the Waste Lands Committee or a Committee of the House the possibility of dummyism will have to be very carefully guarded against. I am anxious to bring under the notice of the Minister of Lands this: In South Invercargill there are a number of deferred-payment sections. I think a proviso ought to be passed to enable that borough to take advantage of the deferred-payment thirds, similar to that provided for special and village settlements. Possibly the Minister of Lands will see his way to make some provision of that kind, and I shall be very glad indeed if he does so.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON.—There is a statutory provision in this Bill to deal with these exceptional cases, and also with the peculiar case of the Invercargill Road District.

Mr. WARD.—I am under the impression that such is not the case, but I shall be glad to learn that I am mistaken. The Borough of South Invercargill has laboured under an injustice in this matter for some years; and I think the Minister will find I am correct that, while the Bill provides retrospectively for the payment of deferred-payment thirds to village and special settlements, in the case of South Invercargill it does not do so. I believe it is the only borough in the colony that has a large number of deferred-payment sections in it, and I press its claims for fair and equitable treatment. I am opposed to the abolition of the Land Boards. They should be continued without payment to members. I am not going to trespass on the time of the House any longer. I do think that, now we are having a very liberal land measure placed before the country, it would be a good thing if the auction system were abolished, and the ballot system introduced in its stead. So far as Southland is concerned, from what has occurred in the past I believe that, if the ballot system is introduced, it will be hailed with very great satisfaction.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE.—I purpose supporting the second reading of the Bill. I take exception, however, to some of its provisions. I take exception to clause 8, which provides that all the land at present set aside under deferred payment and perpetual-leasing must be sold for cash. I also take exception to clause 10. I think 640 acres of first-class land is too much to sell to any one individual. I think also that 2,000 acres of other land is too large a block, and opens the door to improper practices. I think that clause 14, which permits of competition by auction, is a pernicious provision, because it leads to fictitious prices being given for land: farmers, as we have seen in the past, bid a higher price than the land is worth. Then, clause 17, dealing with the system of surveying land, provides that all surveyors surveying land must be persons in the employ of the Surveyor-General. This would be a great hardship on people in my district, because it often happens that the nearest survey party are nearly a hundred miles away, and it would be very inconvenient if they had to be brought the whole of that distance to survey lands; and small selections cost more for surveying than the upset price of the land. I think any duly-authorized surveyor ought to have the privilege of being selected by the selector to survey his land.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON.—This clause is specially drafted to allow the Surveyor-General to employ all qualified surveyors in this capacity.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE.—Yes; but the Bill distinctly states "in the employ of the Surveyor-General," and private surveyors cannot be said to be in the employment of the Surveyor-General, and may be overworked. I think, if every authorised surveyor had a right to survey the line when he was asked to do so by the selector, the work could be done at a very much lower rate by surveyors resident in the district than if surveyors in the employ of the Surveyor-General had to come long distances to do it. I disagree with clause 22, which permits of small grazing-runs being increased from five thousand acres to twenty thousand acres. With these exceptions, I purpose supporting the second reading of the Bill, and trust that it will be modified in Committee in the directions I have already indicated.

"UNEMPLOYED."

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI asked the Hon. the Attorney-General, if it is true that the Government intend to provide work for the unemployed at the Public Domain, Auckland, such work to consist of forming and constructing carriage-drives, &c.; and, if so, will the Government extend the same benefits to the unemployed in other towns and municipalities in the southern parts of the colony? He had been induced to put this question on the Order Paper in consequence of an article which appeared in three Wellington papers on Saturday last to this effect:—

"UNEMPLOYED IN AUCKLAND. — By telegraph: Press Association. — Auckland, 25th November.—A telegram has been received by Mr. Phillips, Town Clerk, from Mr. Goldie, M.H.R., requesting that arrangements may be made without delay for work for the unemployed for this city, as the Government had promised to find work. The Minister for Public Works had suggested that work should be taken up in the Domain, and it is proposed to let contracts for making three carriage-drives to be formed through the Domain."

It appeared to him that there were other places in the colony which had to contribute towards the unemployed—smaller places and places which were heavily taxed at the present time. If any assistance was to be given towards work for the unemployed it should be given in the smaller places as well as in the larger towns.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER said the Government had not authorised any expenditure as indicated in the question, nor did they intend to do anything of the kind. What there was in the newspapers he did not know. He had not seen the telegram which had been read, but he hoped his honourable friend would not place confidence in everything that he saw in newspapers. With regard to the second part of the question, he was informed that sums of money had been spent in some of the southern provinces in work of the character described in the telegram. In what places that money had been spent he was not aware; but, if his honourable friend wished to know, and would move for the information, he (Sir F. Whitaker) would get it.

TENANTS' RELIEF.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE.—Sir, I have been induced to table this motion in consequence of conversations that I had with Sir George Grey in reference to two Bills he had introduced into the other branch of the Legislature. Those two Bills may have come under the notice of honourable members: they are the Fair Rent Bill and the Freehold Tenure Acquisition Bill. The Bills passed their second reading, and were down for committal; but, owing to arrangements which had been arrived at with reference to private business in the other branch of the Legislature, he saw there was little chance of these Bills being taken up in the course of the present session. Therefore he spoke to me and asked me to take up the Bills in this branch of the Legislature, being of opinion that, if they passed through the Council, steps necessary to insure their coming into operation would be taken in the House of Representatives. I looked through those Bills, and I must say, on the whole, I agreed with the principles of the measures, and thought they were calculated to effect a very considerable public benefit in the present state of matters. But I saw, likewise, that the machinery provided was not such as was likely to work satisfactorily; and I felt that, at this very advanced period of the session, it was little likely that I should be able to pass through this Council a satisfactory measure—at any rate, in time for its being passed by the other branch of the Legislature. But, Sir, in course of conversation with Sir George Grey and with other honourable members my attention was struck, to a greater degree than had been the case before, with the necessity for some immediate action being taken in this direction. There are, as honourable members are aware, many hundreds—I do not know whether I can go so far as to say thousands—of persons who have taken land under various tenures from the Government—in some cases as perpetual leases, in other cases on deferred payment; and there are other persons who have taken land, upon terms which now prove very onerous, from public bodies. These tenants find, in the altered circumstances of the colony, that it is utterly impossible for them to pay their rents. They must obtain relief, or they must pass through the Insolvency Court, and, in all probability, be forced to leave the colony. As regards private landlords, they can deal with these cases. No man, although he might be a hard man, would refuse to grant a concession to a tenant if he saw that his refusal would necessitate his tenant abandoning the property and going elsewhere, leaving the property unoccupied upon the landlord's hands. But the Crown is not in that position, nor are the various public bodies in that position; and the consequence is that these tenants are hanging on now not knowing what may become of them in a short time, and feeling that, in the present circumstances of the colony, it is impossible for them to carry on their engagements. I am told that already several persons have been forced through the Insolvency Court in consequence of the inability of public bodies to reduce their rents. The public bodies are quite willing to reduce the rents, but they have not the power to do so. As regards the Crown tenants, it is equally clear that the Government has not the power. These tenants are scattered about in all parts of the colony, from Hokianga in the North to the Bluff in the South, and dealing with their cases would necessitate a great deal of time and trouble, and some considerable amount of expense. I am glad to find that the attention of the Government has been directed to this subject: indeed, there was an allusion to it in the Governor's Speech, where, honourable members will remember, it was stated that a measure would be introduced to grant relief to certain small settlers who were suffering from the nature of their tenure. In the Land Bill that is before the other branch of the Legislature

there is some provision to meet the future necessities of certain portions of the Crown tenants, more especially the deferred-payment settlers and the perpetual lessees; but no provision is made to meet the necessities of those persons who stand in so much need of some immediate relief. I do not know what may be the intentions of the Government in reference to this matter; I believe, however, they intend bringing forward some measure of relief during the present session; but I feel that it would not only be strengthening Sir George Grey's hands, but would strengthen the hands of the Government, if this House passed a resolution to the effect that it was a matter of essential importance that during the present session a measure of relief, such as is indicated in this resolution, were passed. I well know that the Government cannot always give effect to their intentions. They may have the best intentions in the world, but may feel that, under the circumstances, it is not in their power to carry those intentions into execution. There are always cases where the Government purpose passing measures through Parliament, and are really and sincerely desirous of passing those measures; but in the hurry of the last moment, with the view of closing the session within a certain time, they are obliged to drop them altogether, or to unduly prolong the session. At the present time there is talk of proroguing Parliament about the 17th of next month, and if honourable members are to get to their homes by Christmas it is undoubtedly essential that Parliament should be prorogued at that time; but the mass of business to be done between this and that time is so enormous as to present little hope that the whole of that legislation which it is desirable should be passed will be given effect to. I very much fear that many measures may be dropped at the last moment. We know that under the pressure of the last few days of the session Governments do things in the way of sacrificing measures which at other times they would themselves deem not possible. The object of this resolution is to strengthen as far as possible the hands of the Government, and induce them to bring forward this session—short as the days are which remain of it—a measure of relief to these settlers. I am far from being of opinion that any satisfactory measure can be introduced at this very late period of the session. If it can be, I shall be delighted; but, if it cannot be, I would suggest the introduction of a measure giving the public bodies and the Government the power of granting immediate relief of a temporary character to the persons to whom I have referred. I think they might give relief for the present time, waiting the passage of a more complete measure next session, which I hope will not be very remote. It is, I am satisfied, a measure of the utmost importance; it is a measure that is looked forward to by large numbers of persons who are suffering from the depressed state of the markets and the altered circumstances of the colony; and, unless some measure of relief be granted to them, I believe numbers will cast away all hope of relief, and the consequence to the colony may be very serious. I beg leave to move the motion standing in my name.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That, in the opinion of this Council, it is a matter of the most urgent public importance that a Bill should be passed during the present session to grant to Crown tenants and the tenants of public bodies that relief which is necessitated by the change in the circumstances of the colony."—(Hon. Mr. Waterhouse.)

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—The Government are aware of the importance of giving the relief which is sought by this resolution to be given to the tenants of the Crown under certain circumstances, and also of giving power to the local bodies who have lessees to give them the necessary relief. We consider that the best course to take for this session will be to give to the local bodies concerned power to deal with their tenants in the same manner as any landlord would be able to deal with his tenants, subject only—to avoid the possibility of any objectionable course being taken—subject only to the approval of the Minister, who, I imagine, would be the Minister of Lands. That Bill is in the course of preparation, and the Government will do their best to pass it this session. As regards the Crown tenants, there is a distinction. The Government might take power, certainly, if the Legislature thought fit to grant it, to make similar arrangements with regard to deferred-payment, perpetual-lease, and other tenants; but, on the whole, it appears desirable that no final course should be taken this session without the fullest consideration, and an attempt to place arrangements upon the best basis. We think, therefore, that the best course to take with regard to that class of tenants is to pass a Bill suspending eviction and recovery of rent in these cases until next session, when Parliament will be invited to deal with the whole of that subject in what may appear to Parliament to be the best manner. My honourable friend Mr. Waterhouse has made reference to two Bills. The name of one of them I did not catch. With the provisions of the Fair Rent Bill I am generally familiar.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE.—The other is the Freehold Tenure Acquisition Bill.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—That Bill might not perhaps give much relief as regards arrears of rent and liability to eviction; and we think the best course, considering the limited time at our disposal, is to propose to Parliament the measures I have spoken of.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN.—I would suggest to the honourable gentleman that the course which he proposes to take in regard to Crown tenants might also be adopted in regard to tenants of local bodies, because, as it seems to me, if he takes the course he proposes, of allowing them to do precisely as a private individual would do with regard to reducing rents, difficulties would arise, and the Minister of Lands will find himself in a very difficult position when he has to decide whether any particular locality shall make these reductions or not. It seems to me the Government cannot possibly have before them a sufficient amount of information to enable them to propound a thoroughly satisfactory measure this session; and therefore it would be better merely to delay eviction of tenants in all cases, till the whole matter could be thoroughly considered in some future session. A very large question is involved, and there does seem to me some indication of the colony taking a step somewhat in the direction of Mr. Gladstone's Irish legislation, which has proved so disastrous. Anything like tampering with rents, it appears to me, would be exceedingly mischievous, and certainly ought not to be entered upon without the fullest consideration.

OAMARU HARBOUR BOARD LOAN BILL.

The Hon. Mr. HOLMES said a storm of extraordinary violence swept over the East Coast some months ago, and injured the breakwater at Oamaru very considerably. The shipping, however, suffered nothing, because, although injury was done to a certain portion of the breakwater, the shipping was quite secure at the wharf. After this occurrence, the Harbour Board thought it desirable to obtain advice as to the best means of having the damage repaired, and they asked for the services of Mr. Blackett, the Government Engineer, who came down to Oamaru and, with the local manager, examined the damage and suggested a remedy. His opinion was that it would take about £8,000 to make the breakwater quite secure; but, at the same time, in looking over the work, he imagined that it would be better, before anything further occurred, to spend more money on it and make it perfectly secure for all time to come. He would explain that the present breakwater was an upright wall, and Mr. Blackett proposed that outside the wall large blocks should be thrown indiscriminately, to give strength to it, so that the sea coming against it would not have so much effect on the present breakwater. He estimated that this work would cost £22,000. In addition to that, the Harbour Board was rather behind in its engagements with the Government, and the result was that there was a deficit of a little over £8,000 in this respect; and the Board thought that, while they were borrowing, they might as well clear off all old scores, and they included this £8,000 in the other amount to be borrowed; so that the result was that a loan of £40,000 was asked for by this Bill. The Bill had been before the Local Bills Committee, and that Committee had taken evidence upon it from Mr. Blackett, the Government Engineer, and from the promoter of the Bill, the present Colonial Secretary. The latter was examined more particularly with regard to a portion of the Bill that the Committee did not seem to believe in—that was, with regard to the consolidation of the loan; and, after the Committee had questioned him, still they could not see that there would be any great advantage derived by consolidating the loan.

Hon. Mr. Pharazyn

Taking into consideration the present state of the money-market, and the position of New Zealand securities, the Board thought it advisable to relinquish this portion of the Bill altogether, and merely take power to issue debentures for £40,000, which money should be confined to the special works mentioned in the Bill—namely, repairing the breakwater and increasing its strength, and the repayment of liabilities. He would only say, further, that £280,000 had been spent on harbour works at Oamaru. The harbour works included sixty acres of still water, and gave a depth of 24ft. at the principal wharf. The works had been a great advantage to the locality, giving easy access to vessels, and providing easy means of transport for the produce of two million acres of land, thereby saving at least £10,000 a year to the persons using it. This was all he considered it necessary to say about the Bill, except with regard to the security for the loan. The security was a rating-power over rather more than a million acres of the very finest district in the whole colony. It included all the agricultural land in the neighbourhood of Oamaru. It also included, north of the Waitaki, a very considerable portion of valuable land, and of valuable hill-land up as far as the Lindis River; so that the security was ample. There was a limit to the power of rating, but this gave an ample margin for the amount borrowed. He moved the second reading of the Bill.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE inquired if he rightly understood his honourable friend to state that he proposed to ask the Council to assent to the borrowing not only of £30,000 for certain works which he specified, but also of £10,000 for the payment of interest, and that that was the recommendation of the Local Bills Committee to which the Bill had been referred. He must say that that was a very objectionable provision. This sort of thing might have been done indirectly on a former occasion, he was not sure; but this was the first occasion on which persons or bodies had come forward directly and had asked the Legislature to allow them to borrow money to pay interest on money already borrowed. For himself, he would not allow that sort of thing. He thought they had better face the difficulty. He did not know who had advanced the past interest, but he believed it was the Government.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Yes.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE did not think the Government ought to take up these loans in the way they had done; and in Committee he should move that the amount applied for be cut down from £40,000 to £30,000.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER said the honourable gentleman who had moved the second reading of the Bill had come out in quite a new character. He could not congratulate him upon it, because he had looked upon him as one who opposed loans. The honourable gentleman proposed a Bill for a loan to pay interest on a former loan. The honourable gentleman had altogether changed his colours in regard to borrowing. He hoped that when the Bill came to be considered they might see some reason why this money should be borrowed; but that it should be proposed to borrow money to pay interest on borrowed money did appear to be going to excess in borrowing. He always understood that Oamaru was already the most heavily-taxed town in the colony; and yet another burden was proposed to be put upon it. He recollected on a former occasion an honourable gentleman who lived in Oamaru saying it was quite impossible for the Oamaru people to meet the taxes put upon them, they were so excessive in comparison with those on the rest of the colony, and suggesting that the colony should take their liability over; and now he found that his honourable friend, in addition to this burden, proposed to put another burden upon Oamaru. It might be indispensable that the money should be borrowed to repair the breakwater; but he thought the Council ought to refuse to go further than that. He would support the second reading to-day; but the matter should be considered very carefully in Committee. When the Bill went into Committee no doubt the question would be raised as to how much money ought to be borrowed under the circumstances.

The Hon. Mr. PEACOCK asked how long the money was proposed to be provided for; because in the preamble it said it was for "the present and the future."

The Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL knew something about this proposal, and he took a very active part in trying to defeat it when it was before the ratepayers, when it was carried by only a small majority. As to the amount proposed to be borrowed, so far as he could recollect it was originally £33,000, but now it had been increased to £40,000, and he noticed in the Bill they would have to pay 8 per cent. for the advance. One of the principal endowments of this Board consisted of a rabbit-infested run, consisting of 65,000 acres, and which was now let for about £3,000, and the lease expired in 1890. If that run were put up to auction to-day it would not fetch £700. He knew the run well, and he would not give that for it. They had now got to face that aspect of the question. Then, the colony had made an advance of £35,000, and he did not know where the security was. The Board shifted their account from the Union Bank to the Colonial Bank, and £5,000 which had been advanced was sent to the Colonial Bank, and the Colonial Bank actually collared the money. Then they shifted their account to the National Bank, in whose hands they now were. In passing this Bill he believed they would be doing an unwise thing. He spoke as having a great interest in that part of the country, and he advised the Council to make some inquiries into the subject. They had been assured that the breakwater could never be destroyed; and yet it had met with this accident. He suggested that the further consideration of the matter should be left over till next session.

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI did not feel obliged to the honourable gentleman who had advocated the rejection of the Bill; but no doubt the honourable gentleman had reasons and causes for doing so. He (Mr. Shrimski) was an old settler there, and had an interest in the place, and all he could say was that, as far as the Board were concerned, they were endeavouring to discharge their duties to the satisfaction of the public. No one could charge them with being actuated by motives of personal gain in what they did. They were constructing a public work, which was not only for the benefit of the people of Oamaru, but also for the whole of the colony, because if the harbour works were carried to completion there they would allow ships to enter and leave that port in safety, and Wellington and Auckland would be benefited, because they would get their goods so much cheaper; consequently Oamaru should not be called upon to pay the whole of the taxation as proposed. If by the will of Providence this work had been damaged to a certain extent, who was responsible for it? Surely not the Board? If the Board were allowed to borrow this sum they would be able to meet their engagements; but, if not, where was their income to be derived from? He asked the Council to consider whether, for the sake of £40,000, they would allow the works already constructed to go to waste and ruin, or whether they would allow the people to tax themselves to the extent of £40,000, so as to enable them to carry out the work. No doubt the Hon. Mr. Campbell spoke from a personal knowledge of the subject. Whether he held first mortgages or second mortgages he (Mr. Shrimski) was not aware, but the honourable gentleman's remarks led to the conclusion that he was a bondholder of the first class.

The Hon. Mr. RICHMOND thought that the present state of the Oamaru Harbour, as referred to in the discussion, pointed to the mistake they had made all along in allowing small local bodies to make works of this description. But it would not do, having made the mistake, to drop the matter, and they could not refuse to authorise the means for the restoration of the works. He could give his experience on the matter of the restoration of such works, as he had lived for two years in the neighbourhood of a large similar work in Algeria constructed on this same plan, which had been expected to withstand the storms of the Mediterranean without the additions which it was now proposed to make at Oamaru. They very soon found out that that would not do, and it was found necessary to construct an artificial beach outside in that harbour, capped with blocks of concrete on a larger scale than were used in New Zealand or in England generally, mètres being substituted for yards. He presumed that the stress to which the Oamaru breakwater would be subjected was not less than that which arose in the Mediterranean, and he had seen those large blocks, 13ft. long by 7ft. square, lifted up and thrown against the face of the breakwater. He mentioned this in order that the Council might see that it would be very undesirable that this work should be done in an imperfect fashion, and that the mere taking out of the broken stone would be utterly insufficient; and if the Board were pinched for the means of making proper blocks, which were absolutely necessary, and if as a consequence they were driven to slop-work, the work would have to be done over again before very long. This was the first time he had voted in favour of a loan, but in this case he believed it to be necessary, if it was considered necessary to retain the Oamaru breakwater.

The Hon. Mr. MILLER said that the real question they had to consider was, whether they should allow the £300,000 which had been spent in the construction of harbour improvements at Oamaru to be utterly wasted, or spend the necessary money in repairing the breakwater. With regard to what the Hon. Mr. Richmond had just said, he gathered from his remarks that he was not aware that the Harbour Board, from the first moment this injury happened, consulted the Government, and that the repairs were being carried out by the advice and under the control of the Government Engineer. That was the best thing the Harbour Board could do. No man could say what was to be the ultimate result of any of these breakwaters. The Oamaru breakwater was, from the first, admittedly of an experimental nature. Considering the almost total ignorance which existed with regard to these works when this harbour was commenced he thought it could not be denied that it had been a very successful work. It was true it had sustained considerable injury, but that injury would not have been sustained if sufficient funds had been available during the time of the construction of the breakwater. Out of the proposed loan, £22,000 ought to have been spent during the construction of the breakwater. There were certain members of the Board, in the old times, who wished to expend more money upon the breakwater proper, before what was called the mole—which was the protective work on the north—was commenced. That was overruled, and the consequence now was that it was seen that the breakwater was not sufficiently strong. The Government Engineer had, very properly, determined that he would recommend that a sufficient expenditure should be incurred at once, to prevent such a disaster occurring again. Knowing the whole history of the matter, he (Mr. Miller) was bound to say—although he was not a bit more for borrowing than anybody else—that he could not for a moment admit that they ought to allow a work of that magnitude and benefit to the district to go to rack and ruin and become utterly useless for the sake of saving the proposed necessary expenditure. The saving to the district in cost of exporting and importing the produce amounted to a very large sum.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER.—How much is paid for interest?

The Hon. Mr. MILLER said he was coming to that presently. During the present year there had been 5,080 tons of produce exported to Sydney alone. That was within the nine months which had passed when the return which he held in his hand was made up.

Hon. Mr. Richmond

That trade to Sydney could not possibly have existed without this harbour. It was of no use saying it would have been better if the country had never spent a farthing on this breakwater and thus made the people use the railway. It was the railway freight which made the difference. The Oamaru district had furnished a very considerable part of the whole trade of the colony to Sydney. When the wheat trade almost collapsed, and the depression became general, the people in that district turned to growing potatoes; and the export of potatoes had been very considerable. The rate which was levied under the Act of 1882 was three-sixteenths of a penny. The Act gave power to levy three-eighths of a penny. Three-sixteenths of a penny was levied, and that produced £3,000. He would have been extremely glad if the district could have escaped the tax; but he was perfectly certain of this: that they were better off with the harbour rate and the harbour than they would be without the harbour. There was no question about the wisdom of going on with the work, because if the work were not proceeded with it would mean not only throwing away all the money that had been spent, but it would plunge the district into a state of depression—of ruin, he was going to say, but at least of depression and isolation which would be a colonial disaster in itself much greater than the loss of the £30,000 or £40,000 which it was proposed to borrow.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR would support the second reading of this Bill. All along, since the work had been commenced, he had as far as possible assisted Oamaru in getting their harbour. He had always taken a considerable interest in the matter. He felt that a very great wrong and injustice would be done to the people of the district if this money, or, at all events, a portion of it, were not granted. As long as the people of the district were prepared to rate themselves, and stand the expense incurred, he thought the Council would do wrong if it refused to pass the Bill. He hoped that the consideration which had been given to that part of the colony interested in the measure before the Council would be extended to districts with works of a similar character in other parts of the colony.

The Hon. Mr. HOLMES said the Hon. the Attorney-General had expressed surprise that he (Mr. Holmes) should introduce a borrowing Bill. He exceedingly disliked borrowing, but he had taken the Bill up at the request of the people of the district. There was a rate to be levied over a large area, and he himself paid a considerable amount of that rate. Therefore he had a direct interest in the Oamaru Harbour. If the rate were four or five times what it was, he would gladly pay it rather than have the harbour done away with. The harbour had become a necessity. It could not be done without in a district so thoroughly agricultural. As a harbour of refuge it was very good. He had never seen an accident there, although he had noticed ten or twelve vessels in the harbour at one time, and there was a gale blowing at the time. Even when the accident occurred to the breakwater the vessels in the harbour were uninjured. On public grounds this harbour was one of the works an effort should be made to maintain. It was really a public work of very considerable importance to his district.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

The Hon. Mr. HOLMES.—I have very little to add to my remarks of yesterday, when I showed that all the coal from the West Coast mines must be taken by water, and therefore that the construction of this railway would be of very little use in that respect. The only coal that could be taken without loss would be the coal that might be required for those in the interior settlements or about Christchurch. Then, the course of the trade of the West Coast has altered. I imagine that Wellington does a large portion of that trade now. Certainly the cattle trade is with Wanganui and Taranaki, though it was formerly with Canterbury; but I think the trade is now in the hands of the people of the North Island. There is another question that I think is of importance. Will the property of this company be subjected to the property-tax the same as the property of private individuals? If so, I have calculated that, the prime cost of the railway property being £2,500,000, and land £1,250,000, the property-tax would come to £15,625 a year; and I do not know how English capitalists would like to pay at the rate of 1s. 8d. in the pound, instead of 7d. in the pound, which they have to pay in England on the income-tax. This is nearly three times the amount. Then, the property would also be subject to the county and road rates and the charitable rate, as I imagine that the people of the West Coast would not allow the company to go free. These are all matters for us and the capitalists to attend to. I have just one remark to make with regard to the lines themselves. It might be assumed that, provided we had abundance of capital and the proper time had arrived, it would be worth our while to make the line from Springfield to Brunnerton, and also from Hokitika to Reefton; but how any sane man—any man with the smallest modicum of common-sense—could think of making a railway from Reefton to Belgrove I cannot understand. It will pass through scarcely any agricultural land for 120 miles. Mr. Foy said that for sixty miles of the line two drays per week were quite sufficient to do the cartage on that road. If there is only that amount of traffic on the line, what hope is there for the railway? There are a great many difficulties to be overcome, and therefore, whatever there may be to justify them in making the other parts of the line, there is nothing to justify them in making the line I have referred to, and I say any man who votes in favour of making that line is an enemy to the country. There is no doubt that there is a desire on the part of people all over New Zealand to have large sums of money spent in their own districts. They imagine that somehow it will filter into their pockets; but that is a great mistake. Money spent on bad enterprises is a positive loss to the State and to every person in connection with it. There is no axiom of political economy to justify the wasting of money on bad enterprises. I remember sitting in the gallery in another place with Sir George Whitmore and listening to the late Colonial Treasurer when he delivered an address on the subject of how much money had been spent on worthless works out of the first loan merely for securing votes, and he calculated that one and a half millions out of eight millions had been spent on works which were really of no value, although he was a party to it, and although the object of it was to secure him a following. In Hansard, Volume XVI., 1874, Mr. Vogel said,—

"We have sanctioned the borrowing of ten millions, but it is bitterly mortifying to me to know that only six and a half millions, instead of eight millions, are for railways; there is thus a difference of one and a half millions, and every honourable member must know that is represented by expedients to which we would have had to submit in order to purchase support from the provinces, in order to induce them to allow us to carry on the immigration and public-works policy."

I would just say, in conclusion, that it is not advisable to get into trouble with English contractors. We had enough of that in the case of Messrs. Brogden and Co. I feel satisfied that those who are better acquainted with the matter will agree with me that the contractors in the colony would perform the work with less trouble and at a cheaper cost than the English contractors, so far as we have had experience of them. I therefore think that if this contract had not been entered into it would have been much better. If the railway had been applied for when times were different I believe Parliament would have voted the money for the line from Springfield to Brunnerton. I believe it is desirable to connect the East and West Coasts if we had the money to do it; but I altogether deprecate the idea of giving away a large quantity of land for an object that is not really required. If it were seven or ten years hence it would be far more reasonable to apply for it; but my opinion is that nothing would justify us in going on with this work at the present time.

The Hon. Mr. JOHNSON.—I have listened with attention and interest to this debate, and I must confess I have felt some surprise at what appeared to me to be the desire on the part of some honourable members to refer as little as possible to the early history of this undertaking, and to confine the discussion to the proposed new contract, which, no doubt, is more immediately under our notice. I think, too, Sir, I can recognise the position from which such a course would appear to be the right one; but I venture to say that the adoption of it will, in all probability, lead into great error. We must absolutely look closely into every circumstance connected with this undertaking. I was therefore sorry that the motion to refer this question to a Select Committee proposed to confine the labours of that Committee to the consideration of one or two points. However, I hope that motion will be amended, and the Committee left absolutely free to adopt what course they choose in the course of their investigations. Now, Sir, this motion seems to involve two large questions. The first is, whether we should agree to grant the concessions now asked for; and the second is, in what form, supposing we are willing to grant those concessions, we should legalise those concessions—give them legal effect. And I think these two questions are very wide apart. I have noticed in the debate a tendency on the part of many honourable members to agree to these concessions that are now proposed provided they are assured that the construction put upon them be that stated by the Hon. Sir Frederick Whitaker, and provided also that sufficient caution is taken to protect the colony from any future and unlooked-for claims. I myself am not prepared to go so far as that. There is at present a contract in force—that made in 1885. That contract was considered sufficiently liberal to be accepted by the contractors and executed by them. Nor must we forget that these contractors, and their representatives at the present time—the company—claim to be quite as well informed on all questions relating to this matter as we are ourselves, and therefore quite able to protect themselves without any action on our part. It is true it was agreed that that contract should be modified to a certain extent; but those modifications can be quite clearly understood, and there will be no difficulty in introducing them into the contract of 1885. I think, therefore, that we ought not to go further than the Act of 1886 authorises us to go in modifying that contract. But it is said that if we do not grant these concessions now asked for the whole work will fall through—that the railway will not be made. I do not think there is any great ground for alarm on that account. No doubt alarm will be felt by those persons who look for immediate benefit in connection with the construction of this work either from the expenditure of money in constructing it or from the easier access to other parts of the colony to be provided by it. But these advantages are not the only ones that we have to take into consideration. They may be purchased at too great expense to the colony; and I think they would be so if this contract which we are now asked to confirm is the price of them. I would also ask whether there is no risk of this undertaking falling through from other causes, even supposing these concessions were granted. When we remember that the total subscribed capital of this company, which has undertaken to construct works estimated to cost at least £2,500,000, is only £250,000, it seems to me that the prospect of these works being rapidly carried to a conclusion is remote. I cannot think that it will be within any reasonable time that this work will be carried out. Then, again, under the present proposals we have virtually to provide the capital for these works by supplying in advance lands to be mortgaged to raise the necessary funds. There should be some very great general benefit to be obtained by such a sacrifice; but I fail to see any that is at all adequate. When I consider this undertaking even with the most friendly feelings towards it, I cannot but come to the conclusion that it is premature and uncalled-for at the present time. Now, Sir, I will not say more upon the subject of the contract itself, or upon the terms of the contract. Other honourable members have gone into those points fully. I have merely expressed my opinion to this effect: that we should not go beyond the concessions granted by the Act of 1886. I will now refer, Sir, briefly to the other point; and that is, supposing these concessions are granted, then what is the form in which we should give legal effect to them? I say most positively that I object very strongly to the form now suggested. If we take the original contract and examine it closely by the side of this proposed contract, we shall find that there is nothing in the original one which is actually cancelled, but that almost every important clause in that is more or less modified by and, at the same time, incorporated with this new contract; so that, if you place one beside the other, it is almost impossible to say what is the legal construction to be put upon these modified and combined terms. Why is that so? Why should this be the form of contract offered to us? Would it not have been far better to have framed an entirely new contract, containing all the conditions agreed upon, and by the execution of which all existing engagements should be cancelled? Under these circumstances we should have been in a very different position; we should have been able to understand fairly what was proposed, and to consider fairly what the concessions asked for are. As it now is, I maintain we are quite in the dark as to what will take place if we adopt the present proposals. Looking at it from this point of view, I can only say that I believe it will be simply leading the colony into a trap if we adopt this agreement—a trap none can see how we shall escape from. It is undertaking responsibilities the extent of which we cannot now calculate, and for a consideration which is quite inadequate. I therefore shall certainly not vote in favour of this contract, at any rate, as it stands. I shall, however, vote for the motion of the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse, that the question be referred to a Committee; and I trust the Committee will investigate the case from the very beginning.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER.—The amendment moved yesterday by the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse was that clause 3 of the proposed contract should be referred to a Select Committee. Doubts have been expressed as to whether the clause as it now stands is sufficient for the purpose for which is intended. Upon consideration, I have come to the conclusion that it is sufficient; but, in order to obviate all questions in regard to it, I am quite willing that words shall be added to it which will, if possible, make it still clearer than it is now. These words were proposed in the House of Representatives, but were rejected on the ground that the clause itself was quite sufficient without the words. What I would suggest is that that part of the clause should read as follows: "And, if the aggregate of the money so received and owing, together with the sum of such valuation, shall not amount to £1,250,000, the only claim of the company in respect of such difference (if any) shall be a right on the part of the company, within six months thereafter, to select further land out of the land then remaining unselected." That, I apprehend, would make the matter perfectly clear, and would satisfy some honourable gentlemen who consider that the clause is not sufficiently clear as it stands. The Hon. Mr. Johnson, I think, rather misapprehends the position; and the Hon. Mr. Holmes also misapprehends it. With regard to the Hon. Mr. Holmes, in the first instance, I should to a great extent agree with the speech he has made if the original question as to whether this railway should be constructed were now before us. If we could revert to the position we were in when the first Act was before the Legislature I think many honourable members would take a different view from that which they take at the present time. But, as I endeavoured to point out when I proposed the resolution yesterday, it is quite clear we have got into a totally different position at the present time. We are bound to make a new contract; there is a stipulation made on the part of the original contracting parties that a new contract shall be made. The only question the Council at present has to consider is, what is to be in this new contract. I shall again repeat a portion of what I stated yesterday. In the Act of 1886 it is set out that a contract had already been made; and that contract was confirmed. It also stipulated that there should be other conditions, and a new contract was to be made with these conditions in. Those conditions were inserted in a new draft contract, which was agreed to between the representatives of the company and the Government in December, 1886. The draft contract we have before us is that which the Government does agree to, subject to certain modifications suggested by the House of Representatives and by the Government; so that we have got into this position: that we must have a new contract made. Honourable members have the contract of 1886 between the Government and the company, and that contract stands with such alterations and additions as may now be made. This matter has been before the Assembly now for a length of time. It has been before the Council for some six or seven days, with the resolution which was passed by the House of Representatives on the subject, so that honourable members have had every opportunity of examining the matter. If honourable members will look they will see that the contract which was made in December, 1886, between the agents of the company and the Government of that day is modified in some respects in favour of the colony. They will find that every provision is now made to protect the colony. There is one stipulation which is of importance: we are to give land to the value of £1,250,000. The draft contract was that the company should select land to that amount anywhere, and as it is now arranged it carries out what was originally intended by the parties. Every alteration made subsequent to that has been in favour of the Government, with two or three exceptions. Now, I want to point out to honourable members that there is one stipulation at present in the Act of 1884 which it is of the first importance we should get rid of. The Hon. Mr. Holmes said we are giving up a great many things and we are getting nothing in exchange. I say we are getting, at all events, one most important thing in exchange, and what we are giving up is of far less importance to us than that which we are to get. The stipulation referred to was, that we were only to reserve those bits of land on which miners were engaged or which were known to be auriferous at the time the selection was made. Again, the company have the right of selection of alternate blocks within fifteen miles of the railway, and it will be found that that includes a great portion of the goldfields on the West Coast; so that, if no alteration had been made, the company could have taken up the greater portion of land believed to be auriferous, and which under this draft contract may from time to time be brought into operation in the goldfields. I say this is of the very first importance to the goldfields on the West Coast. There is an interest there of greater importance to the people on the West Coast than anything else in this contract. We are bound to protect that part of the country from being taken up to the exclusion of the miners. I say that is of the first importance, and I hope the Council will look at it from that point of view. We are giving up alternate blocks, which are of little value comparatively, because much of the railway goes through very broken land. The Hon. Mr. Johnson says we ought to value the land as it will be after the railway is made. That is a legitimate profit the company are to get. They take the land at the valuation fixed upon it, and there is one provision as to the valuation which is very much against them. None of the land is to be valued at less than 10s. an acre, and I apprehend that a great deal of the land is not worth 10d. an acre. The Hon. Mr. Johnson says we ought to have all the Acts and agreements put into one contract, so that everybody may understand it. That is exactly what the resolution passed by the House of Representatives recommends. If the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse will withdraw his amendment I will get my honourable colleague Mr. Stevens to propose that the words I have stated be inserted, with the view of clearing up the difficulty which has been pointed out. I am quite sure that, if now we were to reject that which is proposed by the House of Representatives, we should place ourselves and the colony in a false position; and, seeing that every protection is given to the interests of the colony, I trust the Council will allow the resolution to go through.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE. — As the honourable gentleman has appealed to me, although I have spoken to the amendment perhaps I may be permitted to make a few observations in reference to what has just fallen from the honourable gentleman. I may state that from much he has advanced in his speech I entirely differ, and much that he has said goes to confirm the view I have already expressed, that I felt myself logically impelled to vote against the Bill altogether. There is a very important consideration which he has brought forward—and to which he has referred more explicitly to-day than he did yesterday. That does very much influence me, as it did influence me yesterday. It is this: that there was a great defect in the Act of 1884. The contract that was made under that Act did not provide, as it ought to have provided, for the reservation of mineral land, and we must make great concessions in order to remedy the mistake then made. I am therefore prepared, if the Council will permit me, to withdraw my amendment in favour of the course suggested by the Attorney-General. I believe, under all the circumstances of the case, that is the best course we can adopt, and I am pleased to find that, if that course be adopted, it is likely to be satisfactory to all parties. We shall then be provided amply against any claims for compensation in the future.

LAND FOR SETTLEMENTS BILL.

Mr. FULTON brought up the report of the Waste Lands Committee on this Bill, and moved, That it do lie on the table.

Mr. SPEAKER said the honourable member in charge of this Bill could now have it restored to the Order Paper if he so desired.

Sir G. GREY said he had no opportunity of doing that, because private members' days had been taken away. What he wished to submit to the House was this: that this Bill was sent to the Committee on the 3rd of November, and consequently it had been delayed there for four weeks, all but one day, and the report was not brought up until every opportunity of bringing the Bill forward had been taken away from him. He considered, notwithstanding what the Speaker had said, that a great injustice had been done to himself and also to the country. The Government had brought in their Land Bill in the meantime, and there was no opportunity of comparing the two Bills together. When the debate was taking place on the Land Bill he ought to have had an opportunity of contrasting the Government Bill with his own measure. It appeared to him that it was a very wrong principle that members' Bills should be taken from them in that way and detained in a hostile Committee for such a length of time. He thought that, under the circumstances, some effort should be made by the Government to do justice to himself and the country in this matter.

Mr. FULTON wished to say, on behalf of the Committee of which he was Chairman, that the Committee had gone through the Bill with all necessary expedition—in fact, with unusual expedition in some respects, because the Committee had sat, on days on which it was not usual to sit, in order to consider the Bill. It was a Bill which required great consideration, as its principles were of large importance, and there was not the slightest attempt to stop the Bill or even to delay it. Other members of the Committee would bear him out in saying that he had urged the Committee to push on with the Bill in order that the honourable gentleman might have an opportunity of bringing it before the House; but still the Committee felt, and properly felt, he thought, that the clauses of the measure were such as to require the greatest care and consideration. The Bill would have been reported on the previous day but for his own oversight. He had forgotten that the interpretation clause had not been considered when the Committee adjourned on the previous day, so the Committee had had again to revert to it that morning; otherwise the report and the Bill would have been before the House on the previous day. He must himself take the blame for that one day's delay. The Committee had used every possible exertion to get the Bill reported on as early as possible, and it must be remembered that it was a Committee which had a very large number of petitions and other subjects to deal with.

Mr. SEDDON would point out that, unless the Bill was set down for committal in the ordinary course, the amendments would not be printed so that honourable members could see them. He therefore moved, That the Bill be set down for committal next day. The Government had given a promise that they would consider certain Bills introduced by private members that should have facilities for being passed; and possibly this might be one of them.

Sir G. GREY had had no intention of casting reproaches upon the activity of the Committee, but he thought it a very wrong system which permitted a Bill of this importance to be taken out of a member's hands and delayed for one month. He simply objected to the general principle, which he thought was quite contrary to the general spirit of legislation. It was quite certain that in a short session, if a Bill remained a month with a Committee, an honourable member would have no chance of getting his measure brought before the House and the country.

Mr. BARRON would remind the honourable member for Auckland Central that he would have a full opportunity of testing the opinion of the House on the proposals of this Bill when the Government Land Bill was being considered in Committee. He could then move that any or all of the clauses contained in his own Bill should be transferred to the Government Bill.

Sir G. GREY said there would be a difficulty in taking the course recommended by the honourable member for Caversham, because he intended to try to put two other Bills — of great importance to deferred-payment settlers and village settlers — into the Land Bill of the Government when that was brought forward.

Mr. WALKER said a very important measure had been referred to the Waste Lands Committee last night. Would it take the Committee a month to peruse that and bring down a report to the House?

Mr. FULTON presumed the Committee would answer the question of the honourable member for Ashburton when he (Mr. Fulton) brought down their report on the Bill.

Sir J. VOGEL would like to say a few words upon what seemed to be a growing evil. These sessional Committees appeared to him to be gradually claiming powers which would sap the power and lessen the responsibility of the House. When a Bill had passed its second reading it was understood that its policy was approved by the House. In a case like this,

however, it went to a Select Committee, and they might alter the Bill entirely, so that it might not be in accord with the decision of the House as to the policy of the measure. The Bill came back again, and there was really often no chance of members seeing the alterations in time to study them as they were able to study Bills before they went to a second reading. In this way alterations crept into Bills which honourable members generally, he believed, were not aware of until the session was over. If we were to have a system of Grand Committees it should be well understood, and the number of members of the Committees should be made larger, and the proceedings very different. As it was now, the responsibility of Parliament in regard to Committee Bills was lessened. A Bill came in, and was fully discussed and its policy assented to on the second reading; but it might come back from the Committee to which it was then referred in an entirely altered state, and embodying quite a different policy and principle, quite different from those which the Bill contained when it passed its second reading. He was not speaking only of Bills referring to land: it was the same with Mining Bills and Native Bills. These measures were fully discussed on the second reading when their provisions were well understood, and then they came back from Committees quite altered, and with provisions that were not generally understood; and between the two — the House and the Committee — members, who wished to do their duty, and to be influenced by what they considered desirable, lost their hold on the measures passed through the House. He thought some understanding should be arrived at as to these measures. If the Select Committees were to have the power of Grand Committees in regard to them, measures should be referred to those Committees before their second reading; or, if a Bill had passed its second reading when it was referred to a Committee, it should not be competent for the Committee to alter the policy of the measure. He could not help thinking that the present system was a growing evil, and one that members should take notice of — one, in fact, which was insidiously introducing a system of parliamentary procedure quite at variance with what was understood to be the true principle.

Mr. MOSS said this was a very important Bill on which some members had strong feelings, and he would ask the Chairman of the Committee whether the Committee were unanimous in their opinion on every point in their report.

Mr. FULTON would be happy to show the honourable member for Parnell the minutes of the Committee.

Mr. MOSS did not seek a privilege which other members could not enjoy. Standing Order 183 read, —

"In the event of any division taking place in any Select Committee, the question proposed, the name of the proposer, and the respective votes thereupon of each member present, are to be entered on the minutes of evidence, or on the minutes of the proceedings of the Committee (as the case may be), and reported to the House on the report of such Committee."

He therefore asked for a ruling as to whether it was not the duty of the Committee, in presenting their report on this Bill, to submit with it a report of all the proceedings in regard to it. It was only fair to the House that it should be so. The Standing Order he had read was very explicit, and, unless the report had been agreed to unanimously by the Committee, it must be complied with.

MR. SPEAKER said the rule was that all reports from Select Committees must be accompanied by minutes of proceedings and evidence.

MR. FULTON said the minutes of this Committee, like those of other Committees, were kept in a book. The Committee sat from day to day, and he thought it would be improper to lay on the table a book that he would have to take away next day when the Committee sat. He had no objection, of course, to laying the minutes on the table.

MR. SMITH had understood that the Premier had supported the principle of this Bill when it passed its second reading.

MR. MOSS hoped other honourable members would be guided by the Standing Order he had referred to and the ruling given by Mr. Speaker. It would be an absurdity to have such a Standing Order if it was not complied with. It would really be useful for the House to know the proceedings on a Bill from day to day as it passed through a Committee.

MR. ALLEN asked if it was imperative that the minutes of Committees should be laid on the table with their reports.

MR. SPEAKER said that was the rule.

MR. ALLEN would ask, why, then in that case, had there been an objection to laying the minutes of the Midland Railway Committee on the table?

MR. SPEAKER said the House could, as it did then, overrule the Standing Order, by ordering there should not be laid on the table anything it was deemed inexpedient to lay on the table.

MR. ALLEN asked if that was not done in opposition to the Standing Order.

MR. SPEAKER said it was for the House to say whether the minutes should lie on the table or not, and the House said "No."

MR. SEDDON asked whether, when there had been a division, the minutes must be presented with the report.

MR. SPEAKER.—Whether there has been a division or not, the House should know what took place.

MR. ALLEN asked if it was the rule that the minutes must be laid on the table.

MR. SPEAKER.—Yes.

MR. O'CONOR would like to know whether a resolution of the House could override a Standing Order. It appeared to have done so in the case mentioned.

MR. SPEAKER said that when the question was put, "That the minutes do lie on the table," it was for the House to say "Yes" or "No."

MR. SMITH would point out that the Government supported the principle of this Bill when it was before the House, and, as the delay was caused to a considerable extent in the Committee by the many amendments proposed by the Minister of Lands, he thought that the least the Government could do would be to give a day for the consideration of the Bill. It must have been known to the Government, when they took private members' days last week, that they virtually killed the Bill, unless an opportunity was to be given for its consideration.

Major STEWARD would go a little farther and suggest that, if the Government should not find it possible for the Bill to receive consideration this session, they should, under the circumstances of the case, the Bill having been to the Waste Lands Committee and having received great attention there, make arrangements to have the Bill proceeded with next session from the point at which it had now arrived. That would save time, and insure the honourable member for Auckland Central getting the verdict of the House upon it.

MR. COWAN desired to remove any misapprehension which might have been caused by the remarks of the honourable member for Woodville. The delay in reporting upon the Bill had not been caused by any action on the part of the Minister of Lands. Having been a regular attendant at the Committee, he could say that no such allegation could fairly be made against the honourable gentleman. He had taken great interest in the Bill, but had in no way delayed it. The fact was, that the subject was a very important one; the Bill had been a heavy one to consider, and that was why it had taken so long.

Mr. Fulton's motion agreed to.

PORT CHALMERS DOCK TRUST.

MR. ALLEN desired to know if the Premier could give him a reply to his question, put on the previous day, with regard to the Government giving facilities for bringing on the motion of the Select Committee to inquire into the proceedings of the Port Chalmers Dock Trust.

Major ATKINSON said this matter had been under consideration. He felt there was very great difficulty in the House directly interfering with the expenditure of money by local bodies; but, under the circumstances, the Government would not feel justified in opposing an obstacle to the honourable member making the proposal to the House, and it would rest with the House whether, under the circumstances, the request should be granted. As to facilities, he was unable to say anything further than that the Government would not raise any opposition to the proposal.

NEWTON FLOGGING CASE.

Sir J. VOGEL asked the Minister of Education, What course he has decided to take with regard to the case of flogging the girl at the school at Newton? He would remind the honourable gentleman to whom he put the question that he had put a similar question before, and that gentleman had told him that they were, considering the matter, and had lent him a copy of the report which had been made on the subject. He would like now to ask the honourable member to tell him what course, if any, the Government proposed to take with regard to this matter.

Mr. FISHER said the Government proposed to take no further action in the matter. The charge—if charge it could be called—had been formally and officially investigated by the Newton East School Committee, and, by a majority of the Committee, the master had been acquitted of having severely or unduly caned the child. He wished to call attention to the reiterated use of the word “flogged,” which was used in the honourable gentleman’s question. There was no flogging in the matter; and the case had been greatly exaggerated. The master of the school himself did not either cane or flog the child: the child merely received two slaps with a cane upon each hand. He had explained to the honourable gentleman, when he formerly put the question, that the Government did not consider that the master had the right either himself to flog or cane the child or to give instructions that the child should be flogged or caned because of the unwillingness or inability of the parents to send a note. If there had been anything in the nature of a flogging, anything to justify the use of that term, no doubt a more searching investigation would have been made. He had written to the Auckland Education Board, and they had taken no action whatever in the matter. He did not know whether it would be fair to assume that they also believed that the so-called flogging, and the circumstances connected with it, had been greatly exaggerated. At all events, the short answer to the honourable gentleman’s question was, that the Government did not propose to take any further action in the matter.

Sir J. VOGEL might say at once that he thought the force of public opinion, and of the opinion of the House, would compel the Government to take some action, or that some action must be taken outside the Government. He did not understand the distinction which the honourable gentleman drew between flogging and caning; he did not know whether it was the instrument or the part of the person to which it was applied that constituted the difference in his mind. It was well known that the child had been caned on the hand, and, consequently, she had received a flogging. He would ask the House to allow him to give a correct statement of the case, which the Hon. the Minister of Education had not done, and would say that, in his opinion, the defence of the person who ordered the flogging made the matter worse. If he rightly interpreted the remarks of the Minister of Education he considered that the master’s having only ordered the administration of the punishment and not administered it himself was a justification. He did not think it was, nor did he believe the House would. The facts of the case were these: This poor child was frequently asked to bring a shilling or a written note from her mother; and at least once—and, her mother thought, more often—she had requested her mother to give her the letter. The mother did not give her the letter, and for this reason: that, on a previous occasion, the brother of this poor girl had been dismissed from the school—dismissed in defiance of the law which obtains in New Zealand to enable all children to obtain a free education; this boy had been dismissed from the school because he had not brought a shilling for the stationery materials. Well, the girl was ordered to be caned because she did not bring a letter. It was not very clear whether or not the girl said she had asked for a letter on that day; but, certainly, the girl asserted that she had asked for a letter on some occasions. In cases like this, it was very rare that instances of brutal treatment of helpless children came to light; abuses might go on for years before the force of public opinion was brought to bear upon them, and when they did hear of such cases those who had experience in matters of the kind would readily surmise that the one first heard of was not the first occurrence of the kind. At the hearing before the Committee a gentleman named Cook came forward. He would quote from the Auckland Star:—

“At this stage a gentleman who had been listening quietly to the evidence rose to his feet, and said that if it was the proper time he wished to lay a complaint.—The Chairman asked him to put it in writing.—The man gave his name as James Cook, of South Street. He said that he preferred to speak to the Committee, as he could lay his complaint better that way than in writing. He wished to lay a complaint to show the scandalous way children were beaten at that school. Mr. Jeune had seen his child. It was shameful, and just for peeping on another girl’s slate. After expressing himself very strongly on the subject Mr. Cook withdrew.—The Chairman asked the Press not to notice that matter, as it was not the business before the meeting.”

Very properly, he thought, the Press refused to be muzzled, and this report had seen the light, and had shown what they might have expected—namely, that the poor girl’s was not a solitary instance. He would state the circumstances of the case as they had come out. This poor woman appeared to be a very deserving one. In a letter from Mr. J. Graham the family was spoken of as follows:—

“Having known the Sheard family for some considerable time, they having been tenants of mine for about two years, I have to state that I have always found them ready and willing to pay to the last farthing when they had the wherewith to do so. Mr. Sheard is a sober, industrious labourer, and willing to accept any kind of employment whereby he can obtain an honest livelihood; but during the last twelve months he has been very unfortunate in obtaining employment, though he has, to my knowledge, left no stone unturned to seek it. As a last resort he left home five weeks ago for Coromandel to endeavour to obtain employment as a prospector, since which period he has not been able to send any remittance for the support of his wife and children; and how the poor woman has provided for herself and five helpless children the bare necessities of life I am at a loss to understand. As to Mrs. Sheard knowing or thinking about the legal or illegal payment of the quarter's fees, I do not believe for one moment that she knew that such a question had ever been raised, but if she had the money it would have been paid without a second asking-for."

He would read another letter directly, which would show honourable members that this was a case which if one read in a novel one would say, What a sad and pathetic story! Here was this poor woman, without her husband, without means of livelihood, and in bad health. This child had household duties to perform, and, if her mother had not money in the house, it was all the more to her credit that, instead of worrying her mother on the subject, she kept it to herself. Could any honourable gentleman think that a girl in that position should be subjected to such a cruel punishment as this girl was subjected to? Here was the letter from Dr. Lewis on the subject:—

"Now, I happen to have seen this said Kate Sheard compelled to do the whole of the housework of the Sheard family, cooking, washing, and nursing, while the mother was confined to bed through illness. Suppose that on the afternoon of the caning—and I must say, judging by the results obtained, the lady pupil-teacher is no mean wielder of the rod—the whole of the household duties devolved on the said Kate Sheard, you must agree with me, Mr. Editor, that the housework would come very heavily on the child. Such work would be quite enough to set up inflammation in the palm and sheaths of the tendons, and result probably in a long illness and a stiff finger or two."

That was the opinion of the doctor with regard to punishment which the Minister of Education told the House was but a light one, and one that had been exaggerated. To his mind it was a terrible thing to allow girls to be subjected to any personal punishment of the kind, even if the offence had been of a much more serious character. He believed that the greatest protection to young women when they grew up was, that they had been taught throughout their lives to regard as inviolable the sanctity of their persons. There was only one being in the world—the mother, or the person who occupied that position—who should ever chastise a girl, if even she should do it, which he strongly denied. If whipping girls was to be done in full school before a lot of boys it would be teaching those boys to grow up to join the ranks of the brutes who beat their wives. That was what would happen if such a course as this were adopted towards young girls in schools. He could not help recalling to his mind what happened many years ago, when all Europe was convulsed with horror at the treatment of women by a great and important person. This great and important person, Marshal Haynau, went to London, and paid a visit to Barclay and Perkins's brewery and condescended to go over it; but the brewers' men there had read that Marshal Haynau had ordered women to be flogged, and they very soon made him hasten away from the brewery as quickly as possible. Were there no brewers' men in Auckland, one was inclined to ask, that this case had been allowed to slumber? This, however, he might say: that one gentleman, Mr. Jeune, a member of the School Committee, at once resigned his position in consequence of the decision that no further notice should be taken of the matter—which was, in fact, a decision justifying the master. So much for the question of flogging girls at school. He would not enter into the question raised by the doctor, as to which was the proper part of the body on which to inflict punishment of the kind. In the interest of the future women of New Zealand they should decide that no punishment of the kind should be administered to girls in public schools, and he hoped public opinion would secure such determination and force it on the Minister of Education, no matter what that honourable gentleman's own feelings might be on the subject. And now he would say a word or two as to the audacity of violating the spirit and intention of our Education Act in this case. We had a system which was said to be free; and when the question had been put, "Why should the parents of children who can afford to pay not be made to pay something towards the education of their children?" the answer had always been, "If you allow the parents of some children to pay, and others not, on account of their not being well off, you will draw a marked distinction between the two, and make some of the children very unhappy." That was the reason why the children of parents who could afford to pay were educated free. But what was done in this case? One child was sent away from the school altogether, and another was placed in the painful position of having to acknowledge, before the whole school, the poverty of her parents. And this was not a solitary case; for it appeared that it had been the practice in this school to make the children dun their parents for the shilling which was illegally required of them. While the colony was paying enormous sums to enable education to be free, so that there should be no distinction between children, no matter what the means of their parents might be, here a charge like this was being made to establish ranks in schools as between the children of parents who had not the shilling to pay and those whose parents could afford it. This was a most illegal demand to be made on them by the schoolmaster. He would not detain the House further than to say that, if the Government would not do anything in the matter, he had made up his mind that want of means should not prevent this poor woman from prosecuting the case. He moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. W. P. REEVES seconded the motion for adjournment, and would like to say that this was not a matter of such trifling importance as a good many honourable members appeared to think. The distinction sought to be drawn by the Minister of Education between caning and flogging seemed to be specious and, altogether, not proved. He thought it a most terrible thing that masters, who were prevented by the regulations from administering the cruel punishment of flogging, should be permitted to administer the punishment of caning. The Minister of Education said it was a less painful punishment to be caned than to be flogged; but he could assure the honourable gentleman that it was not. No doubt the honourable gentleman had not had any experience in the matter, and they now saw in the House the terrible result of sparing the rod in the honourable gentleman's case. But no doubt nineteen out of twenty of the honourable members present, who had had experience of the physical suffering, would bear him out in saying that in many cases it was a more severe punishment to be caned than to be flogged. He protested against masters endeavouring to evade the regulations under the trivial and peculiar pretext laid down by the Minister of Education.

Mr. FISHER said that, after the statement of the honourable member for Christchurch North, he was sure the House would permit him to answer some of the remarks of the honourable gentleman. Any man of impartial mind must admit that he had plainly stated on a former occasion, when the honourable gentleman brought the matter up, that he entirely disapproved of caning. He made that statement in such plain and simple language that there was no room for any misconception as to what he had said. But he wished to say now that he conceived it to be the primary duty of the Auckland Education Board to interfere in this matter, if any interference were necessary. The Board did interfere, and had called upon the Committee to report to the Board. The Committee inquired into all the circumstances of the caning, and forwarded the report of that inquiry, which disclosed certain perfectly plain facts; but, in the hands of such a superb champion of exaggeration as the House knew the honourable member for Christchurch North to be, those facts were perverted in a way that was not at all justifiable. What were the facts? He (Mr. Fisher) confessed that, on reading the statements contained in Dr. Lewis's letter, he came to the conclusion that a most unwarrantable punishment had been inflicted upon the girl. He really thought she had been subjected to a "brutal outrage," to quote the words of the honourable gentleman—that she had been beaten to within an inch of her life, and that the schoolmaster, Mr. Coates, had dropped on the ground from sheer exhaustion after inflicting the punishment. But, after investigation, it turned out that the caning had been inflicted by a female teacher in another room, and that the girl was not flogged by the master before the whole school. Dr. Lewis, who had published the sensational version of the punishment, was brought before the Committee for examination; and what did he say? In the official report of his evidence, as taken down by a shorthand writer, he said this: Dr. Lewis was asked, "You said in your letter, from which a great many think your impression was that the child was half murdered—you said you were astonished when you heard the reason of the caning. Was it at the caning or the reason you were astonished?" Answer: "At the reason, not at the caning." Then this further question was put to him: "If this girl had been taken into a room and punished in the way you think right, and a mark like the one you saw left, would you think that the child was unduly punished?" "Certainly not." That was the answer of Dr. Lewis, who put into an Auckland newspaper the letter which led every candid person to believe that the child had been cruelly flogged. And what was his statement as to the actual punishment? "You remember the child Kate Sheard going to your house on the 21st October?" "Yes." "You examined her hands?" "Yes." "You found nothing on one hand?" "Nothing." "And on the other a small weal common to boys, which you thought had been caused by a little catching in the end of the cane?" "Yes. The weal was caused by a split in the end of the cane catching in the hand." This was the "brutal assault" which the honourable gentleman had magnified into such elaborate proportions; and he (Mr. Fisher) would ask the House whether, upon this plain statement of the medical man himself, there was any justification for the harrowing version which the honourable gentleman had given to the House that day. Then, the honourable gentleman raised the question as to the right of any person connected with the school to demand from this or any other child a fee of a shilling; and he (Mr. Fisher) granted that, technically speaking, there was no right whatever to exact or demand any fee from any pupil attending the public schools. The Act itself was mandatory upon the point that no fee should be charged. But what was the shilling for? He wished the House to understand that, in giving an explanation on this point, he was not defending the action of the Committee. But his own boys attended the State schools, and he had to provide school material for them. The Committees were bound by the Act to provide all necessary school apparatus, but there was nothing in the Act which compelled the School Committees to provide school material for the children. He (Mr. Fisher) had to find three and four shillings for each boy every quarter for the necessary school material, and he should be very glad, speaking his own personal views, if the School Committee of his district would consent to provide his children with all necessary school material at the rate of one shilling a quarter. He did not think that any member of the House who looked into the matter would deem it exorbitant to pay one penny a week for school material.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES.—Supposing they have not got it?

Mr. FISHER.—Can it be possible that in the Colony of New Zealand there are people who cannot afford to pay one shilling in thirteen weeks?

Mr. LEVESTAM.—Yes, there are.

Mr. FISHER said he did not in any sense defend the demand for the shilling. He only expressed a wish that in his own case the School Committee of the Thorndon district would accept one shilling per quarter, and provide his children with necessary school material. Now, these were the facts relating to the payment of the shilling. The shilling was not demanded. Here is the regulation or rule under which the shilling was paid:—

“All below Standard I., 8d., for which they shall have the use of slates and slate-pencils. For Standards I. to VI., 1s., for which they shall have the use of slates, slate-pencils, ink, pens, and penholders, and be supplied with copy-books, blotting-paper and glass-paper, with muriatic acid for desk cleaning, and foolscap paper for examination purposes.”

He thought that the Committee, instead of being blamed for asking a shilling a quarter, were rather to be commended. However, as he had already stated, he was not there to defend the Committee upon that point. Well, these were the facts relating to this now celebrated flogging case. He had shown that the sensational statements made concerning it were altogether unwarranted and unjustifiable, that the Committee itself made an ample and exhaustive inquiry, and that the sensational version which the honourable gentleman had given to the House that afternoon was in no way justified. He was sure that if the Board of Education, who, so to speak, were on the spot, had seen anything to justify their interference, they would have interfered, for they were the persons to interfere. The only way in which the Government could interfere was by the appointment of a Royal Commission; and he would ask the honourable gentleman whether he thought the Government ought to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the circumstances of this case.

Sir G. GREY said he was interested in the district in which this circumstance occurred, and he thought this should be laid down as a rule by that House: that, so far as they could prevent corporal punishment being inflicted on girls who attended public schools, they would prevent its being done. He thought they had all come to that conclusion, and he really did not think that a case of wrongful punishment was so trifling a thing as persons believed. He was certain that an innocent child unjustly punished and struck, as he believed was the case in this instance, had a sort of hopelessness of justice in the world, and a kind of depression and grief and sense of wrong impressed upon its mind, that perhaps people could hardly understand unless they had suffered when they were children themselves. He thought the persons concerned would, on reflection, regret what had occurred, and he wished the House, on every possible occasion, to protest against corporal punishment being inflicted upon girls who attended

Major ATKINSON was only going to say that he entirely agreed with what had fallen from the honourable member for Auckland Central. It appeared to him (Major Atkinson) that the House should discourage in every possible way corporal punishment in schools, especially of girls. He objected to it himself, even in the case of boys. He felt quite certain, in regard to a school in which corporal punishment was necessary, that the master of that school was incompetent for his business. That he felt very strongly about. The Government considered this case with a great deal of care to see whether they could properly interfere: but seeing that the evidence of the doctor had entirely broken down; seeing that he had retracted everything he said, and made out that the punishment was only moderate and reasonable—if corporal punishment could be said to be reasonable, but he was not prepared to say that it was, however—the School Committee having made an inquiry, and the Education Board being there to take action, as it was its duty to do if it thought necessary, the Government, not being charged with any function at all, and having no authority, would not have been justified, under these circumstances, in treating this as a case of brutal assault. But had there been any brutal assault, and had neither the Committee nor the Board of Education interfered, then the Government would have been bound, and he would have done his utmost, to have the case thoroughly investigated; but it did not seem to the Government that they were justified in departing from that rule, especially as they had no function in the matter. He had no doubt this would be a warning to all schoolmasters generally; and he ventured to think that, if this was not put down by Education Boards and School Committees, the House would have to step in and say that it should not take place. He confessed that, upon reading the report and the evidence adduced, as he did carefully, it did not seem to him that the punishment was justified. He thought there was a reasonable doubt that the child had done what she ought to have done—asked her mother for the money. Honourable members would note that the child was not punished for not bringing the shilling, although that was not clearly brought out—she was punished, partly, because she did not ask her mother again, as she had been directed to do, for the money. He could hardly call that a disobedience of orders calling for punishment, but he thought that any further action on the part of the Government would not have been justifiable under the circumstances. But he repeated again that he looked upon it as an exceedingly wrong thing to punish a girl. He believed it showed incompetency on the part of the masters when they had to punish; and if the practice grew to any extent in their schools, and the School Committees and Education Boards did not see to it, the House would have to step in and say, “You shall not do it.”

Mr. E. RICHARDSON would like to know if the Government had received any intimation that this practice had been persisted in, of demanding money from pupils.

Mr. ATKINSON thought that nearly all the Committees did it all over the colony. As he understood it the difficulty was this: that there was no provision made by the public to provide the schools with copybooks, slates, pens, and ink. That was considered outside the Act, and children were supposed to provide themselves with these necessities. That was what had, apparently, been the administration of the late Government in that direction, and no one could be said to be more anxious in the matter of education than Sir Robert Stout. If it was considered necessary by the State that children should be supplied with these articles free, no doubt some proposal would have been made on the subject by the late Minister of Education. The general experience was, that it was very much cheaper for the children to buy what they wanted by this small general contribution than that each child should bring his own slate, pen, ink, &c.

Mr. LEVESTAM must confess that he was much pleased with the honourable member for Christchurch North for having brought this matter before the House, and he was surprised at Ministers trying to find excuses. The Minister of Education told the House that it was a weal caused by a split in the cane.

Mr. FISHER.—It was not I who told you that; it was the medical man.

Mr. LEVESTAM said the honourable gentleman stated the punishment was not severe, but merely a weal caused by a split at the end of the cane. But why was this child chastised at all? The honourable gentleman told the House that there was nothing in the Act which empowered him to step in. He (Mr. Levestam) took it that it was the duty of the Minister of Education to see that the Act was carried out. What was he for?

Mr. FISHER said he was there for what Sir Robert Stout had been there for, and the honourable gentleman had never found fault with anything Sir Robert Stout did in connection with education.

Mr. LEVESTAM had heard no complaint whatever that Sir Robert Stout did not carry out the Act. What was the Minister of Education there for? Simply to see that the Act was carried out. If not, what was the use of him? The honourable gentleman went on to tell the House that if he had found that some very severe punishment had been inflicted, and the Committee and the Board did not take it up, then he would. How could he have done it?

Major ATKINSON.—By no clause at all; outside the Act.

Mr. LEVESTAM might almost say that a crime had been committed. A child was punished without rhyme or reason, and he held that it was the duty of the Government to step in. They were told that the evidence broke down completely—that was, the doctor's evidence. That seemed to him to be a secondary consideration altogether. The punishment was severe. Why had the teacher the right to punish at all? An unjustifiable assault had been committed, for which the teacher ought to have been brought to account. He might be told that the parents might institute proceedings; but, if they were too poor to pay a shilling, then they were too poor to take legal proceedings; and it was the duty of the Government to protect all their subjects, even the very poorest of them. That he took to be one of the fundamental functions of a Government. He thought the Government had failed in this instance. However, he believed this discussion had done and would do good, because he hoped that it would never occur again. The Premier told them that if these things continued the House should step in. It appeared that the House had stepped in already. As to the assertion of the Minister of Education that there is no power of intervention by the Government in the matter of charging fees, that was the most extraordinary excuse he had ever heard about anything.

Mr. MILLS was sure the expression of opinion by the House that afternoon would have a very good effect, and would act as a warning to teachers and Committees throughout the country, and put a stop to the corporal punishment of girls, which could not be too much reprobated. It would also have the effect of causing the Minister of Education to give his attention to this question of pen-and-ink money. The aggregate amount collected in that way must be very large, and, in some cases, it was to be feared, the system was abused. He was perfectly certain that if the matter were investigated it would be found that the amount collected, instead of merely covering the outlay for school requisites, yielded in many cases a considerable revenue besides to the teachers. He would like to call the attention of the honourable gentleman to the hardship inflicted on parents of children attending school by the want of uniformity in school-books. He had heard complaints very generally expressed by parents that, as each child came on, fresh books had to be obtained for it. The books used by a child which had passed into a higher standard or left the school were very often useless to the younger children coming on afterwards, as meantime, through a change of teachers, or from some other cause, new books had been adopted. He thought there should be some uniform system of books throughout the public schools, as it would lead to a great saving to the parents of children attending school.

Sir J. VOGEL said honourable members had witnessed the spirit in which the honourable member at the head of the department had replied to him—it seemed almost impossible for the honourable gentleman to be commonly courteous to him. The honourable gentleman had described him as the champion of exaggeration, because he had spoken of the outrage being a brutal one, though the child had not been beaten within an inch of her life. That was the language used by persons who were in the habit of ill-treating women—they said a poor woman could be given black eyes, or anything of that kind, but, so long as her life was not endangered, the outrage was not a brutal one. He contended that, whether the caning had been done with great severity or not, the outrage was a brutal outrage, and against the right and justice to which the girl was entitled. This caning of the girl in the sight of her school-fellows because her mother had not a shilling to spare was an outrage. The honourable gentleman treated the case with levity, and brought in a worn-out old joke about "weal and woe;" but it was not a case at all for levity. It was true that the doctor had contradicted himself; but, as against the evidence which had been read by the honourable gentleman, he would read an extract from a letter written by Dr. Lewis at an earlier period:—

"Now, I happen to have seen this said Kate Sheard compelled to do the whole of the housework of the Sheard family, cooking, washing, and nursing, while the mother was confined to bed through illness. Suppose that on the afternoon of the caning—and I must say, judging by the results obtained, the lady pupil-teacher is no mean wielder of the rod—the whole of the household duties devolved on the said Kate Sheard, you must agree with me, Mr. Editor, that the housework would come very heavily on the child. Such work would be quite enough to set up inflammation in the palm and sheaths of the tendons, and result probably in a long illness and a stiff finger or two."

That was written by the doctor at an earlier period. The honourable gentleman considered a caning, which might give the child a stiff finger or two, or lay her up with illness, was not sufficiently severe to be called a brutal outrage. At any rate the fact remained that there was a statement by the doctor that if the poor girl had to do household work there would be a chance of her being laid up with illness, and of her having a stiff finger or two for life.

MR. FISHER.—What did he afterwards say when subject to the test of examination?

SIR J. VOGEL said Dr. Lewis appeared to believe in the discipline prescribed by King Solomon in the line, "Who hateth the child spareth the rod." But our modern practice and experience were quite averse from that teaching, and, however such a system might be necessary in a household like Solomon's, where there were hundreds of wives and a still larger number of children, it was not necessary in our time to pursue that treatment. The modern view was that stated by the Premier, and one which he hoped would have effect given to it—that was, to discourage corporal punishment in schools; and, above all, the punishment of girls in that way ought to be discouraged. In a warm climate like that of Auckland the period of puberty was reached exceedingly early, often as early as twelve years of age, and nothing could be more scandalous, or more calculated to encourage future vice, than to single out a girl for punishment before a large school: it was a scandal on our school-system. As regards this fee question, the Minister of Education had told them that he was charged the same on account of his children; but he could not have the same feelings for the honourable gentleman as he had for Mrs. Sheard, because in the one case it was not a hardship and in the other it was. He should have admired the honourable gentleman if he had said that, the matter having been represented to him, he would take measures to protect parents from having this charge made on them, and their children being punished when the charge could not be met on account of poverty. He thought this charge was illegal. It was an absurdity to boast of our system of "free" education if this charge was allowed to be levied upon the parents for the benefit of the schoolmasters, and if they were allowed to cane children who could not bring the money and did not bring what they might consider to be sufficient excuses, or to send the children from the school. The Minister of Education asked what he (Sir J. Vogel) wanted the Government to do. He thought the Government should prevent such charges being made on parents. Whatever the cost might be the House should provide the necessary means for the supply of school materials, and not allow the masters to obtain these shillings from children. Three shillings a year per child was a large payment, and, though he did not know if, as stated, some schoolmasters made a profit out of it, the charge should not be allowed. We boasted that our system of education was free, but that boast was an empty one if fees were allowed to be charged by a sidewind: it would be better to charge direct fees at once than to allow that. He fully agreed with the Premier that where the discipline of a school could not be maintained without corporal punishment it showed that the teachers were inefficient. It was not by punishments of that kind that teachers of schools, no matter what their size, should maintain their power. Within the memory of the living generation the University College School of London had been established on the principle that under no consideration whatever should the masters be allowed to corporally punish the scholars; and on that system the school had been a huge success, and now was attended, he believed, by over one thousand boys. This proved that even in regard to boys it was not necessary to administer corporal punishment in schools. In the great public schools of England, where corporal punishment had not yet altogether ceased, such punishment was now very rarely administered, and he thought it was a stain upon our boasted system of education that such punishment should be allowed to be administered, at any rate to girls, in the public schools of this colony. As to the decision of the Committee, it was not a unanimous decision, as two members voted one way, four the other, and one gentleman abstained from voting. Now, what he said was this: that the Government should set at rest this question as to the legality of levying this three shillings a year as fees for stationery, and should ask the House to provide the necessary means so that such charges on the parents should not be necessary. If that were not done we could no longer call our system of education a free one. Then, he said there should be a power to prevent the administration of corporal punishment, and especially to girls, in the public schools of the colony. He could not help thinking that the time which had been devoted to discussing this question had not been wasted. He had no power to force the Government in the matter, but he should see that Mrs. Sheard did not want for the means of instituting a prosecution should she desire to do so.

Motion for adjournment negatived.

WELLINGTON COLLEGE AND GIRLS' HIGH SCHOOL BILLS.

Mr. KERR asked the Minister of Education, Whether the Wellington Girls' High School and the Wellington College and Girls' High School Bills are Government Bills, or whether they are introduced by him in his capacity as a private member of this House?

Mr. FISHER said there was only one Wellington College Bill on the Order Paper, and that and the Auckland Girls' High School Amendment Bill were introduced to carry out an undertaking given by his predecessor in office to pass these Bills in order to give certain powers to these bodies to prevent their making a charge for building purposes on the Consolidated Fund. That was the object for which the Bills were introduced; and they were introduced by him in his capacity as Minister of Education.

RECIPROCITY WITH AUSTRALIA.

Mr. RHODES asked the Premier, Whether, if he attends the Postal Congress in Melbourne, he will, in connection with the proposed revision of the tariff, endeavour to make some arrangement with the Governments of the Australian Colonies by which the duties on our farmers' produce might be reduced, or, at any rate, a pledge made that they shall not be increased; we on our side making some concession in our tariff which will suit the Australian Governments? As it seemed certain there would be a revision of the tariff next session, he hoped the Premier would be able to do something in the direction that the question indicated, for the benefit of the farmers of this country.

Major ATKINSON was afraid the Government would not be able to send a Minister to the Postal Conference to represent this colony: he did not think the public business would admit of it. But the Government would use every opportunity to move in the direction the honourable gentleman indicated.

CHATELS SECURITIES ACTS.

Mr. RHODES asked the Premier, Whether the Government will introduce a Bill next session to consolidate and simplify the Chattels Securities Acts, and include a simple form of security by providing a schedule of implied covenants, powers, &c.? He asked this question because anything that would tend to cheapen the cost of drawing these securities would tend to cheapen the rate of interest.

Major ATKINSON said the Government had such a Bill under consideration; and if they could not deal with the matter this session they would do so next session.

LAND TRANSFER ACT.

Mr. RHODES asked the Minister of Lands, Whether there are any survey difficulties in the way of bringing all land under the Land Transfer Act by compulsory legislation?

Major ATKINSON was sorry to say that there were considerable difficulties in the way.

GREYMOUTH HARBOUR.

Dr. NEWMAN asked the Government,—(1.) If they are aware that £9,500 out of the proceeds of loan guaranteed by the Government for the improvement of the Greymouth Harbour has been devoted by the Harbour Board to the purchase of a tug? (2.) If they will cause an inquiry to be made into the circumstances of the purchase? He understood that £9,500 was paid away for the purchase of a tug, though he believed that it was possible to get a more efficient and useful boat for less money, and that the expenditure was quite unwarranted.

Mr. FISHER said it was true that the Greymouth Harbour Board had spent £9,500 in the purchase of a tug, but he understood it was not charged against loan expenditure. He would make further inquiry into the matter, and would furnish the honourable gentleman with full information if he would call at his office.

Mr. GUINNESS might suggest that the honourable gentleman should postpone answering questions if he had not the necessary information. The information he had given was all wrong.

Mr. FISHER asked, in what way?

Mr. GUINNESS said that not a shilling had been paid. The Board dared not pay the money out of loan, for if they did it would be surcharged against the members of the Board.

Mr. FISHER did not wish to speak with great particularity. He understood that £5,000 of the purchase-money had been paid, and that the balance was standing over.

Mr. MILLS thought the explanation given by the honourable member for Greymouth was slightly misleading. The mere fact of whether the tug had been paid for did not affect the question.

EDUCATION BOARDS.

Dr. NEWMAN asked the Minister of Education, If he intends this session to bring in a Bill to amalgamate the Education Boards, with the object of reducing the cost of education in the colony? Seeing that there were such frequent means of communication between various parts of the colony, it seemed to him that so many Boards were unnecessary, and that it would be advisable for the Minister of Education to introduce a Bill to amalgamate the smaller districts.

Mr. FISHER replied that it was not the intention of the Government to introduce such a Bill this session, but next session a Bill might be introduced to effect certain reforms which the Government considered advisable, and it would probably contain a clause going in this direction. He thought the Act of 1882 went too far in creating so many education districts, and, if amendments were made, that suggested by the honourable gentleman would probably be one of them.

PUBLIC LIBRARIES.

Mr. SMITH asked the Government, If they will place a sum of money on the estimates to be used for the purpose of granting subsidies to public libraries? He had received several communications asking if the usual subsidies were to be granted, and, as the subsidies had conferred great advantage on the smaller libraries, he hoped that a vote of the kind would be taken this year.

Major ATKINSON was sorry to say that the Government did not propose, this year, considering the present state of the revenue, to put a vote on the estimates for this purpose. They thought that this was one of those things for which the people might put their hands into their pockets.

TAX ON BONDHOLDERS.

Sir G. GREY asked the Government, What is the contract under which they are bound not to levy any tax upon holders of New Zealand bonds who do not reside in the colony, or who, residing within the colony, keep their bonds outside the colony, whilst those bondholders who reside in the colony, and retain their bonds within the colony, are compelled to pay the tax?

Major ATKINSON said the honourable gentleman appeared to be under some misapprehension. There was no such contract affecting persons holding bonds, whether they resided in the colony or out of the colony. The whole difficulty, so far as he understood what the honourable gentleman pointed to, was this: If a person held bonds the principal and interest of which were payable at the Treasury or at the Bank of New Zealand in the colony, they would be liable to taxation wherever he lived. If a person held bonds the principal and interest of which were payable in London, and if he resided in New Zealand or in London, he would not be taxable for that. But if a person resided in New Zealand, and held bonds in New Zealand payable in New Zealand, he was liable to taxation. The whole difficulty, as he understood the honourable gentleman's request for explanation, arose from the fact that in one case the colony had jurisdiction over the money after it had been paid, and that in the other case it had not. If the colony made a payment of £5 interest to a bondholder holding a £100-bond payable at the Treasury or at the Bank of New Zealand in the colony, that money was within the jurisdiction or authority of the colony, and therefore the colony could demand taxation in respect of that money. But with regard to the English bondholder the case was different. The colony had made an undertaking to lodge on a particular date a particular sum of money in London to meet the demands of the bondholder, and when it had so lodged this money it lost all power over it. It could not tax it, therefore, because before the bargain was completed the money was beyond the jurisdiction of the colony. That was the difficulty. The only way in which the colony could get at the bondholders would be by reducing the interest which the colony had agreed to pay them, and, if the colony did that, his belief was that the bondholders could proceed against the colony in the English Courts, and recover whatever was paid short.

Sir G. GREY said that really was not an answer to his question.

Major ATKINSON said, if the honourable gentleman could explain in what way it was no answer, he should be pleased to reply further, if he could.

Sir G. GREY said the honourable gentleman had not explained what contract compelled the colony to pay a certain amount in London.

Major ATKINSON said the Loan Acts compelled the colony to do that. The Loan Acts authorised the Government to borrow money, and authorised the Governor in Council to fix the place at which the principal and interest were made payable. That was fixed before the loan was floated. So that the agreement with the lender of the money was that the principal and interest should be payable in London at some particular place. Most of the interest was made payable at the Bank of New Zealand, some at the offices of the Crown Agents. It was agreed to pay that money at those places at certain times. Usually the interest was paid half-yearly, at a fixed rate, according to the length of time the loan had to run. The agreement was to have the money there to pay the interest due. That was the contract.

Sir G. GREY submitted that that was not the contract. It was still no answer.

Major ATKINSON would be glad to know what the honourable gentleman did want.

Sir G. GREY said loans were raised on the security of the taxes paid by the people—the Consolidated Fund—and the agreement was to pay a certain sum to be remitted to England. The money was taken from the Consolidated Fund, and paid to the Treasurer to be remitted to England, and the moment the money was paid into the Treasury for that purpose it was property within the colony, which was taxable. The taxation could be deducted in the colony from the amount paid; and it ought to be so deducted. It was what other States which owed money to the English bondholder now did, and there was no difficulty in the way. It was done in the case of loans raised by foreign nations in London exactly as we did—nations that paid their interest in London exactly as we did. That the bondholders who lived outside the colony should be in exactly the same position as to taxation as those who lived in the colony was a perfectly fair transaction. The only thing that could be considered unfair would be to tax people who held the bonds out of the colony and not to tax those who lived in the colony; but to tax those who lived in the colony and not those who lived out of the colony was equally unfair. What he proposed was quite fair and proper, and he believed that if the honourable gentleman would take the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown on this subject he would find that he had been acting unlawfully for a long period of time, and that the people of this colony had paid taxes in excess of what they ought to have paid, inasmuch as it was the bounden duty of the Government to have deducted the taxation from the money paid to all bondholders.

Major ATKINSON said that the honourable gentleman was clearly under a misapprehension of a grave nature. The money was not paid over to anybody in the colony except to be remitted to the Agents of the Government in London. It was the colony's money while it was going Home, and if it were lost the colony would have to send Home fresh money to take its place. Of course, if the money was paid away in the colony, as the honourable gentleman seemed to think, then clearly the Government would have a right to tax it. But it was not. It remained the money of the colony while it was going Home, and until the person to whom it was due went to the offices to draw it.

Mr. GUINNESS.—Who pays exchange?

Major ATKINSON said the colony did. And when the money arrived in London the colony lost its power over it for taxation purposes. The bondholder went to the office and said, "Here is your Order in Council in which you say that on production of my coupon you will pay me £5. Here is the coupon. Pay me my money." It was of no use for the colony to say that there was so much taxation to pay. There could be no reduction. The honourable gentleman had asserted many times that this was the custom of other countries; but he (Major Atkinson) knew of no country in which it was the custom, and he should be very happy if the honourable gentleman could show him any without at the same time also showing that the loans had been issued subject to taxation. It was possible that loans had been issued subject to taxation, but, if so, that was not a case in point. He did not think that the honourable gentleman could show a case in which loans had been issued unaccompanied with that condition and that then they had been made subject to taxation. It meant paying less than had been agreed to be paid. Turkey had done that, he was aware, and the practice was known as repudiation. Turkey did not pay any interest sometimes, and at other times only 2 per cent., when 4 per cent. was agreed to be paid. Spain had also done something of the same sort, and so had Pennsylvania and some of the other States, and the House knew what trouble there had been in consequence. With us, however, the question was, whether we could levy a tax upon the interest we paid, and, as the money had to be paid in a country to which the colony's jurisdiction in the matter of taxation did not extend, we could not do it.

Sir G. GREY wished to point out that Austria had done it.

Major ATKINSON said that Austria had tried to do it, but gave the attempt up.

Sir G. GREY said that Austria had done it, and still did it. Italy had done it, and still did it. Russia had done it, and still did it. He hoped the honourable gentleman would take a legal opinion on the subject. If he did he would find that he needed an Act of indemnity to justify him in what he was doing.

Major ATKINSON.—I will, Sir, take a legal opinion.

Mr. FISH.—Will the honourable gentleman supply it to the House?

NATIVE LANDS.

Mr. LAWRY asked the Native Minister,—(1.) If the Government will use every effort this session to complete the titles of those persons who have legitimate claims to Native lands? (2.) Are the Government aware that, in consequence of the present insecurity of those persons whose claims to Native lands are believed to be indisputable, settlement of such land is retarded, and also that those who have large sums of money available for the purpose of improving those lands are afraid to use such money for the purpose indicated? In asking this important question, he desired briefly to say that he had not consulted the Government or any individual in the matter, but had brought the question before the House entirely on his own responsibility. Perhaps in so doing he had acted somewhat indiscreetly, but he thought the question was of sufficient importance to commend itself to the earnest consideration of the Government and of the House, and he hoped the Government would deal with it upon its merits. He desired further to say that for a number of years he had been looked upon in the North Island as an invincible opponent of land-monopoly. He had declared that the Government of the day had made a great mistake when they withdrew their pre-emptive right to purchase Native lands; but, when they had done so and allowed private individuals to purchase Native lands, he thought it became the duty of the Government to ratify every purchase made under the altered law. In the interests of settlement, and in the interests of the Government, he hoped to receive a favourable reply to the question. He might state that he had had some communications, since the notice had been placed on the Order Paper, with honourable members who were more directly interested in the question than he was,—the honourable members for New Plymouth and Taranaki, and some others,—and they agreed that it was the imperative duty of the Government to deal with this matter promptly and effectually, and to endeavour to render to persons who had invested large sums in Native lands such assistance that they could proceed with confidence in placing settlement on these lands.

Major ATKINSON replied that the Government proposed to bring down a Bill to get over the difficulty that the decision of the Supreme Court had made with regard to the Native Lands Administration Act of last session, and he hoped this would enable purchasers to complete their titles. With regard to the second question, he might say at once, generally, that the Government would do what it could, but if the titles were indisputable there would be no necessity whatever to interfere. The whole difficulty arose from the fact that the titles were being disputed, and very effectually disputed. However, generally the Government had entire sympathy with the spirit of the question, and intended to do what they could during the present session to give effect to it.

SOUTH ISLAND NATIVE LAND PURCHASES.

On the motion of Mr. PARATA, it was ordered, That there be laid before the House the report of Mr. Commissioner Mackay upon the South Island Native land purchases.

TONGARIRO NATIONAL PARK.

On the motion of Mr. GRAHAM, it was ordered, That there be laid before the House a return, with tracing attached, showing the acreage now owned by Government, as freehold or otherwise, in Tongariro National Park; what it has cost from first to last; and if there be any conditions, and, if so, what, attached to the land now said to belong to the Government.

ADMINISTRATION BILL.

Mr. HISLOP, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said the object of the Bill was twofold. The 2nd section dealt with a matter which had been brought before Parliament on account of a case heard in Christchurch. The executor or administrator of an estate had, up to the present time, a right of priority over other creditors to retain money which might come into his hands in liquidation of a debt due to him. He believed it was intended by the last Administration Act to do away with this right; but it had been held, in the case referred to, that that right still existed. He thought this amendment of the law would probably recommend itself to the House, and therefore he did not intend to say anything further on that part of the Bill. The other part of the Bill introduced somewhat of an innovation in regard to the principle and practice of the Courts with respect to the administration of estates. He had to admit, in bringing forward this Bill, that there had scarcely been time for full consideration of the subject, and he had not been able to introduce a complete system of practice with regard to the matters dealt with. Full powers had therefore been taken under the 13th clause to further provide the system it was intended to inaugurate, by means of the Governor in Council making rules. At the present time, if an estate was not sufficient to pay twenty shillings in the pound it was necessary for the creditors to institute an administration suit, and that was so expensive a process that it was almost useless to revert to it unless the estate was of considerable size. Under this Bill it was proposed to give power to the executor or administrator to file a declaration in the Court, stating he was unable to pay the creditors twenty shillings in the pound. A right was also given to any creditor in such case to petition to have the estate administered under the bankruptcy rules, and for this purpose to have an order made under the Bill. If either of these courses were pursued, the Court had power to grant an order declaring that the estate should be administered by the executor or administrator as if the matter were in bankruptcy. The estate was then to be sold and distributed according to the rules in bankruptcy. The same priorities as were given under the Bankruptcy Act would hold, and the estate would finally be distributed under rules to be made by the Governor in Council. There were two matters in which the Bill was at present deficient, and in Committee he would amend it. He thought that power should be given to remove the proceedings from one Court to another, and also that there should be power to appoint new trustees instead of the executor and administrator, if necessary. With these alterations he thought the Bill would be very workable, and would be a great improvement on the system at present in vogue. At the same time he admitted, as he had said before, that it was an innovation, inasmuch as it converted the proceedings under the probate law into proceedings under the bankruptcy law; but, as the proceedings in probate and in bankruptcy were administered by the same Judge, he did not think that was an objection which should have much weight with the House. The House might not be aware that somewhat similar provisions with regard to actions by creditors were in the Act at Home, except that the Commissioner in Bankruptcy administered the estate. There were many cases where it would be presumed that the administration of the estate should be left in the hands of the executor or administrator, who were presumed to have the greatest interest in administering it well, and therefore it would be more advantageous that the executor or administrator should administer it than the Official Assignee in Bankruptcy. With the amendment he proposed, it would rest with the Court, on proper affidavits being filed, to say with whom the administration should rest. He would not pursue the subject further; but, if any great objections were made which could not be overcome, he would be willing to let the matter stand over till next session, when it could receive more consideration by the Bar generally. He would, however, ask the House to pass the 2nd section.

Mr. SAMUEL agreed with the Colonial Secretary that this was a very important measure, and that it did introduce an innovation in practice. He agreed also that section 2 was very necessary; but he would point out that, as it was at present framed, it would have retrospective action. It should be made to apply only to estates of persons who died after the Act came into force, and he would therefore propose in Committee an amendment to that effect. With regard to the rest of the Bill, he confessed that, at first sight, he was rather disappointed to find that it did not follow the lines of the English Act, which really made the law of bankruptcy apply to estates of deceased persons proved to be insolvent; but, on further consideration, it appeared to him that there might be good reasons for not adopting those lines, seeing that the bankruptcy law dealt necessarily with honest and dishonest bankrupts, and imposed penalties on conduct not in accordance with proper commercial rules. Therefore the provisions with regard to bankruptcy might perhaps not properly apply in the case of a person who died before the administration of his estate took place. Moreover, a great deal might be said in respect to the very cumbrous machinery necessary in the case of administration in bankruptcy by the Official Assignee of the estate of a person who had died under those circumstances. Again, as pointed out, it was very desirable that the person nominated by the testator should be administrator, and not the Official Assignee. The clauses in the Bill, with the exception of the 2nd, seemed to him to be rather involved, and would require some amplification in Committee. For instance, the 6th section stated,—

“Any creditor or creditors of a deceased debtor, whose debt or debts would have been sufficient to support a bankruptcy petition against such debtor had he been alive, may, at the prescribed time and in the prescribed form, present to the Court a petition praying for an order for the administration of the estate of the deceased debtor according to the law of bankruptcy.”

That seemed to imply that, upon the order being granted, the whole of the law of bankruptcy would apply to the estate; and other parts of the Bill appeared to bear the same interpretation, as, for example, clause 12, which said,—

“Every Court shall have all such jurisdiction and authority as may be necessary to give effect to this Act and any rules made thereunder, and shall have full power to decide all questions of priorities, and all other questions whatsoever, whether of law or fact, which may arise in any case coming within the cognisance of the Court, or which the Court may deem it expedient or necessary to decide for the purpose of doing complete justice or making a complete distribution of property in any case coming within the scope of this Act; and an appeal shall lie from the order or decree of any such Court in like manner as the same would lie from any order or decree made in any matter within the ordinary jurisdiction of such Court.”

But he gathered from the Colonial Secretary that it was intended only to apply the same mode of procedure, and not to deal with the estate as if it were in bankruptcy. It would therefore be desirable that clause 6 should be amplified so as to show exactly the number of creditors, and the value of the debts they represented, without reference to the Bankruptcy Act. Also, clauses 11 and 12 would have to be altered in a similar manner to show the principle by which the Court should be guided in exercising the powers conferred on it by this Bill. There was one part of the 11th section which would be required to be altered—namely, that relating to the distribution of the surplus. If there was a will, the surplus should be distributed as provided by the will, and not as specified in the section. Facilities should be given to carry out the wishes of the testator, as shown by his will. Subject to these remarks, he agreed that this would be a very useful measure; and, considering the difficulty of the question with which it dealt, it was sufficiently clearly expressed to be a valuable addition to the Statute Book.

Mr. IZARD hoped the Colonial Secretary would press this measure through this session, and not postpone any portion of it. There were two special cases in which amendment in the present law was to be made—namely, the right of the executor to retain his own debt out of the funds, and the administration of the estate in a cheaper way. The right which the executor had under the present law to retain the funds of the estate was a great anomaly. It arose, no doubt, under the old notion that the executor must be protected because some other creditor might prove his debt against the estate, and might gain thereby some priority by his diligence, and, getting judgment against the estate, by that means sweep up all the assets. But, inasmuch as estates were administered by direction of the Supreme Court, the reason for that no longer existed, and the injustice of allowing one creditor, merely because he was appointed executor, to sweep up the estate, to the detriment of the other creditors, was very great. Cases had occurred where one creditor, through being appointed executor, had been able to appropriate the whole of the assets to himself and leave the rest of the creditors in the cold shade. Therefore this was a great improvement. The other portions of the Bill proposed to deal with the administration of the estates of persons who died insolvent, and provided a better and cheaper procedure for the purpose. At the present time the costly process pursued in the Supreme Court must be gone through before the estate could be administered. This Bill proposed that the practical result, without the formality of the Supreme Court process, should be obtained in a cheap way. There was a point he should like to call the attention of the House to in regard to this part of the Bill. He thought there was a little ambiguity with regard to section 6. He could not quite make out what was intended by this section, which said,—

“Any creditor or creditors of a deceased debtor, whose debt or debts would have been sufficient to support a bankruptcy petition against such debtor had he been alive, may, at the prescribed time and in the prescribed form, present to the Court a petition praying for an order for the administration of the estate of the

Two observations arose on this point. First of all, he saw no reason why it should be limited to persons whose debt would have been sufficient to support a bankruptcy petition. He failed to see any just reason for making the distinction here set up. Another point he would ask the Colonial Secretary to consider was as to what was exactly meant by saying that the estate should be administered according to the law of bankruptcy. Now, there was a difference in the administration as to the assets. In the Court of Bankruptcy the Court could go into questions of voluntary settlements, preferential payments, and matters of that sort. Ordinarily, in the administration of the Supreme Court, these questions were not gone into. He should like to know whether there was included in this Bill a power for the Judge to whose Court the case might be attached to go into questions of voluntary settlements and preferential payments. It might be that was the case; but, if it was, it should be expressed in plainer and clearer language. In cases before the Court of Bankruptcy these questions were gone into, evidence was taken, and the matters were decided on their merits. If they were to have this amended procedure, and it was to be applied under this measure, he thought it only right that it should be clear what the Legislature intended should be done in the matter. Under subsection (7) of clause 18, power was given by such rules to adopt, in whole or in part, the practice and procedure of the Supreme Court, or of any Superior Court of Bankruptcy, whether given under statute or rules, for all or any of the purposes of this Act. But he thought the Colonial Secretary would agree with him that mere reference to the procedure of the Supreme Court was not sufficient to give the Supreme Court jurisdiction in the case he had mentioned. He should support the Bill with very great pleasure, and hoped the Government would press it on, and not be satisfied with merely reading it a second time, but would bring it to a successful issue during the present session.

Mr. W. D. STEWART said they were now considering a revised edition of the Administration Bill. He did not exactly know what the first revision was like, but the second edition required considerable improvement. The Colonial Secretary had stated that this was an innovation. He (Mr. Stewart) did not object to an innovation so long as it was an improvement; but there were objections to this Bill, which tended to confuse the present state of things. The general purport of this Bill was of a very desirable character; but it was one of those hand-to-mouth pieces of legislation which did a great deal of mischief unless very carefully guarded. For example, there was one very important branch of the law relating to the administration of estates, which was the right of preference that the executor had—the right of paying one creditor in preference to another. That was a power which was more frequently abused than the right of retainer. At present an executor could not only retain to meet his own claim, but if he had a thousand pounds' worth of assets, and there were creditors to the amount of £1,500, he could select any two of the creditors and pay the £1,000 among them, leaving the third to go unpaid. He thought that was a state of the law that required more pressingly an amendment than did the right of retainer by an executor. These were questions which had received consideration in England during the last quarter of a century to a very large extent; and he should have liked the House to be able to devote itself to the consolidation of those important alterations that had been made in the English law during the last quarter of a century and were not in force in this colony. Here they were adopting the improvements made at Home piecemeal. He should like to see a comprehensive and well-considered measure carried which would place them on the same level as the English Courts were on. He found also that in the State of New York certain modifications had been made of the common-law of England which were of a somewhat important character, and he ventured to say that this House would ultimately adopt these modifications to a partial extent. This question did not arise on the present Bill, but he referred to them as indicating the necessity for an exhaustive and comprehensive measure on this important and very delicate branch of the law. The large question which arose under section 2 of this Bill was this: It said that an executor should not have the right of retainer. Was it intended that the executor of an executor should be deprived of his right of retainer? He had a right of retainer equal to that of the executor. He thought the Colonial Secretary should direct his attention to that other suggestion he (Mr. Stewart) had made as to depriving an executor of the power of preferring one creditor to another. He might do this before he was made a bankrupt, and do it quite legally. The other questions which might receive consideration were, whether the period which an executor had to distribute assets should not be limited in some way. There was no doubt whatever that in many instances it was quite unnecessary. If he distributed the assets before that time he ran certain risks. The other question was, whether section 2 was to apply to an executor de son tort, an executor of his own wrong, because such an executor did incur liabilities which he might get rid of by this Act. The Colonial Secretary said he did not think so. He (Mr. Stewart) did not know that that settled the question. An executor of that sort had no right of retainer, but had certain liabilities which an ordinary executor had not, by intermeddling unnecessarily with an estate before he was constituted executor. It would be advisable to know what the position of such a person was under this Bill. Coming to the second branch of the Bill, namely, the administration of estates as in bankruptcy, the first point he should like to direct attention to was this: that it was a very vicious thing to legislate by rules. He submitted that the proper course was to incorporate in the Acts all the substantive provisions of any proposed alterations of the law. He quite agreed that such rules were necessary; but a great many things which were proposed to be done by rules ought to be done by the Act itself. He had protested against legislation by rules framed by the Governor in Council. They were in many instances framed without proper consideration, and produced confusion and litigation. He thought it better that they should be incorporated in detail in the Act. The other consideration in the second branch of the Bill was this: Was the executor to administer an estate in bankruptcy, or was it to be administered by order of the Assignee in Bankruptcy? He thought that very important. The Colonial Secretary stated that he did not consider it a matter of very great importance, seeing that one Court had jurisdiction in both instances. That was not so. Unfortunately, the House made the mistake in 1883—and he knew he was supported by the opinion of one of the Judges—to constitute a Superior Court in Bankruptcy. The mischief of that was that that Court, being the creation of a statute, had none of those common-law privileges and rights which ordinarily a common-law Court had, and which were given it by the Act here. Therefore he thought it was important that the Bankruptcy Court should be not a Supreme Court, but a distinct and separate Court exercising independent jurisdiction. They knew that a Bankruptcy Court might be presided over by a District Judge as well as a Supreme Court Judge. He thought the Colonial Secretary ought to direct his attention to the probable confusion that would arise through the conflict of jurisdiction between the Supreme Court, which dealt with questions of probate, and a Bankruptcy Court, which dealt with questions of pure bankruptcy. He thought also it was very desirable that, instead of an insolvent estate being administered by the executor, it should be administered by the Official Assignee in Bankruptcy. The honourable gentleman had told them he would introduce a clause giving the Judge power to order that a bankrupt estate of a deceased person should be administered by the Official Assignee. He thought that was desirable, because, if an executor was able to show that the estate was hopelessly insolvent, it would be very unfair to cast on him the burden of administering it in bankruptcy under a law with which he would not be familiar; as it was to be hoped executors would not be persons familiar with the bankruptcy law. The Official Assignee was intimately acquainted with every point of that law and its administration, and would therefore be able to avoid the pitfalls which a private person, even with the assistance of a solicitor, would not be always able to escape. Now, he thought, further, that an executor should have the right, as soon as an order in bankruptcy was made, to retire from the estate altogether and get relieved. It should not be at the option of the Court to relieve him or not; but, when insolvency had been declared, he should be free to retire on his own motion, and allow the estate to be administered by the Official Assignee. That provision should be made clear. All provisions relating to the administration of the insolvent estates of deceased persons could more properly be included with the Bankruptcy Act as in England. Why such provisions should be incorporated in the Administration Act did not seem clear. He thought the bankruptcy law, and all provisions relating to insolvency, should be kept quite distinct from other statutes. There was also this point, which was worthy of consideration: If an executor filed a declaration, quod executor, that an estate was insolvent, it might cause some misconception, and in the newspapers it would probably be merely stated that Mr. So-and-so had filed a declaration of insolvency; and many persons would not understand that he had done so in his representative or fiduciary capacity, but would think it was a case of his own personal insolvency. He doubted very much the expediency of calling such declarations filing at all. He thought it would be much better done simply by a petition setting forth the grounds on which the intervention of the Court was asked, and the Judge should, on that statement of facts, decide whether the estate should be administered in bankruptcy or not. A simple petition, followed by an order declaring the estate to be bankrupt, and that it should be wound up as such, would be all that would be required. He did not know whether it was intended in the second branch of this Bill to deal with the question of bills of sale as it arose in bankruptcy—that was to say, where a bill of sale had been given for proper consideration and so forth. And there was also the question of fraudulent preference. A number of these important questions were constantly arising under the Bankruptcy Act—for instance, the question of the landlord's right to distrain and his right to preferential payment. The law on these points should be made so emphatic and so clear that any one reading the Act would understand what the law on the subject was. There was, further, the question of the Sheriff holding money for a certain time, and it should be made clear as to whether that was to apply to the estate of a deceased person to be administered in bankruptcy. Another matter that he should like to refer to was this: It was often found that a testator had taken leases of property involving the payment of rent for a number of years, and it had always been a subject of difficulty how to get rid of such liabilities in order to wind up the estate, because it was a continuing liability. In the English Act there was a certain mode provided for dealing with such cases; but the subject was more complicated in New Zealand. It seemed to be undesirable that an executor should be unable to distribute an estate on account of such continuous and recurring liabilities under covenants and agreements made by the testator, which, of course, also bound his executors. There were a number of other questions which required consideration, but, as the honourable gentleman had very properly said, it would be impossible to deal with all of them this session. To show the complicated and difficult nature of these questions he might mention that a case had recently occurred in Dunedin in which a person died a bankrupt who, before death, had given an agreement to execute a bill of sale over, practically, all the available assets, and it was held that the estate could not be made bankrupt; and the person who held the agreement got paid in full, while the other creditors had not yet been paid in full, and were never likely to be. That was a case which had actually occurred, and for that reason he thought it was most necessary that there should be power to administer the estates of deceased persons in bankruptcy. The concluding words of clause 11 were, "Such surplus shall be distributed under the law in force relating to the distribution of the assets of deceased persons." It seemed to him that that would put every estate in the position of an intestate estate, quite irrespective of the character of the will. Now, while it was desirable that the debts of the deceased should be paid, it was not desirable that the legatees should be robbed; and he thought there should be such a provision as would insure all the debts and legacies being equally paid as far as the estate would go. The question was an extremely important and very difficult one, and he could quite appreciate the sense of responsibility the honourable gentleman felt in attempting to deal with subjects of so much difficulty. That amendments were required in the present law all who knew anything of the subject could not but readily admit, and the few suggestions he had made had been made simply with a view of making this measure somewhat more perfect than it was now.

Mr. HISLOP was very thankful to the honourable member for Wellington South and Suburbs, the honourable member for New Plymouth, and the honourable member for Dunedin West for the suggestions they had made, which had great force in them, and he was obliged to all the honourable gentlemen for the spirit in which they had made their suggestions. It was impossible, of course, in a measure of this sort, at once to remove all the difficulties which had arisen; the matter required to be dealt with very carefully and deliberately to prevent the raising of greater difficulties than were removed. The Bill as it stood was a matter of evolution; it began with one clause, as honourable members knew, and had been gradually developed into the measure as it was before them. With regard to the last point touched upon by the honourable member for Dunedin West,—the construction of the last words of clause 11,—although he was willing to alter the words as the honourable gentleman suggested, he did not admit that the present words would have the effect the honourable gentleman stated, because the law as to distribution was laid down in clause 10 of the Administration Act of 1879. The two sections would be read together, and the estate distributed among the persons to whom it was left. As to the amendments suggested by the honourable gentleman, in reference to leases and so on, the intention of the Bill was certainly that fraudulent preferences should be prevented in the case of estates being administered in bankruptcy: if the words in clause 10 were not sufficiently full, he would have the clause redrafted, with a view to giving effect to what the honourable member for Dunedin West and the honourable member for Wellington South and Suburbs had indicated. He need not say more, and trusted the Bill would now be read a second time.

PARLIAMENTARY HONORARIUM AND PRIVILEGES BILL.

Major ATKINSON.—The object of this Bill is to give effect to what I believe to be the general wish of the country, looking at the statements of honourable gentlemen who have been elected to this House; and it is a Bill which will require very little explanation from me. But I may point out that the general scope of the Bill is this: It proposes to reduce the honorarium of members of this House from two hundred guineas to £150, and this amount is divided into two parts, £50 for general expenses and £100 for the particular expense of attending the sessions of the House. At present honourable members are allowed a hundred guineas for attending a second session in a year, and under this Bill it is proposed that they shall receive £100. With regard to the Legislative Council, it is proposed to reduce the honorarium paid to members of that body from two hundred guineas to £100, but those honourable members who reside within three miles of Parliament House are to receive nothing; those who reside beyond that radius are to receive £100 for a session, and £50 for attendance at a second session in the same year. These are the main provisions of the Bill, of which I now move the second reading.

Mr. FISH.—I shall not detain the House long in speaking upon this Bill, because I expressed my opinion on the subject during the financial debate. I am extremely sorry that the Government have thought it necessary to bring down this Bill, because I think it is striking a blow at democracy, from which it will not recover for a considerable length of time. When we consider the expenses which honourable members are put to, the cost of elections, and the numberless items of expense that they have to meet, not only during the session but also during the recess, I think that any fair-minded man will say that the sum at present paid is, if anything, too little—certainly not too much; and I think it must also be admitted that, if we reduce the honorarium of members of this House to the extent here proposed, the result will be that the legislation of the country will be restricted to the wealthy men of the country, and to them alone. If that is a desirable thing, this Bill is a step in the right direction; but, if it is not, then this Bill is against the interests of the people. The aim of the Government seems to be to abolish the payment of members altogether, because this Bill simply means merely reimbursing them, and hardly that, the expenses which they are out of pocket. I believe that if the country were polled on this question it would be found that the people generally are in favour of payment of members; and I believe also that, if the finances were in a better condition, the amount now paid should be increased to £300 per annum, and that the people of the country would, in such a case, uphold our decision to do that. I do not like the form of this Bill at all. I am surprised that the Premier should have brought down such a Bill, but I have no doubt he has felt impelled to do so owing to the fact that retrenchment has been asked for. We know that he has dealt with the question of Ministerial salaries in a somewhat drastic way; and upon that I shall have something to say on a future occasion, going in the same direction as I am going in connection with this Bill. Now, members of this House are to be paid £100, and an additional £50 for extra expenses. I do not like that at all. If the sum of £150 is thought sufficient, why not make the payment one sum of £150? And if £100 is considered sufficient honorarium for us, I think that the amount proposed to be paid to the members of the Council is too great a sum, and should be reduced to £50. If it is to be a mere matter of paying expenses, I think the sum to be paid to the Council should be reduced to £50, because they are, presumably, men of wealth, and have no election expenses, and none of the other expenses that members of this House have to pay. In fact, I will go further and say that, if £150 is considered sufficient for members of this House, then, relatively, the members of the Legislative Council should receive nothing, for neither their work nor their expenses are to be compared with ours. Sir, I feel so strongly upon this matter that I shall deem it my duty, in the interests of democracy and the people themselves, to oppose this Bill at every stage and in every form that I can. So far as I am concerned, I told my constituents that I should vote for the sum paid remaining at what it was during last Parliament; and I also told them that, if the finances of the country were in a better condition, I should decidedly advocate raising the sum to be paid to members of this House to £300; and I did not find at any of my meetings—and I represent an extremely democratic constituency—a single voice dissenting from that. I pointed out to the working-men that, if they desired to have men representing them who were somewhat in unison with their feelings, and had sympathy with their aspirations, and had also the ability and intelligence to represent those feelings and aspirations, they must pay the men they wished to represent them. I pointed out that, if they did not do that, the representation would fall almost entirely into the hands of the rich, and, as a necessary consequence, the legislation of the country would be in the direction of favouring the rich, and not in the direction of caring for the interests of the bulk of the community. To that there was one universal response of approval of the sentiments I expressed. Now, I have to say this, further, and I do so without any desire to be disrespectful to the members of this House: that those who will feel compelled to vote for this Bill, or many of them, will do so because in their election contests their opponents played this particular item of payment of members against them, and, in order not to be outdone, they felt compelled to say that they would vote for the reduction also. I am sure that in a majority of cases that will be the real reason why honourable members will vote for this, though their consciences will tell them that it is not in the interests of their constituents that this Bill should be passed. It may be said, and no doubt will be said, that any one who advocates the retention of the honorarium at the present rate does so simply to put the money in his pocket. That is absolute nonsense, and will not affect me or any man who has the courage of his convictions. The difference in the amounts is a mere nothing, and the question is not simply a question of to-day. Many of us may not see another Parliament, and we are advocating a liberal payment of members in the interests of the country and of those who may succeed us in the representation of the country. Therefore I feel sure that, whatever views we may express, we shall not be chargeable with any selfish or interested or sordid motives. I very sincerely hope that the House will not carry this Bill. It is not, I feel persuaded, the retrenchment that the country wants. No doubt the country may be desirous of decreasing the number of members; but I am perfectly certain that, were the constituencies polled to-morrow upon the question as to whether the payment should be £210 or £150, the response would be in favour of the higher sum. Therefore I hope that those who have not pledged themselves beyond hope of redemption in this matter will vote for the amendment which I have now to move. That this Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—I do not propose to take up any time in speaking to this measure. The honourable member who has just sat down has told the House that when before his constituents he expressed himself as opposed to a reduction of the honorarium, and that there was nothing but commendation of what he said when he told them that he should uphold the payment of members at the rate fixed by the Act now in force. I have simply to say that in my constituency the very reverse was the case, and that the proposal to reduce the members' honorarium was received with universal approval whenever it was advocated. I shall give my vote in favour of the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. WALKER.—I feel some difficulty in discussing this question to-night, because I think the Premier has brought it before us in the wrong way. In the first place, he has proposed to alter the Representation Bill; and I think, if he seriously wished this matter to be discussed, he should have brought that Bill down in the first place, because, to me, the most important question in the whole thing is how we are going to reduce the number of members in this House. I maintain that a reduction in the number of members would be a most vicious and retrograde step, and I should oppose it at every stage to the utmost of my ability. If this House consents to the reduction of the number of members to sixty or seventy or seventy-five, or whatever the honourable member proposes, I, for one, will not consent to reduce by one sixpence the honorarium, because the reduced number would effect a saving, and if they do their duty they will be worth the present honorarium to the country. On the other hand, I have pledged myself to my constituents that, under the present circumstances of the country, I should, in the same way as Ministers have sacrificed themselves on the altar of their country—in spite of the Act which gives £210 per annum to members—be content that 25 per cent. reduction should be made from that amount. Therefore I should have thought it better if the honourable member, instead of altering the whole of the present position, had brought down a suspensory Act, and given us a fair opportunity of showing the country that we were in earnest in our professions of economy, and that economy should be exercised from the highest to the lowest, from the Legislative and the Executive down to the lower stages in the social scale. Had the honourable member done that, I should have had no difficulty in supporting him; but, in the present position, unless the head of the Government will first bring down his Representation Bill, and tell us what he means to do as to the number of members, I feel absolutely unable to say what I shall do in this matter.

Major ATKINSON.—I will relieve the honourable gentleman at once. The Government propose to bring down a Bill—I do not know whether it is now distributed—in which the number of members will be reduced to seventy, including Native members.

Mr. WALKER.—That is satisfactory; but will he also give a pledge to carry the Representation Bill through first? I say the honourable gentleman is putting the cart before the horse. He ought to bring down his Bill and say what are the districts. Is he going to reduce the power of the democracy in both ways? I say he should not reduce the power of the democracy by putting power into the hands of the rich by enabling only rich men to stand for the greatly enlarged constituencies. That is the whole point. Reducing the number of members means putting the power into the hands of the rich. That is wrong. Where do we find our most promising members of Parliament at the present time? Why, among the members of the Young New Zealand party. I am not afraid of the laughter—I say that is so; and where would they have been at the last general elections if there had been larger districts?

An Hon. MEMBER.—At the head of the poll.

Mr. WALKER.—The honourable gentleman knows a good deal, but I think he claims to know too much sometimes. I am positive that this "move" in the direction of reducing the number of members is entirely in the direction of preventing young men coming forward. The honourable gentleman has got his triumph; I do not begrudge it to him; but I venture to say that if his constituency had been increased only one-third we should not have had the pleasure of his company here this session. I opposed the Bill that was carried into law last session, and did everything in my power to prevent—

Mr. FULTON.—Is the honourable gentleman discussing the Payment of Members Bill or the Representation Bill?

Mr. WALKER.—If the honourable gentleman is afraid of the question I am sorry for him.

Mr. FULTON.—Wasting time.

Mr. WALKER.—"Wasting time," Sir! What does the honourable gentleman mean? He is afraid of looking at it. He is one of those honourable gentlemen who acquire popularity at the hustings by saying they do not want money for serving Parliament. I wish simply to put the matter straight before the House and before the people, and I say it will be a bad day indeed for New Zealand if we go back from the principle of payment of members. That is the whole root of the matter. Under the present circumstances I am prepared to vote for a fair reduction; and I say that if the Premier had been honest and straight in this matter he would have been content to say to this Parliament, "You have been elected under peculiar circumstances, elected under pledges of strict economy, and you may do for yourselves what you like; you may sacrifice your honorarium; but do not touch the privileges of the people, do not touch the privileges of the future; let the Act remain on the Statute Book, preserving the rights of the people; but, as for ourselves, who have been elected just now, we will voluntarily abandon 25 per cent. of the honorarium." That would have been a patriotic and fair thing to propose to the House; but for the Premier to bring down a Bill proposing to alter for the future this which is the fundamental basis of democracy, I say, is a bad and a mischievous thing, and I cannot vote for the Bill in its present form, unless the Premier will give an absolute pledge that he will first introduce and carry his Representation Bill. I do not think he will get this House to consent to the reduction of the number of members, and I sincerely hope he will not, because that is just as much a vicious attack on the principles of true representation as this. If he does carry that Bill, I will certainly not vote for the reduction of the honorarium; but if the Bill goes through with the number of members as it is at present, I pledge him to vote for his present proposal. That, I think, is a fair way of putting the question, and that is looking at it from a self-sacrificing and patriotic point of view, and a view which, I consider, will carry out to the full my pledges to my constituents and my duty to the country.

Mr. SAMUEL.—I agree with almost every word that has fallen from the honourable member for Ashburton. I consider that the Bill which we have been told by the Premier will shortly be introduced is intimately connected with this one; and I have been put into some difficulty by the announcement he has made. I am one of those who hold that the present honorarium is not one pound too much for the services which are rendered by members of this House, and I do believe that the country generally holds the same opinion. But, notwithstanding that, I was prepared to vote for this Bill for one reason and for one reason alone, and that is that we have proposed to retrench all branches of the Service, and I consider that we ought to set a good example ourselves. That is the only reason for which I am prepared to vote for this Bill. But, when it is proposed to cut down the number of members of this House so considerably, the answer at once is, that that will effect the reduction to an equal amount without cutting down the honorarium. The question then arises, Which is the more detrimental to the interests of the country—for I do believe that both things are detrimental—which is the more detrimental, to reduce the number of members or to reduce the honorarium? In my opinion, it is less detrimental to reduce the honorarium than the number of members, not only for those reasons which have been so well stated by the honourable member for Ashburton, but for another and, to my mind, equally forcible one. From one end of the colony to the other we have now increased taxation; we have the certainty of a very large increase in the local taxation in the future; gradually upon local bodies throughout the colony greater burdens are being cast, with the view of relieving the General Government from the odium cast upon it by the necessity of increasing general taxation; and the one solace that is left to the ratepayer of the colony is that he sends a representative here to represent his wants and his wishes; and that will be in many instances virtually taken away by so large a reduction in the number of members as is proposed. There are many parts of New Zealand, that have come to look upon themselves as returning a member to Parliament, that would be virtually disfranchised by such a reduction; and I consider that from one end of the colony to the other there would be nothing but dissatisfaction, and well-grounded dissatisfaction, if the numbers were so largely reduced. I have no expectation that the Government will be able to carry the Bill reducing the number of members, otherwise I should vote against this Bill without the slightest hesitation. As I said before, there is nothing that makes me vote for the Bill but a sense of fairness, that we, who cut down the salaries, in so many cases, of poorly-paid clerks and labourers, should not cut them down unless we are prepared to act in the same way with our honorarium. When we cut those salaries down we do not say that they are too high for the services rendered: we simply say that the colony cannot afford to pay so high a rate of wages. And with regard to ourselves we should say the same thing—not that our services are not worth the amount we receive, but that the colony cannot afford to pay us so large a sum. But when we propose also to cut down the number of representatives, that becomes not a sufficient answer. I hope this Bill will be carried, because it will to some extent console those who are being reduced almost to penury; those who are receiving for their labour in many cases scarcely sufficient to support themselves and their families; and I look upon it as a great thing that we should admit at once that we are prepared to cut down our own remuneration in the same way as we cut down theirs. But, when I say that, I hope that when the other Bill comes before the House it will meet with a prompt dismissal. I agree with what has been said about changing the form of the payment of members. It is now proposed to give £100, and £50 additional as expenses. I cannot see any reason for dividing the two sums. Why should it not now, instead of being, as formerly, two hundred guineas, be £150, and £100 in the case of a second session? I am aware that under our Standing Orders I am precluded from moving a motion now, as an amendment has been moved; but I think it would be well for the House and the Government that they should postpone the second reading of this Bill until Ministers have brought down the Representation Bill of which they have told us, so that many honourable members who are in the same position as the honourable member for Ashburton and myself may be able to give a free vote on this question, and not be placed in a false position by having one Bill introduced before we know what the other is.

Mr. MOSS.—It would be well, before we go any further, that we should consider what reductions are going to be made under this Bill. There is a large majority of this House—some sixty members—who are to receive a hundred guineas if this Bill do not pass; while those who have been recently elected for the first time will receive the full "honorarium," as it is called, though I heartily wish that term were got rid of. What, then, is the great sacrifice of which the honourable member who has just sat down, and other honourable members, have spoken in such high terms that we are going to make? Just £5 each.

Mr. SAMUEL.—But, then, next session the reduction will be £60.

Mr. MOSS.—Let us wait till next session. I shall not be at all astonished if we find another alteration made then. The fact remains, we receive a hundred guineas under the present Act, and we shall receive £100 if this Bill passes: that is to say, some sixty or seventy of us will present that enormous amount of self-sacrifice which is represented by the sum of £5 each. The new members will, of course, self-sacrifice a little more; and then next year we shall probably be raised again, if we are to judge by past experience. The members of the Upper House will draw half the honorarium this year if the present law remains in force—that is, a hundred guineas—and under this Bill they will draw £50. But, then, it must also be remembered that a great number of them have not attended at all this session, and they will receive no honorarium. When we talk of fifty members of the Council, it must not be forgotten that in every session there are a large number who do not come here at all, and they draw no honorarium. So that to speak of this reduction as a great self-sacrifice is using a wrong term. Our duty is to fix a fair and reasonable sum for the payment of members. If we think that members have been paid an excessive sum in the past, let us feel ashamed of ourselves that we took it and defrauded the country by taking sums to which we were not entitled. The Premier has told us that £1,750 was too much to give to the Premier—it really amounted to £2,000—and I quite agree with him, and have always held that it was too much; but Premiers have taken it in the past, although we have now rightly come to the conclusion that a less sum is sufficient. But will any one say for a moment that members have been paid too highly in the past?

Captain RUSSELL.—Yes.

Mr. MOSS.—The honourable gentleman objects to payment altogether, and therefore is sure to think that it has been too high. The honourable gentleman would perhaps like a property qualification, and I can quite understand an honourable gentleman holding those views objecting to the present payment of members as too large. I have no hesitation in giving my own views, delicate as the position undoubtedly must be. The question was brought up during the elections by my opponents, not by my friends, and it was pressed upon me very closely on several occasions. I stated distinctly that I thought the sum now paid to members was fair and reasonable, and as low as it ought to be. Therefore I am perfectly free to vote as I think right on this measure. When we remember the trouble we had to get payment of members fixed—how, year after year, the principle was rejected by members who now as strongly support a reduction—I cannot help thinking that this reduction is an insidious attempt to get us back into the difficulties we had so much trouble in clearing away. I was in that struggle, and always contended that the amount should be called “payment of members,” and not “honorarium;” but we had to submit to its being called by that misleading term. It is absurd to talk of £50 being paid for expenses. Men who are able to accept the position without payment ought to be ashamed to send in their little bills and ask for their expenses. I heard it said just now that the proper thing was to pay the expenses of members, and, with reference to the Council, that, if they were allowed their expenses, that ought to be sufficient. The honourable member for the Taieri objected to the debate as being a waste of time. I think the honourable gentleman was perfectly right, although not in the way he intended. The fault is in the manner in which this has been introduced. It is a most important part of our Constitution, this payment of members. We had great difficulty in getting it fixed, and now, having got that stone into the foundation, we are to remove it and shake the whole building. And why? In the name of economy and retrenchment. I have shown that the saving will be small as far as this year is concerned; and we are dwarfing a large constitutional question down to a mere question of administration. There is no self-sacrifice in it. I think we should be ashamed of ourselves if we reduce the salaries of Government officers in the name of self-sacrifice. Why should we call upon them to submit to that? We are saving the wealthy people of the colony from a property-tax. I am anxious to see them saved by all fair means. Let those who have been and are still too highly paid be reduced, but do not call it self-sacrifice in their case or in any other. We are taking a step towards altering the Constitution of the country. Let us look at the thing fairly. Those who think that two hundred guineas is not too large a sum for the payment of members, and that with a less sum the people cannot secure a free choice of representatives, will vote for the continuance of the present system. Those who think it is not desirable the people at large should have a free choice, and who would prefer to see this House revert to its former position as a very pleasant club instead of a House representing the people, will, of course, say that two hundred guineas is too much—that ten guineas is too much; they would gladly come here and work for nothing. Then, we must not lose sight of the disqualification attached to the position. A member cannot take a contract from Government, or any position under the Government, until he has ceased to be a member for twelve months. If a member serves on a Commission he cannot get paid more than his actual travelling-expenses. There are many other disqualifications attached to the position, and properly so; but I would beg honourable members to bear in mind that these did not exist in former days. Gentlemen were taken direct from this House and put into high official positions; they were made Resident Magistrates, and put in other lucrative offices. That was, very properly, put a stop to. It is quite easy to retrench without this reduction, if the honourable gentleman at the head of the Government will only face the question. He knows in his own mind what the remedy is. Let us simplify our form of government. He took a most active part in destroying the old system: let him devise a simpler than our present costly and cumbersome one. Let the honourable member get rid of local affairs from this House; he knows that three Ministers could then do the work, and fifty members would be sufficient to represent the country in this House. The honourable member knows that.

Major ATKINSON.—Will the honourable

gentleman be good enough to speak for himself? I will speak for myself presently.

Mr. MOSS.—The honourable member knows I am right.

Major ATKINSON.—I know exactly the contrary. I do not believe in any of the statements of the honourable member.

Mr. MOSS.—I made no statements.

Major ATKINSON.—You stated what my belief was.

Mr. MOSS.—I have made only one statement. I stated that "the honourable gentleman knows."

Major ATKINSON.—But I say I do not. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. MOSS.—Let me repeat it. The honourable member, I am sure, knows perfectly well that three Ministers could govern this country and fifty members would be sufficient in this House if we had not all these local affairs to attend to.

Major ATKINSON.—I do not know it.

Mr. MOSS.—Then I can assure the honourable gentleman he ought to know it. There are many other things which he does know which are not so likely to be understood as that great fact. Why not devote ourselves to simplifying the form of government, and cut our coat according to our cloth, suit our institutions to the country, and not attempt to force the country to suit its institutions to us? I do not like to say distasteful things in the House; but I would ask members to look at the House at the present moment. What is the dominating idea in the minds of honourable members—in my mind, as well as in the minds of others? We are bent on being home at Christmas, whatever business may be left undone or half-done here. Members say, "Whether the business of the colony can be done by Christmas or not, we are going home, and we are not coming back again." That is a great fact. Our business is to deliberate calmly and consider these matters and take a large view of these questions, not to rush them through as fast as possible. That in itself is a condemnation of our whole system. I hope the House will not talk about self-sacrifice, but will look upon this as part of a great question, whether the sum paid to honourable members for their services is too large or not. I believe it is not too large, and therefore I shall vote against the Bill. The question concerns us personally in only a minor degree. It will concern the power of the people in having a full and free choice of representatives long after others fill the places we now hold. I shall be glad also if the honourable member will withdraw his amendment, so that the vote may be taken directly on the Bill.

Mr. FISH.—I shall be happy to withdraw the amendment, if the House will allow me.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. PEACOCK.—Sir, I rise to say that I shall support this Bill very cordially. Indeed, I shall be prepared to go further than the Bill goes, and do as I have done on former occasions when the question of the honorarium has been before the House, and vote for £100 being the amount of honorarium. I think it would be a sham on our part to go into any policy of retrenchment without any attempt to reduce our own salaries in the way of honorarium. And I believe the country expects it of us. From one end of the colony to the other there was a cry, during the late elections, that members coming to this House ought to be willing to accept an amount of honorarium smaller than they are getting. The only reason I can see for the payment of honorarium is to enable any man who is poor, and has the ability to take part in legislative duties, to come to this House, and not be put to any loss by giving his time and services to the country. If he will get such an amount as will enable him to pay his expenses when here, and be free from loss through his legislative duties preventing him from supporting his family by his wages as a working-man, that amount ought to be sufficient for the purpose. I wish the House to bear this in mind: that £100 was paid for many years in this House; and I think those who recollect the character of the House at that time will be willing to admit that the ability displayed and the manner in which the business was carried out at that time would certainly compare very favourably with what it is at the present time. I should also ask the House to bear in mind, in considering this question as to the amount which is to be decided upon as the honorarium of members of this House, that it is only for a fourth part of the year. It does not at all interfere with a member devoting his time to other business during three-fourths of the year; and, if that is taken into account, it will be seen that the amount paid hitherto has been unnecessarily large for the purpose. There are other points to which I might call attention, but which are probably Committee objections. One of those points is in regard to the Wellington members, or members resident within a certain radius of Wellington. Under the Act they receive £140, but under this Bill it is evident that they will receive an increase, as they are to get £150; and the members who were here last session will get £30 more. There is also a question in regard to the payment of Legislative Councillors, and as to the small area within which payment will not apply. These are Committee matters; but, should I have an opportunity of introducing an amendment to reduce still further the honorarium, I shall do so, and thereby meet the views of the honourable member for Parnell, who hints that the sacrifice to be made this year is not enough to speak about.

Sir J. VOGEL.—Sir, I do not agree that there is any fault to be found with the Government for bringing down this Bill. Quite sufficient cause appeared during the late elections to make it necessary to bring down a Bill of this kind. Whether or not its terms are wisely decided I shall leave for consideration to a future time. And I do not agree with any remarks which may go in the direction of insinuating that the Government have not shown disinterestedness in the matter as regards themselves. On the contrary, I think it is only right and doing justice to the Government to say that not only in the Bill which affects their own salaries do they propose that large reductions should be made, but they, unnecessarily, and unfairly to themselves, I think, propose that the reductions should take place from the commencement of the session instead of from the time when the Bill becomes law. I think they are fairly entitled to draw the salaries which the law gives to them until there is an alteration; and there is no right on the part of the House to make the Bill which affects their salaries retrospective in its character. Therefore I cannot agree in any indication which attributes to the Government a want of generosity and consideration, after their treatment of themselves. In regard to honourable members, the nature of the Bill is simply this: The sixty old members will get exactly what they would receive under the present Act for this session; Wellington members will receive somewhat more than they would under the existing law; and all the new members—my honourable friend behind me terms them “Young New Zealand”—will be the only losers this session by the Bill. The gentlemen who reside in Wellington—and I am one of them, and therefore I shall be speaking disinterestedly—would have more than they would have under the existing Act; the remainder of the old members will get the same; and the young members will have considerably less than they would be entitled to. This is a strange way of altering the law. As regards the expectations of the country, I am inclined to agree with the honourable member who spoke last, that there was a general impression throughout the colony that the new members intended to consent to a considerable reduction in the honorarium. Any members who have pledged themselves to that effect must necessarily act up to their pledges; but the point I contend for, and do so strongly, is this: Those who made no such pledges should consider the question upon its merits; but those who did make such pledges should not allow themselves to be governed by more than the duration of the present Parliament, and should make this Bill of a temporary character.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Sir J. VOGEL.—Well, I am convinced the time has come to end this sham of honorarium, and to say that members ought to be paid, for the honorarium is not a fair one, nor fair to the country. Take the case at the present time. We have an enormous amount of important business to attend to, while honourable members have made up their minds that nothing shall induce them to stay after Christmas. These are some of the measures that have to be attended to, or else to be neglected, or to be hurriedly passed, and some of them are measures which, in ordinary times, would take up the whole of the time between now and Christmas in discussing them; and yet we are asked to pass them hurriedly, although they are admittedly of the greatest importance. I am only giving some of these measures. There is a measure for relinquishing the pre-emptive right to purchase Native lands, and the right that these lands should be only sold through the Government. That is an important measure. Another is one which was hurried through the House last night, a measure for making a very large reduction in the selling-price of the waste lands of the Crown. Then, Sir, there is another measure of great importance—a Bill for handing over the management of the railways to a comparatively irresponsible Board. Then, we have before us the contingency of changes being made in the Education Department, which we are not even certain we shall have an opportunity of discussing, since those changes, it appears, can be made by an Order in Council, without further legislation. Then, there is a Bill—I am at a loss for adjectives with which to describe the importance of these Bills, for they are all of such large importance—to alter the representation of the country, and to enlarge the size of the districts, which my honourable friend the member for Ashburton rightly says is of enormous importance. Then, there is a Bill relating to the Otago Central Railway, which, if not a Government measure, in my opinion ought to be one. There is the Bill relating to the acquisition of land, which is in the hands of a private member; but, judging from the remarks of the head of the Government, it should have been a Government measure. Then, there is the question relating to the increase of the property-tax, and as to whether or not there should be a variation in the incidence of that tax. Then, we find that there is the question of retrenchment, of which we have only touched the very fringe of the discussion in the form of the Bills relating to the salaries of the Governor and of the Ministers and members. And there are other questions relating to retrenchment which either we shall have to leave to the Government to deal with without a discussion in the House, or else there will be no dealing with that question, which was the one most prominently brought before electors during the late elections. Now, Sir, I have pointed out these, but there are other measures, and I have not exhausted the list. And yet, notwithstanding that, honourable members are thoroughly determined nothing shall induce them to stay longer than three weeks—till Christmas-time. I do not for a moment say that honourable members, in coming to that conclusion, are actuated by the question of the honorarium; but I do say this: that if the Government were to ask the members to come back after Christmas they would be inflicting considerable hardship upon honourable members, because the allowance which we hitherto considered should be made to honourable members by way of covering their expenses would fall short of doing anything of the kind if there were to be a session after Christmas. The conclusion I have come to is this—not the one that the honourable member for Ponsonby has come to, that he is only engaged here temporarily on his legislative duties, and for the other part of the year is free to do what he likes. I say the time has come when the duties of Parliament are of so important a nature that a member should place the whole of his time and abilities at the disposal of the State from one year's end to the other, whenever they are required. Now, Sir, according to what the honourable member for Ponsonby said, we are coming to a different conclusion—we are to say that so many days' expenses of a reasonable character amount to so much, and that honourable members should only be asked for that number of days' attendance during the year. I think it is a false principle to go upon; and, moreover, seeing many things which I should rather not allude to this evening, but all in the direction, to my mind, of giving larger powers to what are called "the privileged classes," I cannot think that it is a measure of a liberal character which reduces the range of selection on the part of the selectors, which a measure of this kind is calculated to do. It is clearly the case that if you reduce the amount which you place at the disposal of members you lower the range of selection of the electors, because we know there are many men to whom no exception could be taken in point of ability or fitness who will find that they cannot afford to place their services at the disposal of the electors. And therefore you are reducing the range of selection, and you are saying to the electors, "It is desirable that you should select only men of means as your representatives." In this country we have to deal with a different class of men from those in Great Britain. The number of men in this colony who have no business pursuits are comparatively few. Therefore when we speak of the privileged classes here we do not speak of men free to take to politics as an occupation for their leisure, but we speak of men who are willing to give up a certain time from whatever occupation they follow in order to represent the people in Parliament; and, if you lower the rate of payment to members, you will reduce the number who will find that they are able to respond to the call made upon them. And I think, with the uncertainty hanging over us as to what time the session will occupy, and the strain it puts on the Government in the way of asking members to remain, the principle should at once be done away with, at any rate, after the present Parliament, of paying by honorarium, and that members should receive the same amount that is paid in other places. I believe the amount generally accepted is £300. Now, as regards the present Parliament, members must be judged by their own pledges, and I have not followed the election speeches closely enough to know what they are. I was told it was during a former election that a candidate rather boasted before his constituents that he was in favour of reducing the honorarium. "And," said one very plain and frank elector, "do you mean to say that, when the question arose as to whether or not you should be paid a certain sum, you voted for the lower sum?" "Yes," said the candidate, with a great deal of self-consciousness of having done a good deed. "Well," replied the elector—and he was loudly cheered—"if you are not able to look after your own interests, what chance is there of your looking well after ours?" I do not know how far there may be a change in the matter; but, in my opinion, the electors throughout the country will not take the view that they have a right to ask gentleman to represent them who are not to receive a fair amount of payment in consequence. I am not quite able to follow the point made by the honourable member for Ashburton. If I understood him rightly, he objects to payment of members.—(No.)—It appears to me that we are now paying according to the duration of the session, and therefore, if the new Representation Bill passes and the number of members is reduced, then, it seems to me, the session should be shorter, because there will be fewer members to talk; and, consequently, under the new Representation Bill instead of the payment to members being larger it should be smaller. That seems to me to be the case, if we regard the honorarium point of view of paying members for their attendance here. Then comes the question, Are members' expenses during election to be taken into account? I do not know what the honourable gentleman's view on that subject is; but, if I am able to judge correctly the view of the Government, that is an element that should be taken into account in the amount to be paid. There is an allowance of £50 to the members of this House, and there is no allowance of the same kind made to the Upper House. They have not to go before their constituents at the end of each Parliament. The members of this House have; and I presume, then, that this £50 is for the purpose of recouping the cost of elections. Well, if that is the principle, I should like to know how the £50 is arrived at. I see honourable gentlemen before me who have paid hundreds, perhaps a thousand and more, over the election; and I see an honourable gentleman on this side of the House who has spent very few pounds over the election. And if the principle is to prevail of recouping the expenses of elections, then I think that, instead of making a uniform payment, a Select Committee should be appointed to appraise the cost of elections, and pay the members accordingly. I do not know how the Premier would escape from that dilemma, if he is prepared to justify the provisions of his Bill. Then, I should simply say this, in conclusion: that I feel myself at liberty to vote against this measure, and, if it passes its second reading, I shall strongly support any amendment which will go in the direction of limiting the reductions which we make to the duration of the present Parliament, and not extending them beyond that time. Those members who have made no pledges, it appears to me, are quite at liberty to vote as they think fit, and I do not think that any member—putting on one side the question of self-sacrifice—that any member who looks at the broad principle of throwing open to the electors of the colony the largest possible freedom of selection can consider that it is desirable, for the comparatively small saving this Bill proposes to make, to so limit the freedom of choice which the electors at present possess, and which, in my opinion, is not even now sufficiently large.

Mr. SEDDON.—Sir, in order, I rise to move the following amendment: That, after the word "That," the following words be inserted: "whilst this House admits that, in the present depressed state of the colony, it may be expedient that there should be a reduction in the amount of honorarium to the extent of 25 per cent., yet it is unwise that legislation on the subject should be introduced, and that it is undesirable that the Parliamentary Honorarium and Privileges Act 1884 Amendment Bill should be proceeded with further this session." The amendment that I propose is, to my mind, what I think a majority of this House would be in favour of seeing carried. I believe it is what the people of the colony would wish, in the existing state of affairs. There is no doubt that, owing to the depressed state of affairs in the colony, each one is called upon to make a sacrifice, and I believe that it is only right and just that members of this House should lead the van and make a sacrifice. And, Sir, I am not one of those who are speaking to the House now on election pledges to have a reduction. During my election tour I told the electors I was not in favour of a reduction in the honorarium, as experience told me that there was no advantage in such a course. I told them I was not bound to make a sacrifice of my time in devoting my services to the country and at the same time not be remunerated. I hold that to be a clear and sound doctrine in any democratic country. We have no right to be called upon to offer up ourselves at the shrine of the country; and, if sacrifices are made, profits will be made indirectly, and we shall find that the country will suffer accordingly. I shall prove that, I think, by the past history of New Zealand. We have very few members now in the House who were here in 1870; but we have those here who represented certain interests during those years. I heard an honourable member refer to this matter, and say that the legislation of New Zealand was as perfect, that its administration was as perfect, when the honorarium was set down at £100 a year, as it is now. But what happened to my honourable friend Sir Julius Vogel when he introduced the public-works policy in 1870? The cardinal point of that policy was that the land along the railways should be rated according to the improved value the railways gave it, and that a portion of the improved value should be given to the State. But we know this: Those who represented the landed interests in the House at that time—who received this £100 a year—what did they do? They took out the cardinal point of the policy. The land was increased in value from £1 to £20 per acre, the poorly-paid legislators indirectly benefited themselves and became wealthy, and the State has not received one penny-piece directly from these lands on account of the expenditure of that money. And so it will be again. If class interests are to be represented in this Parliament wholly and solely, it means this: that, indirectly, this class will profit, to the detriment of the people generally. The great mass of the people of this country do not expect members to come here and do their duty and serve them faithfully and be losers thereby. There is no man that can come at less than is now fixed, and do his duty fairly, and hold the position he should hold, without making a large sacrifice. — (Oh!) — The honourable member for Ponsonby, I think it is, says, "Oh!" but I would ask whether the amount he has received in the shape of honorarium since he came here will equal the amount he would have been in pocket if he had not been returned as a member. If he balances both sides of the account I am certain he will find himself on the wrong side of the ledger. But, if his position is such that he has a business which can be carried on during his absence and does not require his own supervision, no loss is entailed on him. And if he is a man of means, which I believe he is, the result of course is that in his case he may consider it desirable and profitable to come here for less. I have always seen the honourable member voting with the Conservative side in this House, and I say it is purely in the Conservative interest, and in the interest of the wealthy classes in New Zealand, that the attempt is now being made to reduce the honorarium. And where comes in the consistency? For years it was contended that it should be laid down we should have the principle of payment of members. The present leader of the Government, who is introducing this measure, is one who declared, when the present Act was brought in, that we should not have the bickering, session after session, in passing on the estimates the amount honourable members should receive. It was clearly understood in the session of 1884, when we passed the Parliamentary Honorarium and Privileges Act, that, once and for all, this question should be definitely settled; and, now, before the present Act has been in force three years, a Bill to amend it is brought down, and we are put in the same position as we should have been in had we been passing the amount of the honorarium on the estimates, as was usual previous to the passing of the present Act. I do not think the interests of the colony require that we should alter the law; but, as a matter of expediency, seeing that this crisis has arisen, we might make the sacrifice that I have proposed in this amendment. Now, comparing the position of New Zealand with what is taking place in the other colonies, we find that in Victoria payment of members has existed for some years, and that the colony has progressed to such an extent that, whilst New South Wales last year had a deficit of a million, and whilst New Zealand had a deficit of £300,000, Victoria had a surplus of over half a million. We find that as far as legislation necessary for the masses, as far as settlement of the land, and as far as the social and moral progress of the people are concerned Victoria leads the van; and I say that, to my mind, the progress and prosperity of its people arise mainly from the fact that there they had fair representation, paid members, and Protection. And who have carried Protection and caused the prosperity? Who have conserved the rights of the people? Who have said the land shall be for the people? The men who have been paid a fair amount for their services, who have been honest and true to their principles, and well earned their money; and the colony has progressed. I say, let the Parliament of New Zealand follow this example and do what is right and just, and then New Zealand will follow in the wake of Victoria, and be what it should have been years ago. There is a complete answer to the allegation made that in the past those who represented the people of New Zealand on small pay have provided the colony with the advantages that New Zealand enjoys. With the large expenditure of loans and public moneys New Zealand has had, it says very little for those who, on small pay, were legislating and administering for the Colony of New Zealand. There is another phase of the question: I have often heard it said in this House that we should not have retrospective legislation. But I say this is retrospective legislation. When the present members of this House were elected the law was that each new member should receive £210 for the session, and £105, this being the second session, as far as old members were concerned. There was a contract in existence, and on that contract the electors returned members. I ask the House plainly if, when the electors were voting for members, they were voting that those members should vote for an alteration of the law; and I say it is no reason, because any member in this House might have given a pledge of individual action, that he should be a party to retrospective legislation, and do wrong to those who are in this Parliament, and who were clearly within their rights under the law as it existed. I bring this to the recollection of the House: Previously when a reduction was made, in 1880, when the salaries of the Civil servants were reduced by 10 per cent., the honorarium was reduced to the same extent, and soon afterwards, when prosperity had again dawned, and even, I believe, before it had fairly dawned, the result was that the 10-per-cent. reduction was made good to the Civil servants; but nothing was made good to members of this House. Now, whilst we are going in for retrenchment blindfold in the rest of the service—for the Government ask us to leave it in their hands, and we do not know to what extent it may be carried, or even if any reduction will be made—we are making this certain sacrifice of the amount payable to ourselves. To my mind, that is not a businesslike way of proceeding; but I say this in support of the amendment: that by it we are placing ourselves in the same position as we are placing our Civil servants in, because I am certain that as soon as the colony recovers its financial position, so surely shall we find whatever we now take from the Civil servants restored, or more than restored. That has always been the case. I recollect when the same thing occurred in Victoria, when, after their Black Wednesday, when a large part of the Civil Service was discharged, in two or three years, when prosperity returned, the expenditure went up again. So it will be here;—I am as positive of it as I am that I am addressing the House at this moment. Under these circumstances I can see no reason why we should alter the law. What I think would meet the case would be the tentative measure I propose, to reduce the honorarium this year; and next year, if we find the depression is not removed, and the circumstances of the colony demand a still further sacrifice, then let us make it. As compared with the £210 paid here, take the amounts paid in Victoria and in Queensland; and I would ask honourable members to compare the position of members here with the position of members in Victoria. In Melbourne nearly every member can return to his home after each sitting, because all the railways in the colony converge on one point; the few, representing the most distant electorates, who cannot return to their homes daily, can do so two or three times a week. But here honourable members are absent from their homes on an average at least three months in the year—this year they will be away nearly seven months for the two sessions; and, taking all the expenses directly and indirectly incurred, I undertake to say there is no member of the House who is not a heavy loser. If, in the face of the heavy present loss, honourable members are prepared, as I believe they are, to make a still further tentative sacrifice such as that mentioned in the amendment, it is as much as the country can expect of them. I am not one who believe in cheap services. There is not a single honourable member here who, having a servant or a workman or an employé of any sort who was doing his duty faithfully and fearlessly, and proving himself capable in doing it, would go in and reduce his salary: it is the last thing any one who had any knowledge of employment or labour in any capacity would think of doing. And do you mean to tell me that the electors of New Zealand are devoid of intelligence, and that they do not know full well that they get good value? If you put it as a test question at the ballot-box, they would tell you, the thing being fairly and clearly explained, that £210—the amount now fixed by law—is not too much. There may be some parts of the colony where you could find candidates offering to serve the electors in Parliament for nothing—offering to discharge all the duties of a representative, and charge the colony nothing for their services. But there are parts of the colony where, if such an offer were made, the intelligence of the electors would say, “We certainly believe you would, but that, while we should not directly have to pay you, we should indirectly have to pay you double money.” If such a person were to proffer his services on the West Coast to any of the intelligent electors of that part of the colony I am positive the answer would be, "You are too cheap at the price. We will not have you."

Mr. MONK.—Too honest for them.

Mr. SEDDON.—I am afraid I should not look northward for honesty, particularly to Waitemata. Honesty is sold to party in that part of the country;—four honest men from that part of the country sold themselves in this House for a quarter of a million of money a few years ago. If that is honesty we on the West Coast say we will have none of it—we do not want men who can be bought for roads and bridges or personal gain. It is quite possible, and I believe it is the case, that there are parts of New Zealand, and not one hundred miles from Waitemata, which have sent to this House not representatives, but delegates, whose votes are not their own, but who must vote at their master's call. Sir, I put this to the Government: whether, in the existing state of affairs, it would not be well to accept the amendment, which I hope they will do. It must be apparent to the Premier that to force this Bill through, under existing circumstances, will be a matter of some time. I believe that there are other matters of far greater importance, and by which the colony will be a greater gainer if this Bill be postponed to allow of their becoming law. And I would put it to the Premier—and I believe his answer would be in the affirmative if he could speak conscientiously upon the subject—that, looking at his previous action in supporting the payment at £210 for years, he is now bringing it down to £150 merely as a matter of expediency. I say, as it is being done as a matter of expediency, let us allow the law to remain as it is, and then simply reduce the amount payable when the estimates are brought down.

Major ATKINSON.—It does not come down on the estimates at all.

Mr. SEDDON.—The Premier knows that that could very well be arranged. We can vote the money on the supplementary estimates, and the present law can be suspended.

Major ATKINSON.—Only by Act.

Mr. SEDDON.—I am quite willing, if the Premier will adopt that course, to have the Act suspended. That is really what the amendment is, in so many words. Let us suspend the Act until we find that the affairs of the colony are on a better footing; but let us retain the Act as it is at the present time. Going into the details of the question, some honourable members are in favour of making a distinction between members of this House and members of the Legislative Council; but I, for one, am of opinion that in that Chamber the people should be represented. If you are to have no one in that Chamber except the representatives of the wealthier classes, the result will be that any measure passed by the representatives of the people in this Chamber will be vetoed in the other Chamber. I say that there are gentlemen in that Chamber who are not men of means, but have faithfully served the country, and done their duty as colonists.

Is it to be said that, because they are now in that Chamber, they are not to have that pay which will meet their expenses or enable them to maintain themselves as they should maintain themselves during the session? I will be no party to anything of the sort. This Bill makes the difference too great: £50 for a session is too small an amount. The amount now fixed by law is by no means too much. If this Bill goes into Committee and an amendment of that nature is proposed I shall object to it; and I say, in conclusion, that there is no necessity whatever for legislation on the subject. If this amendment is carried, it will be an expression of opinion on the part of the House that a reduction should be made, but that the reduction should be of a tentative kind.

Colonel FRASER.—The honourable member for Ponsonby states that he comes from a part of the colony where the electors are unanimously of the opinion that there should be a reduction in the honorarium. Well, I come from a part of the country not fifty miles from where he comes from, and my constituents have no such desire. I came to this House free and untrammelled, to vote as I pleased, but rather inclined to think that the honorarium should be retained at its present rate, because I considered that the reduction of the honorarium would, in a great measure, reduce the selection offered to the people. But I did come to this House pledged to assist in the reduction of the number of members of the House, and that pledge I shall keep in every possible way. However, as Ministers have shown that they are in earnest by making the reduction in their own salaries, I do not think it would be wise on the part of the House not to follow their example, and therefore I shall vote for the second reading of the Bill, more particularly on account of the present depression; and I must say that there is nothing in the measures at present introduced by Ministers at all likely to ameliorate the distress now prevailing. I fear, therefore, that the reduction which we are now making will not be of a temporary character, but of a permanent character, unless some better measures than those before us are brought forward. I shall therefore support the Bill.

Major STEWARD.—I only wish to say a few words in explanation of the vote that I shall give on this Bill. I agree with those honourable gentlemen who have expressed the view that the amount of honorarium at present authorised to be paid by statute is, from the broad, liberal, and democratic point of view, not by any means too high; but, Sir, we have to recognise that the colony has fallen upon evil times, and that the circumstances at present do not enable us to carry out all things we think desirable; and, as retrenchment is to be carried out in all the departments of the public service, I conceive that we cannot consistently or with any good grace put in force such retrenchment measures as are necessary without ourselves submitting to come under this unpleasant operation. Though, therefore, I entirely concur with those honourable gentlemen who, speaking from the liberal standpoint, think there ought to be a substantial sum paid to members of this House, still I recognise that the circumstances at the present time are such that what we desire cannot be carried out. Therefore I shall vote with Ministers in favour of the Bill they have brought down. But I am still of the opinion which I expressed in the discussion on the Financial Statement, that a better course would have been to have brought down a Bill suspending the operation of the Parliamentary Honourarium and Privileges Act during the period of the present Parliament. Then we should not have interfered with the operation of the Act as regards our successors, and those who are to be elected at next election would have the same option and right that we have as regards the honorarium.

An Hon. MEMBER.—So they will have, whatever we do.

Major STEWARD.—But, necessarily, they will have to pass a Bill; whereas if the course I recommend were adopted there would be no necessity for passing any Bill at all. I think that if the honourable member for Kumara were to move an amendment in that direction in Committee he would be more likely to be successful than he is in bringing down this resolution, which will be taken, whatever it may mean, as traversing the proposals of the Government. I am glad to hear that the honourable gentleman who leads the opposition will support a clause in Committee limiting the duration of the Bill to the present Parliament. If he moves a clause of that kind I shall certainly vote for it, and if he does not I shall be disposed to move such an amendment myself. It is quite sufficient to legislate for ourselves in this matter, without attempting to bind other Parliaments.

Captain RUSSELL.—Sir, it is possible for a man to have too much of a good thing, even of the honourable member for Kumara, who is "a very good thing," but it was with unexpected pleasure that I listened to him to night. He has a scheme for rescuing the colony from the depression into which it has fallen, a scheme better, I venture to believe, than even that scheme which the honourable member for Christchurch North has bottled up and will not produce to the House. The honourable gentleman tells us how grandly Victoria has progressed in the past because honourable members were paid £300 a year. Well, Sir, if we are to argue from his text we may fairly believe that we have but to quadruple the honorarium now, and, instead of having a deficiency—as he tells us we have—of £300,000, we should probably find at the end of this financial year that we had a very large surplus indeed. Now, it seems to me that the whole question resolves itself into this: Could we, for the honorarium proposed in the Bill, get as good members as we have at the present time? If so, why should we not reduce the honorarium? There is, of course, but one member for Kumara; and I venture to say that they will never get such another if Kumara is represented in this House for a thousand years. I do not venture to compare him with other members of this House. I have no doubt he is worth double any honorarium that will ever be paid to him. But, as for myself and other humble members of this House, it would be, I can quite believe, easy to get our places filled by men just as good as ourselves if the honorarium were immediately reduced. With regard to the honourable member for Parnell, he ventured just now to tell us what the Premier thinks and what the Premier knows. He also ventured to tell the House that I was in favour of abolishing the honorarium and restricting the qualification to a property vote. Well, it seems to me that the honourable gentleman, judging by the numerous speeches he inflicts upon you, knows everything except how to discreetly hold his tongue. I, Sir, have never been in favour of abolishing the honorarium, nor have I ever been in favour of restricting the votes to a property qualification; but I do believe that a system of payment of large sums of money to members of this House is a fatal and radical mistake, and that it is not in the interests of, nor would promote, true democracy: I believe, if anything, it would do rather the reverse. I may be told that unless we had payment of members the poorer men could never come up to this House. That theory is correct, and for that reason I should be the last to say, Do not pay a man such a sum as would enable him to come here. But, if you argue that it is the poorest class that are to come up, and that the honorarium is to be sufficient to enable them to do so, then I contend that the sum of £100 is amply sufficient for all purposes. We are engaged here year after year for, in round numbers, about three months. One hundred days, I believe, would be found to be in excess of the number of the days of the session; and will any person contend that for the sum of £100 you cannot be amply provided for in the best hotels, and have plenty of pocket-money for the little et-ceteras which are found necessary?

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Captain RUSSELL.—Well, then, the honourable gentleman must be more extravagant than most people. I do not see how it is possible for any one, for the fair necessities of life, to spend more than that. Of course you may spend more than that: you may buy diamond-rings or any other luxuries; but I do say that for all that is absolutely essential for one's comfort a pound a day is more than sufficient. The honourable member for Christchurch North said that this duration-principle was false,—that if you give payment by the day it would be a false principle. I admit that; but surely any practical, common-sense business-man ought to look back upon the parliamentary history of the country and see how many days Parliament has ordinarily been in session, and, if he finds that, during a period of twenty years, Parliament has not sat for more than a hundred days a year, we have a right, surely, to assume that our duties will not exceed a hundred days in future. I hope and believe that our duties will not exceed a hundred days: and under those circumstances £100 is ample. Reverting again, for an instant, to the question of the poor man, the honourable member for Ashburton was perfectly right when he said it was a question of payment of members. People may draw fine distinctions between an honorarium and payment, but, as a matter of fact, the honorarium is actually payment. With the honourable member for Christchurch North, I do not think we should place all power in the hands of privileged classes; and, on the other hand, I do not think we should pay men such sums of money as would create a professional politician class, and I believe that by increasing the honoraria we should induce a professional politician class to come here. It is all very well to say that you must pay men for coming to Parliament; but I contend, however conservative people may deem it, that unless a man has a certain degree of independence he has no right to come up to Parliament; and I will state why. Every man owes his duty first of all to his wife and family; and if he, being an artisan, comes up to Parliament and sits many years in Parliament he thereby ceases to be an artisan. He cannot return at the end of six, seven, or ten years and take his place amongst his fellow-artisans; he has been unfitted for it, because he has disused his trade for many years. Very well. Then, this would happen: After such a man had been a member for some years, some great wave of popular feeling would come, which very likely might be prejudicial, and is directly contrary to his convictions. What, in such a case, is he to do? He knows that at home he has a wife and family, and that if he is turned out of his seat in Parliament they will be absolutely penniless. Will not the inducement to that man to sacrifice conscience and to vote contrary to what he believes to be for the good of the country be almost an imperative necessity? It will be so; and almost every man, when he is placed in such a position, having to judge between the material comforts of his family and the good of the country, would let the country go to the dogs, and see that his family is properly provided for. I say, therefore, that we have no right to induce men to abandon their handicraft by offering two or three hundred pounds a year, when we know that the day will come—as it will come to every one of us here sooner or later—when, perhaps, for having done our duty, but at the same time having run contrary to popular opinion, we shall be rejected by our constituencies; for such men, it seems to me, if they have nothing else to live upon, must then become pensioners upon the State, or see those who are dependent upon them going without the necessities of life. To induce men who have not an independence, or men without a profession to which they can return, to become members of Parliament is a great mistake indeed, and is not in the interests of themselves or of true democracy. It has been said, and said, it seems to me, with good reason, that we should reduce the honorarium before we reduce the payment of, or discharge, Civil servants; that it would be very unjust to those men who make their living by serving the country to reduce their salaries or discharge them whilst we here do not reduce our honorarium, but receive the full amount that we received before. I believe that it is of great importance that we should reduce the honorarium, because the feeling does exist in the breasts of many honourable members that it would be unjust to endeavour to bring about serious reductions in the Government service so long as they do not touch their own honorarium; and if we do not reduce our honorarium we shall not go in for true retrenchment: but the instant we feel we have done our duty to the country in that respect we shall be able to take up a standpoint from which we shall be able to do to others what we have already done for ourselves. I disapprove of that portion of the Bill which makes a difference between members of the Legislative Council and members of the House of Representatives. As was said by the honourable member for Kumara, we do not want the Legislative Council to represent wealth any more than we want it to consist of pensioners. There are many men in this colony who are more deserving of seats in the Legislative Council than are many of the members who are elected by the people to the House of Representatives, and these people would never be elected, because they have not the popular knack of addressing large audiences, or going round, hat in hand, and making love to their constituents. For all that, many of these men have great deliberative power, though they have not the gift of popular oratory, and those are the men I should like to see put into the Council—men of science, perchance, who have not been seeking popular favour. We want such men there, but I do not want to see rich men there. Therefore the members of the Legislative Council should have exactly the same remuneration as members of the Lower House. What I fear in this clause of the Bill is that, after reducing the honorarium of the Legislative Councillors, in a short time the question would come up again, and their honorarium would be reduced still further; and the day would soon come when—as I have heard many honourable gentlemen outside urge—payment of the Legislative Councillors would be withdrawn altogether; and that, I believe, would be absolutely fatal to the Legislative Council, and injurious in the last degree to the colony. I can imagine that such leaders of the popular party as I have known in the past would get upon the platforms throughout the colony, and inveigh in most eloquent and brilliant language against the monopoly of power conferred upon those irresponsible gentlemen who sit in the Legislative Council; and it would be said that, as they sat absolutely without any pay at all, they did so, as it has already been suggested the richer men would do in this House, to serve their own selfish interests only. I can imagine large audiences in all parts of the colony would be told that; and this would be the first step towards the destruction of our Constitution. I hope that in Committee that part of the Bill will be materially altered; and I should also like to see the sum of £150 to be paid to members of the House of Representatives reduced to £100, because I can see no reason why the £50 should be paid as expenses. Everybody must admit that there is a considerable amount of money spent at elections; but that is no argument which can be brought forward in this House. We have the most stringent Corrupt Practices Act, and that was prepared with the idea of diminishing the election expenses; and, if any honourable member contests an election absolutely within the four corners of that Act, I am convinced that this £50 for expenses will not be necessary to him at all.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Captain RUSSELL.—The honourable member may say "No," but I maintain that that is so; and that in many instances this hiring of halls and various other things that members do is an indirect if not a direct form of bribery.

An Hon. MEMBER.—What about advertisements?

Captain RUSSELL.—Well, it is a very dangerous thing to say a word against the Press; but if ever there was an engine of extortion and an engine of bribery, commend me to the Press of New Zealand. I believe that the amount extracted by the newspapers in the shape of election advertisements is four or five times their worth. I have now said all I had to say in favour of the Bill. I have no hesitation in saying that some payment of members is just and reasonable; but to pay such a sum as would induce people to come to Parliament and make a living of it to the prejudice of the ordinary vocations they followed before would be a fatal mistake, and one that would not be in the interests of true democracy.

Sir J. VOGEL.—I have spoken before the honourable gentleman who spoke last, and I shall leave it to other gentlemen who follow to criticize his speech. I fairly congratulate him upon the courage with which he has expressed his opinions—opinions so contrary, I believe, to the opinions which prevail throughout the country. If I understood the honourable gentleman rightly, it nearly all comes back to this: that his idea is that representatives are most likely to be good in proportion to their not having the knack of making themselves popular. If that is so, I think we should put an end at once to the representative system of Government. I do not wish to detain the House, but I would say that I cannot support the amendment of the honourable member for Kumara; but if the honourable gentleman will move an amendment to this effect: That it is not desirable to proceed with the Bill this session, as the economy which it will effect falls entirely upon the new members and the members of the Legislative Council, and that it will therefore be better to propose next session a measure fairly affecting all members, I should support such an amendment. Clearly, we are not entitled to single out the new members for economical purposes only; and, if it were, we should not stop short of doing the thing entirely, simply saying that new members should receive no honorarium at all. If there is any principle in singling them out for deduction, I do not see why it should stop short half-way. It appears to me that, in singling out the new members, this Bill is unjust, and that otherwise the measure effects no economy whatever. I think it would be better to postpone legislation till next session, when we should be able to deal with all members on an equal footing. There will be great difficulty in dealing with the question this session, because of there being new and old members. There is one nut you will have to crack, and a very hard one. I think it will give you many a headache before you come to a conclusion on it; and that is, there is one gentleman who was a member for a Middle Island constituency, but who is now a member for a Wellington district, and you will have to cut him into pieces. I am at a loss to understand how it can be done; it will be a very difficult process. I think it would be better to deal with this question next session. I will not move an amendment; but if the honourable member for Kumara feels inclined to do this I will support it.

Sir G. GREY.—Sir, I look upon the proposal now made to us as involving a great constitutional question, one which cannot be shut up in one sheet of paper in the manner in which it is here. This appears to me to be part of a proceeding to which I cannot apply the name of policy. It seems to me to be nibbling all round at everything upon no plan whatever. There is no greatness of design visible in any part of the measures now brought before us. If there is one plan at all, it appears to me that the plan is this: to destroy every portion of liberty that has been gained within the past few years, to abolish everything that has been done in the direction of freedom, and to set up a state of things which I believe none of us wish to see restored. In the first place we gained a great deal in reference to the lands of the colony. Some effort has been made to obtain land for the people—I admit, not very well or very wisely, or upon a broad scale. In fact, I cannot approve of it as a general measure at all; but the effort has been made to obtain land for the people, and yet we have before us now a Land Bill which I look upon as perfectly retrogressive. I can look upon it in no other way. There we are about, I think, to retreat from what we have done, and to go back to what I regard as a vicious system. Then, again, a very strange proposal in point of fact is made to us. All democratic bodies have had this in view: that payment should be made to the representatives of the people—and in most cases representatives of the people are in both Chambers, and both are elected: in fact, in every instance, so that they may represent the people, an effort has been made to determine that actual payment shall be made to each of such Chambers: not in the form of an honorarium to be given for the session, which naturally induces honourable members to hurry through the session as quickly as possible in order to get home with as much honorarium in their pockets as they can; but it is payment made throughout the year, whether Parliament be sitting or not. That is the plan on which payment is made in such bodies. Now, here we have still the honorarium put before us: nothing else. Then, what proportion does that honorarium bear to the salary paid to the Governor? In the United States, that the President may bear no very elevated position as compared with the representatives of the people, the honorarium paid to the Senate and the House of Representatives is made equal, and justly so. They all represent the people, and the amount paid to the members of each House is one-tenth of the income given to the President. But here what are you going to do? You have determined that you will not have an elected Governor, but that a man shall be brought from another country, and you at once elevate him far above all our fellow-citizens by giving him £5,000 a year, which I think too much. If you gave your members one-tenth of his income, as is done in the United States, you would have to give them £400 or £500 a year; but, instead of doing that, you put them in a very low position as compared with him. That is wrong. I say you should regulate all this on some fixed principle, and not as it is done in this Bill. I regard the proposal here as one in a very retrograde direction. I perfectly admit that at the present time every one should make some sacrifice to meet the necessities of the country. Let us all therefore, who desire to make that sacrifice, do so, but let us only do it for this Parliament, and do not let us pass a permanent measure of a retrograde character, simply to get rid of difficulty and trouble, simply that you may not embarrass your minds with conceptions which appear to be beyond the grasp of the present Government. Therefore, so far as it depends on me, I shall try to confine this Bill to the present time—I will not say this session, but this Parliament. Let us, if we do bring in a general measure, do it on some fixed principle. I say we are taking a retrograde step altogether. We have before us a Bill to restore Parliaments to five years' duration. That is brought in by a friend and supporter of the Government, with what assistance from them I cannot tell. That I know not; but that Bill is before us, and it is one which goes in a totally retrograde direction. Then, Sir, what further have we determined? One would imagine, from the speeches made from the Government benches on this measure, that all the steps we were taking were in a democratic direction. Is it going in that direction that we are giving millions of acres of land for the construction of a railway, and bringing foreign companies into the country under circumstances which must impoverish its inhabitants for all time? Is it a march in a forward direction to say this? You have a large number of men out of employment, unable to obtain work—in fact, reduced to a state I can hardly contemplate with patience; men who want work; for I have personal knowledge that even in this town a man has been recently seeking work, a man blest with health and strength, and ready and anxious to do work, and yet obliged to abandon this place because he could get no chance of work. Well, when you have your population in that state, is it fair to say to them, "We are going to make over two and a quarter millions of acres of land to a company who care nothing whatever for you, in order that they may construct a railway, and we intend to march you up to the district where that is to be constructed, without choice; you shall go and get work there or you shall have no work at all, and unless you consent to that you must starve; and you are to construct that railway from your own land, which is to cease to be your own land from the time you get there; you shall have to work there for those who are foreigners, and for whom you will render the land of four or five times the value it is now; and when the railway is completed it is to be the property of that body, and the land shall be taken away from you and your children for ever; and unless you go there and work for these people you must starve"? Is that a march in a retrograde direction or not? I say it is part of the same principle that the measure now proposed by the Government is founded on. Then I go a degree further. I say that everything is retrograde now. I take the case of a measure lately introduced into the House which was to have thrown open a learned profession to your youth at large, to have given them a chance of a footing in it; and when such a large number of members—fifty-eight I think it was—voted in favour of the second reading and were anxious to have it considered in Committee, what took place? Virtually, some three or four men, by their opposition, were allowed to prevent it going on at all; and have the Government made any attempt to get any redress for that wrong? Before that Bill came on for consideration in Committee I besought them to get rid of the rule which prevented new business from being taken after half-past twelve; and that was not done. And now what efforts are being made in these times of depression, when men can get no employment, and when your youths, many of them highly educated, have no prospect before them? What effort is made to throw open the portals of that great profession to them? They are shut out from any hope of being able to embark in the legal profession, and I say no justice is done to them by the Government unless they insist upon that measure being considered by the House. It is their duty to let the House have an opportunity of doing that which it was its intention to do. I say, in every instance, our march is from a liberal direction. This question of a grant of land I say is absolutely a return to the system of government by great companies. We all know that the Premier was really always an advocate of those great companies; that no other man has ever perhaps considered so much their interest, and has so neglected the interest of the people at large in comparison with that of companies, as the present Premier has done; and, undoubtedly, the policy of the present time is likely to do the same thing, and to continue the course in the future which was so disastrous to us in the past. Why, therefore, I ask, should we now be asked to do this great injustice to the people of New Zealand that it is to be a permanent law that representatives shall not be paid sufficient for ordinary times? Why should we be asked to pass a law which will say that the representatives shall not be paid in a somewhat fair proportion to the salary of the Governor of this country? Why be asked to depart from rules which other nations have laid down as proper rules for their guidance? There was no necessity for the introduction of this Bill; nor ought it to have been introduced until we first had settled what the number of members of this House should be. I leave it to honourable members to say whether, strictly speaking, justice did not require that, before we were called upon to vote what sum should be paid to members for all time—that is, as far as our power goes in making a permanent law—we should have considered what the number of members should be and what their proportion to the population of the country. It is only with that knowledge we can properly decide this question. Clearly, in bringing it forward in the manner it has been done the same line of procedure has been adopted as in regard to other measures this session: that is, it is some temporary subterfuge, with the object of making a paring here and a paring there, without considering what the effect of these changes would be on the Constitution of the colony at large. I therefore will be no party to legislation of the kind on this subject, or on the subject of the public lands, or on the subject of the constitution of the Legislative Council—on that especially, because I am sure there is no honourable member here who does not feel that if we enact that the number of members of the Council is to be fixed without any power of increasing them, and they are to be nominated by the Ministry of the day, all freedom and liberty of legislation is gone. No enemy to popular freedom could devise a more deadly measure to injure the interests of the country at large than the measure proposed to us for that purpose really is. I feel certain that that is the case; and, until we know whether the Council is to be a representative Council or is to be a nominated Council, I say we ought not to be required to vote what payment is, by a new permanent law, to be made to its members. I therefore do hope honourable gentlemen will not consent to the Bill passing in its present form; but, if we are—as I think we ought to do—to make a self-sacrifice commensurate with the difficulties of the position and the present impoverished state of the country, and if it is to be a sacrifice by ourselves, and to the times, we should simply pass a temporary measure to last so long as this Parliament lasts, and without trying to bind future Parliaments; and in doing that I think we shall be best doing our duty to the people of New Zealand and to ourselves. I hope honourable gentlemen will follow that course, and I shall do my best to see it carried out in every possible way.

Mr. W. P. REEVES.—It was said of a Roman Emperor who succeeded Nero that it was very easy to be a good Emperor after Nero. I would use the converse of the simile and say it is not easy to speak well after the honourable member for Auckland Central. I have not only the misfortune to have to gain the ear of the House after him, but I have to follow two such speakers as the honourable member for Christchurch North and the honourable member for Hawke's Bay. I can only plead that I shall trespass on the indulgence of the House as briefly as possible, and shall compress my remarks into less compass than the remarks of any of those three honourable gentlemen. The honourable member for Hawke's Bay has brought me to my feet by some remarks he made on the Press of the colony. He was good enough to say that the Press was a gigantic instrument of extortion, and that it weighed especially heavily upon public men at elections. But he appears to have forgotten that there are two sides to every question. Who is there to lift up his voice for a Press staggering and reeling under the intolerable weight of the speeches made at the general elections? Is there none to say a word for the non-political reader upon whom these columns upon columns of speeches are inflicted every day? Who is there who suffers by that but the newspapers? May I not say a word for the unfortunate editor and for the unhappy reporter? May I not say a word for the widows and orphans of the reporters—reporters who fall victims to the effort to assimilate these intolerable outpourings? Even as a commercial matter, a newspaper more often loses money than makes it at general elections. If the honourable gentleman does not believe me, let him try and run a newspaper during an election, and if he does not repent of his bargain he is a very fortunate man. The honourable gentleman made a very excellent speech, but he rather "let the cat out of the bag" when he said that a man ought not to come here unless he is a man of independent means. He did not say that straight out. He hinted it delicately. He inferred it. That may be his opinion, but it is not mine, and it is not, I think, the opinion of the majority of the people of this country. It is a very unpleasant and delicate task to take part in this discussion, and it is particularly so to us who may be poor men. However, as the rich men have not scrupled to support the Bill, I take it that the poor men will be justified also in opposing it. My position is this: I am not able to come to this House and take part in politics if I am to lose money by it. I calculate that if the honorarium should be reduced below £200 I must lose money. I am, however, prepared to make a sacrifice, because I think this is one of those cases in which we should unite in setting an example to the people of the colony. But I do not think the Premier is doing a fair thing by a certain number of members in this House. I refer to the new members. Why should I be fined £60, while the honourable member for Napier, by whose side I usually sit, is to be fined only £5? I think it most monstrously unfair that the new members should be taxed to such an extent, while the older members escape, as far as the present session is concerned. It is all very well to say that we are legislating for many sessions, but I believe we are only legislating for a very short time. I think the people do not want the honorarium permanently reduced; and I believe that directly times improve up will go the honorarium to the old figure. The honourable member for the Thames said he was afraid the reduction would last for a long time, because he was afraid the Ministry would remain on those benches for a long time, and he did not think they would introduce measures which would restore prosperity. I agree with him that if those honourable gentlemen remain on those benches prosperity will be delayed; but I do not think those honourable gentlemen will stay there so long, if they go on as they have been going on. If I may read between the lines, I do not think the Premier is going to continue as he has been proceeding. I think that before many months pass he will—even at the risk of a breach with many of his present friends—come down with some remedial measure to restore prosperity to the colony. The honourable member for Hawke's Bay said payment of members was not in the true interests of democracy. I ask him, does he represent the democratic side of his constituency, or does he represent the anti-democratic side? Each man must speak in this matter for his own constituency. I speak for mine. In the late election I had to struggle against a gentleman of considerable ability and high position. He told the constituency he was in favour of reducing the honorarium to £100 a year, and, as he had sat in Parliament the previous session, he was ready to do the work for £50. I was not ready to do it for £50; certainly not for less than £150. That, of course, was pointed out to the electors; but the electors preferred taking me at £150 or £200 to taking my opponent at the less figure, not because it was a question of ability or position, or perchance I might not have been here, but because they knew that I was a poor man, and that my interests were theirs, and because they did not wish to throw the government of this country into the hands of the property-owning classes. That is why the democracy does not grudge a sufficient honorarium. I do not intend to waste time by protesting against the course which is about to be adopted by the Premier. I know the honourable gentleman too well to imagine that appeals and protests from this side of the House will avail with him. I know that I might protest, or forty members might protest, but so long as the honourable gentleman had forty-four supporters at his back we should be treated with what has been called the "hobnailed boot" policy. I do think we are sent here to protest against what we believe to be mistaken and wrong, and therefore I have taken the liberty to lift up my voice this evening against what I consider to be inimical to the interests of democracy.

Mr. BUXTON.—I intend to oppose the second reading of this Bill, and I shall give a few reasons why I intend to do so. I consider this one of the schemes of retrenchment. I have said a great deal about retrenchment on various occasions in the past, and I differ from many people on this subject. It has been said by a great many that we should retrench from the highest to the lowest. I differ from that. I have always spoken against interfering with the salary of the Governor; not because I know so much about it as to be a proper judge, but because I think it is not in the interests of the colony to do so. I have been very bold in speaking against retrenchment in the lowest grades of the Civil Service. The very lowest I knew anything of was my own salary. I was opposed to a reduction in that. I was a Civil servant for a few years, and my salary was very nearly 4d. a day. I consider that is as low as we can reasonably go. I had to suffer in the reduction some years ago at the rate of 10 per cent., which made me speak about it. I consider that to retrench at the lowest is wrong. I have always stated that, in the interests of the country and reason, no man who is receiving below 10s. a day ought to be interfered with. Sir, I have stated that I considered that whatever Ministry were in power they would reduce their own salaries, because I consider these excessive. Then, coming to the honorarium, I always stated, wherever I spoke, that I should be dead against any reduction in the honorarium. I state to-night, fearlessly, that I consider it is unjust to reduce the present amount of the honorarium. My impression is that the country does not demand it—that we are not expected to do so; or, at least, when I speak of the country I speak of that part of the country from which I come. I stated from the first to the last of the meetings which I addressed that if I were sent to Wellington I should speak against the reduction of the honorarium. I considered it should remain as it was, for various reasons. One reason was that it would enable men who were not in an independent position to be returned to the House; and I use the term "independent" as it has been used by the honourable member for Hawke's Bay; but I scarcely know where those gentlemen are to be found who are in an independent position. According to my idea of independence the rich are as dependent on the poor as the poor are on the rich. The poor need the rich and the rich need the poor. But I consider it is nothing but just that the honorarium should be fixed at such a rate that the working-classes, so to speak, should have an opportunity of being represented in this House by one of their own individual class. I believe there are a great number of men behind our forges and our merchants' counters, and in our stores, who are capable of representing a constituency in this House. There are a great many reasons why I think this honorarium should not be reduced. In the first place, because there are great deductions to be taken from it. We have, first, to reduce our honorarium before we can get it at all. We have to take an amount from it when contesting the elections—we have to mortgage it, so to speak, before we have it in our possession. I was informed, when considering whether I should contest a seat with my opponent or not, what amount it would be likely to cost to enable me to do so, and I was not able to come to a proper decision on the subject. I therefore inquired of two friends of mine—honest and respectable merchants whom I met in Ashburton—and asked their opinion. These gentlemen said, “Well, you had better be careful.” Now, I said, “If you are friends of mine give me your opinion.” They replied, “Well, if you have got £200 or £300 to spare, try it.” Then I thought to myself, “Where is the honorarium? If I have to mortgage it at that rate I had better stand still and say no more.” However, I looked the matter over and over again, and I came to this decision: “If I am not too charitable it need not cost me anything like that amount.” But I have found that a good many gentlemen are very charitable once in three years, and it is that kind of cold charity which stings afterwards for a long time. Charity suffereth long, and I think honourable members very often, when offering for a constituency, are exceedingly charitable, though they do not commit themselves as regards the Corrupt Practices Act. However, I could not afford to be so charitable as that. Taking the line of retrenchment, which was the feeling of the district I come from, I considered I could manage the affair for £50, and I find it is quite reasonable to expect that £50 will be taken on mortgage before one enters the contest. Then, Sir, I know very well, from what I have experienced in Wellington already, if we follow the lines of retrenchment it will take another £50 before we leave Wellington. Therefore, if we have only £200 it is our duty to give our whole time if required to the service of the country, and we have a right to be honestly paid for our services. I hold, with the honourable member for St. Albans, that the district from which I come is not at all opposed to the amount of honorarium now paid, and I promised above everything else I would oppose the reduction of the honorarium, and I do not think that my district will complain of what I am stating, because I know very well that I have left behind me on the banks of the Rangitata a very superior gentleman to myself who was in favour of reducing the salary of the Governor right down to I do not know how far. But I was opposed to this, I still oppose it, and I shall oppose it to the bitter end.

Mr. WITHEY.—I intend to support the second reading of this Bill, but reserve to myself full liberty to vote for certain amendments when it goes into Committee. I cannot agree with those honourable members who have spoken of this measure as being contrary to any great constitutional principle. I do not think it is anything of the kind. It is a mere question of detail—at what amount we shall fix our remuneration. When I came out in the late election it appeared to me perfectly clear that the first thing we had to do was to reduce the expenses of the country; and it seemed to me to follow, as a necessary consequence, that the men who voted for these reductions must themselves set the example by reducing the honorarium. While I thoroughly agree with the democratic principle of payment of members, I do not see why we should be paid a salary; but I think we should be paid a liberal sum for expenses. We are not accustomed to find the members of public bodies receiving salaries; but Chairmen are sometimes paid, because they are practically executive officers, and have to give a large amount of time to the work. The expenses out of pocket should, I think, be met liberally. I hold that wealth is no qualification for the Legislature; I am thoroughly democratic in that. I always objected at Home to the impossibility of any but a rich man being able to take a seat in the House of Commons. Until the last Corrupt Practices Act was passed in England it was an exceedingly costly matter to get into the House, and, seeing that the session lasted for six months in the expensive capital of England, it was hard for a man who could not afford to throw away some £500 or £1,000 a year to sit in the House. I hold that the honorarium should be no inducement to people to come to this House; and, on the other hand, it should be fixed at such an amount that it would prevent no citizen of the country, if his fellow-citizens thought he was a competent man, from sitting in the House. I hold that an honorarium of £210 is an inducement to a considerable number. I know it is a considerable inducement.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Mr. WITHEY.—I am not alluding to any gentleman in this House; but it is quite clear that if a bona fide working-man has to come to this House £210 would probably be the best income he had ever had in his life in one year. I do not think we should look merely at the expenses a member is put to while he is fulfilling his duties in Wellington. Many men—working-men, certainly—would lose their pay during the time they were here, and yet their families must be sustained at home; therefore they should have a sufficient sum to enable them to pay their expenses here and meet their home expenses whilst they are foregoing their wages. I stated several times during the election that it appeared to me that if £1 a day were given during our attendance here, with expenses to and fro, and the payment limited to £100 however long the session lasted, so that there could be no inducement to prolong the session in order to get more pay, that should be sufficient payment. The honourable member for Ashburton coupled two things that appeared to me to be quite incongruous. He said if the number of members were to be reduced that would be sufficient. But he overlooked the fact that the reduction of the number of members is not to take place until after this Parliament, whereas the reduction of the honorarium is proposed to take place at once. I should very much prefer a Bill being passed as the Government propose, rather than the plan of a 25-per-cent. reduction during this Parliament. I believe we want both forms of reduction to be carried out—namely, a reduction in the number of members, and a reduction in the amount of honorarium now and during the next Parliament, and for the future. It appears to me that the country has been entirely over-governed, and that there have been too many legislators and too many officials of all kinds; and there has been a very heavy expenditure annually as compared with the revenue of the colony. After this session, when we begin to go into other matters of legislation, I hope we shall see some means of decentralising, and reducing some of the functions of Parliament, so that a smaller number of members may be able to do the work. I have long seen in England that one great curse of the Parliament there is the fact that they endeavour to do work that ought to be done locally; and I believe, though not to the same extent, that a considerable reduction of the work done here, and an increase of the work done in the localities, would be a great improvement in the direction of economy. The work would be more efficiently done in the localities, because it would be done by people on the spot, who knew the requirements better; and, further than that, it would be an exceedingly useful training for membership in the House afterwards.

Mr. TURNBULL.—I should like to make a few remarks, because, although I perfectly agree that members during the present session should make a reduction in their salaries, yet I must object to this Bill, for I doubt very much whether we shall be doing right in passing it until we know whether the Bill which has just now been circulated—the Representation Bill—is likely to be passed or not. Of course the Premier tells us very plainly that it is to be passed, and, if he says that, I have no doubt whatever he will pass it. But I think, with the honourable members for Waimate and Ashburton, that, if a Bill should be introduced at all, it should be of a suspensory nature. It is all very well to think that the Bill we pass now will be a permanent measure. I think that when we meet next session we shall have to go into very much greater retrenchment, and I do not wish to see a Bill of this nature brought down every session. I should rather see the House pass a Bill reducing the honorarium during this Parliament 25 per cent., or, rather, if it could be so ordered, that the amount might be reduced for the present session, allowing the House to see what the future will be. Members seem to have the idea that they are elected to serve their constituents just while the session lasts, and that as soon as the session is over their duties are over. In my own case the most important part of my duties arises when the House has risen. I look upon myself as the servant of my constituency for the whole year if it requires my services, and no individual has ever come to me without having his business fully attended to. It is not for the protection of members of this House that the honorarium is paid, but for the protection of the constituencies themselves. As far as I myself am concerned, it matters very little, because my expenses were offered to be paid if the honorarium were reduced or taken away altogether. Therefore I am not speaking in a selfish manner, but in the interests of the people, when I say that no reduction of this nature should be a permanent one. Members of this House, and especially town members, have a vast amount of work to do for their constituencies with every department of the Government during the recess. I shall find myself obliged to vote against this measure, because I think it should have simply provided for a reduction of 25 per cent. I am of the same opinion as the honourable member for Auckland Central, that, if the people wish to see men from all classes called to the Legislative Council, the members of that branch of the Legislature should receive the same amount of honorarium as the members of this House. As to the reduction of members of the Legislative Council, I think the Council should be allowed to come down gradually to a certain number, beyond which it should not be raised, except in cases of great emergency, when an increase of the number was considered advisable in the interests of the country. It has been pointed out that the honorarium paid to members of the Legislative Council should not be so much as that paid to members of this House, because they have to incur no election expenses. Still, if candidates abide strictly by the provisions of the Corrupt Practices Act, the election expenses need not be very great. A great many people are under the impression that members are paid whether they attend in their places or not; but I think they should be informed that a proportionate deduction is made for every day a member of either House is absent. If the Bill goes into Committee I shall feel myself bound to vote against it, for this reason: that I think it has not taken the shape it should take. It should apply only to the present session, and be in the shape of a reduction of 25 per cent. I have a very firm conviction that the retrenchment the Government meditate will only have the effect of landing the country in still greater difficulties. It is true that the Bill introduced by the Minister of Lands will probably help the Government. I have no doubt that it will be a temporary relief; but I see no chance of its being a permanent relief. The retrenchment which the Premier intends carrying out will simply drive the adult population from the country. Young men are now leaving the country without a sigh, and look to it without regret. Until measures are taken by which the lands of the country shall be made to produce the wealth that is hidden in their bosom, so long as large tracts of land adjoining our railways are not used and their owners compelled to pay a tax equal to the loss which the State suffers from their not being profitably occupied, there will be no prosperity whatever in this country. With regard to this Bill, looking at the sacrifice which is attempted to be imposed on the Governor, and the reductions which Ministers have made in their own salaries, I think we should go the length of taking 25 per cent. off the honorarium for the present year, and let us wait and see what state the country is in when we meet next year. I am of opinion that, far from being more prosperous, the state of the country will be much more depressed than it is at the present time.

Mr. BRUCE.—It is very difficult to speak at this stage of the debate on a question of this kind without travelling over ground already well trodden; but I wish to make a very few remarks before we come to a division. I just wish to say that I intend supporting the second reading of this Bill, not cordially like the honourable member for Ponsonby, but under pressure, that pressure being the somewhat lamentable financial position of this colony to-day. Now, Sir, I do not wish to be misunderstood in reference to this question. I hold very strongly that the present salary—you may call it as you like—that our annual salary is not a penny too much; and I speak now with a little experience. But, at the same time, I am inclined to believe that, under existing circumstances, it should be reduced to £150, not because of the saving it would effect, for that is only very small; but on account of the moral weight it would give us to retrench in other directions. There is a want of stern retrenchment; but I do not wish our action on this occasion should be taken as a guide or direction to those who follow us in the next Parliament. I think it would have been very much better had the Government arranged matters so as to make this measure apply to this Parliament only, leaving the original statute untouched. It is all very well to say that it can be altered; but we know what an outcry there would be if an attempt were made to raise the honorarium, once it is reduced. There would be a great outcry against its being raised on the part of those who know little about the expenses which members are put to. There is one provision in this measure to which I am very strongly opposed; and that is, that a member of the Upper House resident in Wellington has to give his services for nothing. Is there any liberality in such a proposal as that? Does it not preclude the possibility of poor men being called to that House? Certainly it does. Members have referred to the feelings of their constituents in this matter of the reduction of the honorarium. So far as I could analyse the feelings of the people of my district, it was in favour of a reduction being made in the honorarium; and, in reference to the Upper House, there was a feeling against any salary being paid to its members. I am strongly in favour of the members of the Upper House being paid a salary of £100 a year. Does any honourable member wish wealth alone to be represented there? Supposing, for argument's sake, that a poor man has sat in this House for fifteen or twenty years, and has qualified himself for a seat in that Chamber, why should the country not have the benefit of his ability and experience? But there would be no chance of that poor man being able to accept a seat in that Chamber if he were to receive nothing for his services. I quite agree with the arguments of the honourable member for Hawke's Bay in reference to that matter, although I cannot agree with him in reference to the salaries paid to members of this Chamber. I do not wish to repeat arguments that have already been used, but I feel bound to say that my conviction is that reducing the rate of salary goes in the direction of narrowing the field of selection. I intend to vote for the second reading of this Bill, but I hold myself quite free to vote in Committee for striking out the condition in reference to members of the Upper House resident in Wellington.

Mr. J. McKENZIE.—I am in the same position as the honourable member for Rangitikei, who stated that honourable members rising now cannot possibly find anything to say on this subject that has not been said already. However, I wish to say this in explanation of the vote I shall give: that I shall support the second reading of this Bill, but I think its operation should be limited to the duration of the present Parliament, and the Parliament that will follow this should be left free to act on the subject as it may choose. If the country were in a flourishing condition I should oppose this Bill; but, having arrived at a condition when retrenchment is no longer a matter of choice but is a matter of necessity, I think it is our duty to show a good example ourselves if we expect the large number of Civil servants throughout the country to accept with a good grace the reductions we must inflict. That is my reason for supporting this Bill. One argument used to-night I cannot at all agree with. It was urged that the cost of election should be taken into account when considering the honorarium. That I disagree with entirely. In some electorates there may be, and sometimes are, four or five candidates, of whom only one can possibly be elected; and why should that one have his election expenses borne by the colony, while all the rest have to pay their own? But I think fair consideration should be given to the elected member on account of his having during the recess to go about his district to address the electors and learn their requirements in that way. I think the provision made by the Government, allowing members of this House £50 more than members of the Council on that account, is a very proper provision, and I hope it will be agreed to.

Mr. KERR.—During my election this matter of payment of members was brought up among other questions of retrenchment, and I was able to state that I quite agreed with retrenchment in this as in other expenses. I think, in the present state of the country, it is plainly our duty to take a little off our salaries, as well as to reduce other people; but I am going to vote for the amendment for this reason: that it will reduce our salaries a little more than the Bill itself will, and that it will leave the question open to be decided again next year; and then, I have no doubt, the Government will come down and ask to take a little more off. During my election it was my opponent who brought up this question, and he said he would be willing to come to the House for £150 a year. I pointed out to the electors—and they agreed with me to a certain extent—that if they wanted to send a working-men's representative he would have to be paid, in order to enable him to come to this House, more than £150 a year—£200 a year would be none too much; for I know very well that my expenses are such that, though I am not an extravagant man in any way, the honorarium does not clear me—I do not save a shilling. However, I promised to vote for reduction, and I shall vote for the reduction proposed by the amendment; but I do not think honourable members could come here for less. I think it becomes every man to do what he can for the time being to help the country, just as any of us would do on his own estate. If a man has a farm, and times are bad, he has to cut his coat according to his cloth. I am not one of those who think the colony is going to remain dormant for many years; but I am in hope that the mining industry and other things are going to revive things in the country, and put the colony on its legs again, and that it will be able to pay a fair amount to the men who come to the House. What it is proposed to reduce it to now is not a decent working-man's wages; and I do not think that is what ought to be paid if the country were in a better position. But I think we should make the reduction now; and my opinion is that in another year or two the colony will be well able to afford to restore the old rate. I shall therefore vote for the amendment to reduce by 25 per cent., and I had intended to move an amendment of that sort myself if it had not been done by another honourable member.

Mr. MARCHANT.—There being little new left to say, I will very briefly explain why I shall vote for this Bill. It has been said that £210 is not too much for a member of this House; but certainly the people of the country have an idea that it is ample, and honourable members agree with them when they are before the electors. But I notice that as soon as they get here their ideas become larger. But one thing is very certain, that, as a matter of good example, we are bound to accept this proposal, and take less than honourable members have received before. Ministers have set a very good example in that way: in fact, in one instance I think they have carried the example too far. I think, for instance, that the Premier's salary should not have been reduced below £1,250; and I regret that, owing to the forms of the House, it is not possible to restore it to that now. I think honourable members are bound to accept the £150, as proposed by this Bill; and I think £100 is enough for members of the Council to receive. I grant that the cost of election ought not to be considered when fixing the honorarium; but we undoubtedly are entitled to take into consideration the expenses honourable members are put to during the recess in going about and interviewing their constituents and addressing them, and being put to charges in various unavoidable ways. The honourable member for Ponsonby suggested that £100 a year would be sufficient for a member of this House; but I disagree with that view, more especially as we are told that the number of members is to be reduced to seventy. That alteration will not, I suppose, materially affect such seats as that held by the honourable member for Ponsonby; but it will have the effect of largely increasing the area of some country electorates, and the expenses of members for such districts will be greatly increased. Some of the districts will be made very large indeed, and it will make an enormous difference to the members for those districts, and to think that a member should get less than £150 a year for representing such districts would be absurd. I think the honorarium should be sufficient to enable men of small means to come here, and if it were only £100 a year I have not the least hesitation in saying that in many districts it would be absolutely impossible to find men of small means prepared to contest the seats; or, if they should do so, and should be elected, it would be impossible for them to do their duty as representatives and at the same time to do their duty to themselves and their families. I approve of the proposal of £150 for the House and £100 for the Council, but in Committee I shall propose a provision which will be very unpopular among honourable members, I fear—that is, to abolish the payment for a second session in one year to those honourable members who were paid for the first session. That practice has cost the country this year, I believe, about £10,000, and I cannot see any justification at all for it. I intend to move in that, but I cannot say that I am very sanguine of the result. The honourable member for Rangitikei drew attention to another matter which, I think, will require attention in Committee, and that is, as to the proposed non-payment of members of the Council who live in Wellington. I think those gentlemen should be paid a small sum, say £50, although I am afraid that the forms of the House will not allow a provision to be made to that effect when the Bill is in Committee, as no increase beyond what is proposed in the Bill itself can be entertained. I think it is unfortunate that the Representation Bill was not disposed of before this measure was brought on, for I am bound to say that I think, if the number of members is reduced to seventy, £210 per member will not be a penny too much. If the reduction in number is made, I think the next election should take place with a clear understanding that the new Parliament might restore the honorarium to £210.

Mr. E. RICHARDSON.—I only wish to say a few words to explain the vote I intend to give on this Bill. I intend to vote for the second reading, but with the intention of supporting any amendment making the Bill only apply to the present Parliament. I entirely agree with the honourable member for Ashburton and the last speaker that it is unfortunate that we have not had the Representation Bill down first, so as to let us know what we are about; for I am also of opinion that if the numbers are reduced to seventy there can be no question of the honorarium or payment, or whatever it may be called, at the present time certainly being not one penny too much. I should rather say that it is not enough.

Mr. R. THOMPSON.—So far as I am concerned, I am not pledged in any way as to how I shall vote on this Bill. I made no pledges either on one side or on the other; but, seeing that we have been sent here to carry out a severe system of retrenchment, and knowing the state of the country at the present time, I fail to see how we can support that retrenchment unless we commence with ourselves. Of course I do not for a moment mean to say that £210 is too much to pay members, but I do not see how we can cut down other people unless we cut down our own salaries. I know the feeling of the country is that we should cut down expenses all round, and when the estimates come before the House it is my intention to do so, so far as I can; but, while £210 is not too large a sum, I do not think it is necessary that the honorarium should be fixed so as to make it an inducement to people to seek for election to this House who are not in a position to come here, who would be dependent entirely upon the honorarium. I think that gentlemen who come here should have something more than the honorarium. I know I heard stories during the late elections to this effect: that candidates not only canvassed themselves but sent round their wives and daughters, one argument used to induce persons to vote for them being that unless the candidate gained his election his living would be gone. I do not think that is the right sort of thing to be heard of in connection with our elections. At the same time, I should not cut down the sum paid to such an extent that poor men would be prevented from coming here. Everybody is not wealthy. So far as the Bill before the House goes, I may say that, though there are certain clauses in it which I do not agree with, yet, seeing the state the country is in, I shall support the second reading.

Mr. MILLS.—I think everything has been said that can be said on this Bill, both for and against, and I do not suppose that anything that has been said, or anything that can be said, will alter a single vote, for, no doubt, every honourable member has made up his mind how he will vote, having expressed himself one way or the other during the late election. As far as my experience goes, this question of payment of members formed a very prominent feature in nearly all the elections. I think, indeed, that it was a question to which people gave a great deal of attention, to the exclusion of other and perhaps more important subjects. I intend, I need not say, to support the second reading of this Bill, because I have several times expressed my opinion that the honorarium should be reduced, and also the number of members. And here I wish to say that the Premier, in his reply to observations made by one honourable gentleman, said he would carry the Bill for reducing the number of members, if possible. I did not like the words "if possible," for it seemed to me to imply that the Premier was not sincere in his desire to reduce the number, or, at any rate, that he was not as anxious about it as some of us, who wish to see that measure carried, would like.

Major ATKINSON.—I should like to remove any misapprehension of that sort from the honourable gentleman's mind. I look upon that measure as most important; and the honourable gentleman may interpret my remarks without the "if possible."

Mr. MILLS.—I am glad to have that explanation from the Premier. I and a great many other honourable members look upon the proposal for a reduction of the number of members as a most important measure, because not only will it cause a direct saving in the cost of this House, not only is it demanded by the people, but it will be impossible, in my opinion, to bring about true economy in the government of the country until such a measure as this is carried through. I hope, therefore, that the Premier and those associated with him will press that Bill as determinedly as they did the Land Bill last night. With regard to the remark of the honourable member for Ashburton about the members of the Young New Zealand party not getting seats if there were fewer members in the House, I can only say that I have no doubt that the members of the Young New Zealand party will be as well able to take care of themselves as many of the older members of the House. This reduction of the numbers will necessarily lead to a more complete system of local government, and in the local bodies the young men will come out and show what they are fit for, and so qualify themselves for the higher position of a member of this House. I shall support the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. T. THOMPSON.—Sir, this is a matter on which a great deal can be said on both sides, and I am not prepared to agree with the last speaker that nothing more can be said for and against the Bill. I have listened to pretty well all the speakers, and I must say that I think the remarks made by the honourable member for Rangitikei are most in accord with my opinions on the subject. I am one of those who think that the sum now paid to honourable members is not one penny too much for the services rendered; but, at the same time, I recognise the necessity of honourable members submitting to some sacrifice at a time when we are calling on others to make a sacrifice owing to the necessities of the finances of the colony. I do not agree with those honourable members who think that this measure should have been kept back until the Representation Bill was dealt with; because, whatever may be done with regard to this Bill, I shall vote for that all the same. At the same time, I think we must carefully deal with this question, for there is no doubt that as we reduce the honorarium so, to some extent, do we limit the choice of the electors, and I think that carrying this Bill will tend in that direction. I do not agree with the honourable member for Taranaki when he says that he will be inclined to move in the direction of not paying members for a second session. If that were carried it would still further, in a very marked degree, limit the choice of the electors. No doubt it is an evil to have two sessions in one year: still, I do not think it is wise to go so far as the honourable gentleman suggests. I shall vote for the second reading of the Bill, though there are some matters in it which I do not like, and hope to see amended in Committee.

Mr. LEVESTAM.—The honourable member for Port Chalmers, when speaking just now, said that everything that could be said on this Bill had been said. To show him that he was quite wrong I will mention one clause which has never been mentioned, and that is the clause which provides that members resident in Wellington shall have an increase of honorarium instead of a decrease. Under the present Act members who live within three miles of Wellington receive £140 per annum; but under the Bill before us they are to receive £150, a clear gain to them of £10. I think it is most unfair that, at a time when every one else is to make sacrifices, those who are fortunate enough to reside in Wellington are to have an increase in pay. I would ask what loss it is to those who reside in Wellington to attend Parliament. None. Most of them follow their ordinary avocations during the day-time, never showing up during the afternoon; and in the evening, having no business to do, they come here. That has been the rule, and will be, I presume. Therefore that they should have an increase of pay seems to me most extraordinary, and I do not wonder, taking that into consideration, that not one of the Wellington members has spoken upon this Bill. Now, it has been an object with members of this House for years to get this honorarium settled and fixed by Act. That has been the object, the anxiety, and the wish of honourable members and of Ministers for years. It was always considered very unseemly that honourable members should wrangle here over their own payment. We know that on various occasions amendments have been moved on the sum set down on the estimates, and there are records of instances where those who voted for the reduction took care, first of all, to see how many would be on that side, and when they saw they were safe they voted on that side. We are also told that the people in the country are very largely in favour of such reduction. Now, there is an instance on record where a gentleman, who was and is a member of this House, did not take the honorarium, but left it behind; and what was his reward? He was not returned again. That was a clear proof of how those he represented appreciated his action. I presume they thought he ought to have been the best judge of the value of his services, and that, if they were worth so little, he ought not to be re-elected; and they acted accordingly. Many honourable gentlemen said that they had pledged themselves to their constituents to support the reduction of the honorarium. I hold that the people of New Zealand would accept, mostly, what is argued out to them. In my constituency I had two opponents, and both of them expressed themselves in favour of the reduction of the honorarium to £150, and one, at the last pinch, said he would go for £100. I said to my constituents, "Gentlemen, if I were a rich man, I should take the honorarium and give it away in charity, because I would not be a party to restricting your choice, and I should be taking away from your privileges if I did not accept the honorarium; but, seeing that I am not a rich man, I shall take the honorarium and stick to it;" and they applauded me. The gentlemen who were opposed to me also were applauded, because at that time my constituents had not heard my explanation. The people had been simply told that it was a grand thing, and would reduce the expenditure of the country; but I told them it would be a great injustice to themselves and to the country, and they saw that my explanation was the best. The honourable member for New Plymouth made a remark that I take very great exception to. He said that before we reduce others to penury we should reduce ourselves. I should be very sorry to be a party to reducing others to such an extent as he has described. I say that we should be fair to all men. If we require a man we should pay for his services. The labourer is worthy of his hire, and I should be in favour of paying it. But it is quite true that many people are employed by the colony and receive salaries far in excess of what they ought to have; but, on the other hand, I believe that, if we are to be paid for our services, we are not overpaid, and never have been. It is a very different thing reducing those who are overpaid to legitimate payment, and taking something off our salary and reducing us below legitimate payment. My honourable friend the member for Ponsonby said we had no right to reduce others unless we reduced ourselves; but I maintain that we have been paid too little for our services. It is all very well to say that it is for three months of the year; but my experience for several years has been that it is always four months. Then, it is said that a man can live for so much a week; but, if a man lives here, surely his wife and family must not be left unprovided for! Then, we are told that if a man is away so long his wages come to so much for the rest of the year, when he can be following his ordinary avocation; but it is forgotten that, if a man leaves employment to attend Parliament in Wellington, when he wants to go back he probably finds some one else in his place, and it may be a considerable time before he can find employment again. The same thing happens with tradesmen: business connections are broken during absence, and loss ensues. Then, the honourable member for Ponsonby went on to say that the ability displayed by former Houses before members were paid was as great as the ability displayed now. Sir, the ability may have been as great; but in what direction has that ability been displayed? I may tell him that the ability has been displayed to favour the richer classes of the community.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Mr. LEVESTAM.—Who says "No"? The former Houses gave those long leases in Canterbury and Otago. They removed from the Public Works Act that portion which would have made those districts pay a fair share towards the cost of the public works. It was the former Houses that increased largely the vote for higher education. And I ask honourable gentlemen to look at the division-lists for several years when the education vote was before us. And who sold the Piako Swamp?—although I am afraid it was not a very good speculation to those who bought it. The honourable member for Hawke's Bay made use of the same arguments as the honourable member for Ponsonby used, which arguments I have already answered. Some maintain that members of the other House ought to receive no payment at all, while others think that they should receive the same payment as members of this House. I agree with neither opinion. I think that they ought to be paid, but not to the same extent as members of this House, because the duties that devolve upon them are very much less than the duties that devolve upon members of this House. A member of the Legislative Council simply attends the session if it suits him, and if he has anything that will pay him better he does not come; but a member of this House must come to represent the people by whom he has been elected. Then, members of this House have their time continually encroached upon by their constituents, and especially is that the case with those who represent town constituencies. There is hardly a week in which some of my constituents do not come to me with grievances, and some people have no idea how long a man takes to explain a grievance. Not long before I came to Wellington one of my constituents came to me to tell me of a grievance that was eighteen months old, and I listened to him patiently for three-quarters of an hour, though I could have explained the case in ten minutes; and two or three days after that he came about it again. I think it is reasonable that members of the Legislative Council should be paid something less than members of the House of Representatives. Some say that the members of the Legislative Council should not be paid at all; but that presupposes that all the members of the Legislative Council should be wealthy men, and there is no reason that I can see why a man who has earned his bread by the sweat of his brow should not be a member of the Legislative Council. If that proposal were carried into law it would debar such a man from holding a seat there, and I think everybody will see at once that that would be unfair. We have been told by several honourable members that as good men can be got under the reduced honorarium as can be got now. It is quite possible the men might be as good, but I am not certain that we could get men to represent as acceptably the mass of the people. I hold that no man can represent a class whose interests are not identical with his own interests. I hold that it is impossible for a man who has been reared in the lap of luxury to represent the views of the working-classes. His surroundings have been so different and his tastes are so different that he has, in fact, nothing in common with them; and, even with the greatest desire to represent them fairly, I say he could not do so. A very good instance of that was supplied by the Premier when he brought forward his compulsory-insurance scheme. The honourable gentleman said on that occasion that for those people who had daughters and could afford to keep them at home, but could not afford to pay 1s. a month for them, he had no compassion; let them send the girls to service. That shows how little he understood of the feelings and requirements of the humbler classes. Supposing a woman has a daughter who has grown up to the age when the honourable gentleman wanted her to pay her quota to the insurance fund, it might well be that, though the mother was unable to pay that, she requires her help, and could not turn her out to service. The honourable gentleman forgets that the mother has perhaps reared a large family, that she is probably weak and, becoming aged, requires the help of her daughter. I have adduced that instance to show that persons who do not really understand the wants of the humbler classes cannot properly represent them, and, in proof of that, I have shown that the Premier, who does not belong to that class, has misunderstood their requirements. I would point out now, as has already been pointed out by the honourable member for Parnell, that members of this House are not in the same position as people outside: that is to say, the avenues to earning a livelihood are greatly reduced in the case of members of this House. The money which is earned by the working-classes is largely got from money expended by the Government, but members of this House are precluded by the Disqualification Act from earning any of that money. Supposing a contract for manufacturing an article or for forming a piece of road is to let, a member of this House cannot take that contract, although it might be part of his usual business. I have known persons who have had to give up contracts for that reason, and I also know of one person who resigned his seat because he thought he was slightly infringing on the Act. It has been said that the Representation Bill ought to have been placed before us before we were called upon to vote on this Bill; but I do not know that that matters very much so far as I am concerned, because I told my constituents that I would vote against both these Bills. As has been pointed out by other honourable members, the reduction of the number of members of this House would greatly increase the work thrown on members. The honourable member for St. Albans asked why old members should be fined only £5 and new members £60. What we receive is not a payment of members, but honorarium for the duties we perform during the session, and it follows naturally that, if we perform those twice during the year through there being two Parliaments, we are entitled to two honoraria; and I ask, where is the fairness to those who have been here in a previous session that they should only get half for the second session? They have to perform the same duties as the new members, and therefore they are entitled to the same pay. If the two sessions a year were in the same Parliament, it might be just enough. I shall vote against this Bill, as I told my constituents I would do so.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES.—I consider this Bill is very inconsistent. I do not disapprove of the Bill in one sense; but I think it ought to be put on the same footing as the Governor's Salary and Allowances Bill: that is to say, it should apply to members coming after us, and should be reserved for the Royal assent. I consider this is obtaining members under false pretences. We have stood our elections, and, now we come here, we are to have our payment reduced from two hundred guineas to £100. I quite recognise the necessity for retrenchment, but I think the honourable gentlemen on the Government benches have gone too far in the reductions they have made in their own salaries. I dare say the honourable gentleman at the head of the Government will live to rue the day he did it. It is not this reduction of the payment of members—I like to call a spade a spade, and payment, and not "honorarium," is the proper name for it—that will bring this country into a state of prosperity. We are told, in the first place, that the Premier point-blank refuses to bring down a revision of the tariff; and, in the next place, he tells us that we are to vote the estimates en bloc, and he refuses to let us study them in detail, or to show where the reductions are to be made. As I say, I think the honourable gentleman is very quixotic in reducing his own salary from £1,750 to £1,000, and that he is wrong in reducing the payment of members from two hundred guineas to £100; and I ask him now whether he will bring down his estimates with a reduction of 25 per cent. on all salaries over £150. If he does that, I am sure the House will not object to it, and it will receive the approbation of the whole country. But I am convinced that when we come to revise the estimates we shall find very few salaries touched to any great extent. Had the honourable gentleman brought down a proposal for a revision of the tariff, and for introducing Protection, and for altering the incidence of taxation and putting the saddle on the right horse, there would have been no necessity whatever for this drastic measure of retrenchment that he proposes on his own salary and on that of members of this House. I contend that if the honourable gentleman had brought down measures of taxation which the country is crying out for—that is to say, if he had made property pay its fair share of taxation—there would have been no necessity for the cry of retrenchment which has been raised. But we find that the great property-holders and the great moneyed institutions are those that get off scot-free under the proposals of the honourable gentleman; and we are asked to retrench ourselves, and Ministers have to reduce their own salaries, in order that those people may get off. The honourable member for Selwyn, I think, in speaking the other day, said that many people in New Zealand have obtained wealth through thrift and industry. I am proud to think that there are so many in the country who have done that; but the greater proportion of the wealthy classes in New Zealand have not obtained their wealth in that way. It has been gained by fortuitous circumstances, and by the peculiar condition of things introduced by the Immigration and Public Works Act. And, further, I may say that many have accumulated wealth by that process which has been known in Canterbury as gridironing. It is upon those persons that the burden should be placed. We saw a very interesting return laid on the table the other evening of absentees, and the amount of personal and real estate held by them in New Zealand, which it was shown came to between $8,000,000 and $9,000,000. I say, if the Premier, who has a greater knowledge of the finances of the colony than any other man in this House, inasmuch as he can double figures and transpose them in different directions better than any man I know, had taken a far-seeing view of the necessities of the colony, and had taken the incidence of taxation off the poorer classes and placed it on the shoulders of the richer classes, there would have been no necessity to ask that we should reduce the payment to members, and Ministers' salaries to the very paltry sum their honourable gentlemen are now asking for those services. I contend that the payment of members is one of the most vital principles of a democratic community. I have the honour to represent the largest, the wealthiest, and the most intelligent constituency in New Zealand. I stand here and say, without fear of contradiction, that I represent the largest, wealthiest, and most intelligent constituency in New Zealand. I had the honour of being returned unopposed. When I went before my constituents to seek their suffrages I told them that £210 was altogether too small, and that the honorarium should be £300 a year; and they quite agreed with me. I think that the colony at large, if it were polled to-morrow, would be only too glad, if they could only get men who would stick to their election-pledges, and act consistently, to give them £300. What do we find? We find honourable members on the platform make certain pledges. They say they will go in for reducing taxation on the working-classes, and will put it on the shoulders of those who are best able to pay it. We find that when members come into this House they are "had," and the result is, they go quite contrary to their election-pledges. If honourable members would only stick to the pledges they make on the hustings their services would be cheap at £300 a year. I trust I have made myself particularly well understood, that I am going to vote against the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. WARD.—I do not desire to detain the House unnecessarily at this late hour, but I am anxious to say a word or two upon this measure. When I first read the clauses of this Bill I was much pleased to believe that the pledges which I had given to my constituents were about to be consummated if this Bill became law; but, upon looking into the measure, I regret to say I am somewhat disappointed; and, until I hear one or two explanations upon certain points I am now about to bring under the notice of the House, I shall feel it incumbent upon me to vote against the Bill and to support the amendment. I will endeavour to explain to the House why. What I take exception to, in the first instance, is this: The members who had the honour of representing Wellington under the present Act received £140 for a single session, and, if that Act were to continue in force now, they would receive for this, it being a second session, £70. Under this Bill, instead of receiving £70, I find that they are to receive £100, or £30 more than they would have received under the existing Act. I do not think that is right. Moreover, apart altogether from this session, those honourable gentlemen in future undoubtedly will receive £10 more per session than they did formerly. That, I also say, is wrong, and is against the spirit and intention of a proper reduction. Then, again, the old members of the House are very much better off under the proposed alterations than the new members. Half the honorarium at £210 is £105; and, so far as I can see, the new members will suffer to the extent of £60. I, for one, am quite prepared to sacrifice £60 for the whole of this Parliament, but I do think the old members should bear a fair proportion of the reduction as well as the new members. I am unable to understand why the Bill did not provide that the honorarium was to be £150 in one sum, instead of dividing it and calling honorarium £100 and expenses £50. If that were the case, there could be no doubt about it that the older members would receive £75 for this session, being half honorarium. It looks as though the amounts were divided for the specific purpose of saving the old members. If the Bill were in that direction I would give it my hearty support, because, as a matter of fact, I stated, when contesting my election, that I believed £150 was quite sufficient until the circumstances of the colony became more prosperous, for members of this House to be paid more; but I entirely disagree with the Bill as it is now, because it seems to me that the old members should receive £75 for this session and the new members £150; and I cannot get away from the fact that the old members are to be benefited to the extent of £25 this session at the expense of the new members. It may not be uninteresting to know what the total reductions will be as the Bill stands at present. There are sixty old members at £105, £6,300; thirty-three new members at £210, £6,930; total, £13,230, less the four Wellington members, £140. Under the new Bill there will be sixty old members at £100, £6,000; thirty-three new members at £150, £4,950: that is, £10,950 under the new Bill, as against £13,090 under the existing Act. The total reductions this session only amount to some £2,000. That does not meet the ideas of the part of the colony from which I come. The directions in which I think alterations should be made may be Committee objections; but, in the meantime, I think the safest course to pursue is to vote for the amendment of the honourable member for Kumara, which reduces the new members to £150, and also treats the old members on the same basis, and reduces their honorarium this session, which means a further saving to the colony of £1,500; while the Bill now before us does not effect any saving further than that made by taking £5 each off the old members.

Mr. TAIWHANGA.—I have no faith in this retrenchment. When I was here in 1876 I heard the cry for retrenchment; but what I saw in the papers here was all nonsense. I think that any man who is a good workman should receive good pay. I may point out that the Chief Judge of the Native Land Court receives £1,000, and the Maori assessor receives only £20. The minor Judges get £600, and the poor assessor only gets £1 a day while the Court sits. It is just the same with all other Native affairs. When I was in Auckland at the time of the elections they formed what they called a Political Reform Association. I was a member of that association, and in our debates I used to tell them it was useless for them to cry out for retrenchment of the honorarium and Ministers' salaries, because I said, If Ministers and members were worth it, why should not they have it? If they are not worth it, let the people turn them out. As to the honourable gentlemen in favour of the Bill, I have no faith in what they say. I may say I have three Bills before the House, and it seems to me there is no hope for them. Not one of them has passed its second reading. The mouths of some honourable members refuse the money, but their hearts want it and more. The Premier and the Native Minister and the other members of the Government ought to have good salaries, because they are worth them. Let them have fair and proper salaries. If they are not worth it, what are they there for? They will put other people in in order to carry out the public works. The other night we lost nearly £1,000. The public does not know that. I do not wish to detain the House any longer, but I will say a few words about the other House. I think we cannot do without an Upper House. I heard some honourable members were trying to do away with the Upper House. In England there are a House of Lords and a House of Commons; in New Zealand there are a Legislative Council and a House of Representatives. If they told me they were going to do away with the House of Lords in England I would say, Do away with the Legislative Council here. But I think both Houses work for the country equally;

they both make Bills for the good of the country, and I do not think the Upper House should be cut down.

Mr. JONES.—I wish to say in a few words that I intend to fulfil my election-pledges and to vote for the second reading of this Bill. During the course of the late election there was a universal opinion throughout the country, including my district, that great retrenchments ought to be effected, and that that had become inevitable owing to the extravagant scale of expenditure that had been followed in this country for a long time past, and that we should have to come down to something like an expenditure commensurate with our revenue. The district was of opinion that these retrenchments should be radical, and, among many things, they were strongly of opinion that the honorarium of members should share in the retrenchment. Now, for my part, I must say that I very strongly supported the views of my constituents, and certainly urged them on in their demands for these retrenchments, because I felt very much of this opinion: that, unless the country was very clear and decided in expressing its views on retrenchment, the retrenchment proposals which came before the House would fall very far short of the country's requirements; and I felt satisfied, and unexpectedly satisfied, at the views which the Government have taken in reference to retrenchment generally. They certainly have exceeded my expectations in the extent of their retrenchment proposals. I say they have a most difficult task in hand, which will try all their powers of administration to carry out successfully, and, so far as lies in my power, I shall be willing to assist them in carrying out this very difficult task. But I am certainly of opinion that the retrenchments that are about to take place are not going to enrich the country; they are not going to restore the prosperity of the country as some people seem to imagine. They will inflict a great deal of hardship on the people, and it will take all the tact and discretion and judgment of the Government to carry it out in such a way as will avoid the infliction of tremendous hardship and loss to a great many people. With regard to the business immediately before the House, if it had not been for the very peculiar and disadvantageous position of the colony I, for one, should not have been willing to consent to a reduction in the honorarium of members, because I think, if the country were in an ordinary condition, the sum is only sufficient to meet the requirements of the case. But for the sake of example it is now necessary to make a considerable reduction. I see that Ministers have taken what to my mind is a most extraordinary step in the way of setting an example. I cannot help thinking that the reduction in the salaries of Ministers is something quite unprecedented, and shows a wonderful self-abnegation on their part, especially in the case of the Premier, whose salary, I think, should be fixed at not less than £1,500, because I think a man in his position is fairly entitled to that amount. I may say I do not think we are right in making this Bill apply to all time. I think the most we ought to do is to apply it to the present Parliament. I trust that the colony will soon improve its position and recover from the depression we are now suffering from. I gave a pledge to my constituency that I would support all these reductions, and therefore I consider I am only doing my duty in voting for the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. TAYLOR.—I cannot agree with the last speaker in asserting that the Ministry have made any sacrifice at all; because my contention is this: that the people in this colony have been living too extravagantly for some time past, and the salaries have been altogether too high. The retrenchment should not only apply to Ministers, but to all alike; so that there is no more being sacrificed by Ministers than we have a right to expect from them. And I trust the Ministers will not be over-flattered by the praise in that direction, because I have heard it reported that some of the Ministers are rather sorry they have made this extraordinary reduction, and they think that £1,000 is little enough now. If it was simply a leap in the dark, or a bid for popularity, it is not right for Ministers to regret the action they have taken. But, as far as the question under discussion is concerned, I have no objection to the £150, but I cannot see why it should be divided. Moreover, I am not prepared to pledge those who may come after me. I believe in the payment of members; and when I hear honourable members get up and denounce the system, and say that when honourable members got paid less the government of the country was carried on better, we know that the profits made by those gentlemen in those days were something enormous. What does it matter to a gentleman coming to this House and giving his services for two or three months if by influencing the legislation of the country he can, either directly or indirectly through his friends, mop up thousands of pounds' worth of the people's lands? I think it is very unfair of gentlemen of that stamp to denounce and protest against the payment of members, and I must say I trust we shall hear no more about it, because those gentlemen who protest so much are simply a sham. What do the returns show that were laid on the table last session? That one of the richest men in the colony drew £40 or £50 because he was sick for a few days. That is a thing I would never do.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Name.

Mr. TAYLOR.—I have no right to name. If the honourable member will look into the document he can ascertain the name for himself. My contention is this: that the gentlemen who protest so much about the great deficiency, when they charge in that way for services not absolutely rendered, do that which is wrong. If they had left that sum in the Exchequer it could have been better spent in employing a few men. You will find these gentlemen taking the very last penny they are entitled to, and sometimes more; and I do hope that in the future we shall not have so much protesting, but a little more consideration in dealing with these matters. Now, with reference to the number of members, I voted last session in the direction of reducing the number; but I say, if we are going to have a reduction, the Provincial District of Canterbury will have to have a sharper man on the Commission than we had in the past. What was the result of this last Commission? We were deprived of a member and a half simply through putting on a man whom they call non-political—a man with no political feelings. Were the other two gentlemen of non-political feelings? No. That is where we were victimised by honourable gentlemen who preached about members being non-political and unbiassed.

Mr. TAIPUA.—Mr. Speaker, I am not going to give a silent vote on this matter. I should like to say that I was not sent here by my constituents to plead for a sum of money for myself. Rather was I sent here to do what I could for the benefit of the Natives and their land. Now, however, a Bill has been brought before this House affecting the honorarium of honourable members, I have no objection to urge against this Bill, none whatever. I am all the more indifferent on account of the charges that are made by the Native people against members who come to this House. They say they are attracted here sometimes in the hope of getting their honorarium, and that they come here for that purpose. The present Government have stated very forcibly, at the commencement of the session, that there must be rigid retrenchment, general retrenchment for the sake of the colony. This is a practical test of the promises made by the Government, a step in the direction of retrenchment. I desire to express my gratification to the Government for, in the first place, having proposed such a large reduction in their own salaries; secondly, their promise to retrench generally; and, thirdly, the proposed reduction of the honorarium. The Government do not intend to spare any one. Honourable gentlemen object to the reduction on the plea that it will prevent poor men from coming to this House. I do not think this House should be made the resort for rich men or for poor men. I think this House should be composed of members who should be selected on account of their wisdom rather than on account of any other qualifications. Since I have been in this House I have heard that honourable members have obtained their seats by the liberal expenditure of money. I do not think that this means should be used in selecting members for this House; but members should be selected on account of their knowledge and other qualifications. The amount of the honorarium is a matter of perfect indifference to me. The Government propose to retrench, and I will support them in their proposals. The question of the honorarium is a very little matter to me. I am far more anxious that good laws should be passed for the Natives and their lands. I have been personally informed that it is the intention of the Government to reduce the number of Native members. Now, that is a perfectly different matter, and I regret it very much. I do not think this proposal is a wise one. I think there is not one too many of us here to carry out the necessary legislation. This is not carrying out the spirit of the Premier's speech when he said there should be one law for both races. If one Native member is taken away from this House it would be better to do away with the special Maori representation altogether. It will be too one-sided altogether. If there are only three Maori members they would be utterly lost among so many European members. I also regret that there are so few Maori members, because I feel they have no chance in carrying out the legislation they consider necessary. If good laws are passed for the Maori people I shall not at all regret if the whole of the honorarium be taken away. I shall not support the proposition for reducing the number of Maori members.

Mr. BLAKE.—I pledged myself to vote for a reduction of the honorarium to £150 per session, but two or three days ago I wrote out an amendment which I intended to propose, but I am quite sure it would be useless to put it to the House, because I feel tolerably sure that my amendment would not be carried, as it goes very much further than the one proposed by the honourable member for Kumara. Therefore I must put it by as a bad job. The amendment I intended to propose was simply that the members of Parliament should, with regard to these three sessions, have nothing, and I intended that through hearing a great number of gentlemen express their disinterestedness round this House. They were flaunting their patriotism to me, and asking me to make things as cheap as possible for the good of the country. As I said before, I know it would not be carried, because so many honourable members have objected to vote for the amendment of the honourable member for Kumara. I do not see that there is any virtue in reducing it to £150. They are neither backing up what they say, nor reducing the honorarium as low as they should under the necessities that press upon us, and I think that many honourable gentlemen who have been speaking to-night have been speaking simply for talking's sake. I believe in a member like the honourable member for Nelson, who says he does not intend to go in for anything less than two hundred guineas. Those are his opinions, and he sticks to them, and therefore I respect him for his opinions. But I have an opinion that we ought to serve for less; but, then, it is useless for me to propose it, seeing that so many will not vote for the amendment of the honourable member for Kumara: so I think I shall go with the majority this time, because in doing so I shall be keeping my election-pledges to the letter, and shall vote for the reduction to £150 per session. I am rather sorry I had no show of carrying my amendment. If the amendment of the honourable member for Kumara is lost I shall be very glad to see my own carried, and I am just in the position to move it, because I am one of the most impecunious members in the House.

Dr. NEWMAN.—As to the present rate of pay of members, I would rather see a Bill entitled "Payment of members." It is a better and more honest title. I think the present rate of pay is about what the country should afford; but, as we are going to make reductions all round, it would be preposterous and indecent to continue the same rate to members of this House while everybody in the country will suffer very largely. As to this oversight on the part of the Government with regard to the Wellington members, nobody would suppose that the honourable member for Te Aro, the honourable member for Wellington South and Suburbs, and myself would agree to accept an increase because of an oversight on the part of the Government. These little taunts are all very absurd, that the Government could have any purpose whatever in giving us £30 more, or that we should accept it for the mere sake of the money. I think the Bill is incomplete, because, while sixty members of this House are to suffer a reduction of £5 only, there are thirty-five who will lose £60 each.

Major ATKINSON.—They do not lose anything; they were elected on the understanding that the honorarium would be reduced.

Dr. NEWMAN.—They were under no such pledge. They were under a pledge to get what retrenchment they could. It is clear that the thirty-five new members are going to lose £60 and that the sixty old members are going to lose a five-pound note apiece. That is such an absurd anomaly that I am quite sure it will be altered in Committee. The whole of the old members ought to suffer a reduction equivalent to £60, the same as the new members. This Bill is very useful, because it will apply to other sessions. I think the Government should bring in clauses showing an equality of sacrifice by every member, and should not show favouritism to some of them. I think the arrangement for the other Chamber is, in many ways, a right one. When gentlemen are nominated to the Legislative Council they get away from the electors for the rest of their lives and get an uncommonly easy billet. But the work performed by members of this House is of a very different character. In my own case I find that scarcely a day out of the three hundred and sixty-five goes by, even a Sunday, without doing some work in my representative capacity. Therefore I think it is right that a certain extra allowance should be made to members of this House. I quite agree with an honourable gentleman who has said to-night that the number of double sessions is altogether preposterous; and, if I had my way, I would refuse a dissolution at any time, but let the three-years Parliament run its course; and, if the members of the House could not agree as to who should be Ministers, let them fight it out amongst themselves until one side wins. I think these dissolutions and double sessions put the country to an utterly useless and unnecessary expense. It has now been done time after time, and many thousands of pounds are spent merely to give half a dozen honourable gentlemen who sit on those benches a few weeks or months more of office. They always appeal to the country, thinking Parliament is wrong in condemning them, and they always come back "slated." In fact, at each dissolution we pay some £30,000 merely to let a few defeated Ministers cling to office a little longer.

Mr. PARATA.—I think it is a mistake to reduce the honorarium. There is no use in honourable members concealing their thoughts. It is best for us to say out what we think. I do not find fault with those honourable gentlemen who pledged themselves to the electors to vote for reduction. I respect them for being consistent and keeping to their pledges. As to myself, I am quite free to vote either way, because I gave no pledge. I was sent here to do the best I could for the Native people, and also to support such measures as I thought were for the benefit of the Europeans. As to the statement that honourable gentlemen in this House receive a very large amount from the funds of the colony, I do not begrudge the amount paid in honoraria, because I think they are well entitled to what remuneration they get for coming here to do the best they can for the colony. I think all honourable members should be in the same category, no matter whether they are rich or poor. Honourable gentlemen are selected by their constituents and sent here on account of their qualifications to fill the office. I think that very large sums of public money are wasted in other ways in a far more objectionable manner than the honorarium. As an instance, there was a large sum paid recently to the Commissioners who defined the electoral districts, and now there is a Bill before the House to undo all that those Commissioners did—the Bill to reduce the number of members—and that will entail further cost. Another way in which public money is wasted is in making unprofitable railways, which can give no return whatever for the outlay. Much of the money that has been spent on making railways and roads might just as well have been thrown into the sea, for all the use it is. It is quite unjust to say that payment of members puts a burden on the colony. Honourable gentlemen sent here are fully entitled to the honorarium they receive, because a great many calls are made on them, and their services are required from one year's end to the other; they constantly have to go over their districts to visit their constituents, and are put to great expense. I am sure honourable members are not attracted here for the sake of the honorarium they get; they come here for the good of their constituents. As for the proposal to reduce the pay of Ministers, the Premier is to receive £1,000 a year and travelling and other allowances, and the other Ministers £800 each and travelling and other allowances, which will bring the total up to about £1,400 each; and I am afraid that the result will be very little saving under that head, as the allowances will make it up to as much as Ministers are entitled to draw now. I am afraid there will be very little real saving effected by reducing Ministers' salaries, as they will not remain in Wellington all the time, but will travel round the colony and get a large amount as travelling-allowance. I think it is quite right that they should travel over the country and make themselves acquainted with the requirements of the people. It is far more satisfactory that Ministers themselves should go and see what is required than to trust to official communications, but I do not think there will be any real saving on account of the reduction of their salaries. I do not approve of the proposal to reduce the amount of honorarium paid to members of the Legislative Council. I think those honourable gentlemen should receive the same amount as we receive, as they have the welfare of the colony at heart as much as we have. These are the reasons why I oppose any reduction in the honorarium. My own opinion is that there should be no reduction, and that old and new members should be treated alike, because they are all on the same footing. With regard to what has been said by the honourable member for the Western Maori District as to the number of Maori members, when that measure comes before the House I will say what I think about it.

Mr. W. P. REEVES.—May I make a personal explanation? I was one of those pledged to make considerable reductions, and voted for the amendment of the honourable member for Kumara. Of course, that having been negatived, I shall vote for the second reading of the Bill.

HOROMONA PAATU.

The Hon. Mr. TAIAROA, in moving the motion standing in his name, said that Horomona Paatu was a man of rank. His ancestors for some generations back had been chiefs, and for seven generations back they had lived on the Aparima Reserve. He would not say any more at present, except that he wished the report of the Committee to be adopted.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That the report of the Native Affairs Committee on Petition No. 18, of Horomona Paatu, be agreed to, and that immediate effect be given by the Government to the recommendations made therein."—(Hon. Mr. Taiaroa.)

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS said he thought that, before the Council agreed to accept the motion of the honourable gentleman, it was right he should call attention to some of the circumstances that were brought before the Select Committee. It appeared from the report of the Committee that the petitioner, in common with a number of other members of his tribe, received allotments of the land, and it was intended at the time that they should receive ten acres for each man, woman, and child who were interested. But, owing to circumstances, it was found that they could not receive more than seven acres and a half each, or thereabouts. It subsequently appeared that the petitioner received about seven acres of town land and some occupation land—in all, about twenty-eight acres. The petitioner subsequently gave to relations or friends—probably, relations—the greater portion of his land—all the town land except a quarter-acre, and some of the cultivation land—leaving himself a very small quantity. He did not think this act on the part of the petitioner would be taken in the same light as a similar act on the part of a European,—as a giving-away. But it had a bearing on the present motion. The Committee had recommended that the whole of the remainder of the Aparima Reserve, about fifty-nine acres, should be given to the petitioner as an equivalent. Therefore he thought it his duty to point out what did not appear in the report of the Committee, as he believed, and that was that there were forty-four persons interested in the unallotted residue of this reserve, and that their shares in it were proportionate. It would therefore be clear that these persons must be provided with land to satisfy the claim they would naturally have if this motion were carried and given effect to, or that the petitioner should have land, not being part of the Aparima Reserve, in order to satisfy the claim which the Committee seemed to think he had. He had scarcely known whether it would be best for the Committee to review their report, or that they should hear what was further to be said, and act accordingly. But, as at present advised, it did not seem to the Government that, on the face of the report, the motion of his honourable friend should be acceded to.

The Hon. Mr. RICHMOND said that his honourable friend, in speaking of the area of land first allotted to the petitioner, had forgotten to state that this land was allotted not to him personally, but really to three sharers—himself, his wife, and his daughter; and that he was the head of the tribe, a matter that was overlooked entirely in the scarcity of land in the division of the lots. As had been said, it was not the same thing for a Maori chief to give his land as it would be for an ordinary European. Any one who had the slightest knowledge of Maori habits must know that in a great many matters the chief is the channel by which gifts pass to the tribe. In this particular case, the chief appeared not to have given away to outsiders, but to persons who had legitimate claims upon him, according even to European notions. He would direct attention to another statement of his honourable friend, to the effect that the land proposed in the report to be given to Horomona Paatu was the whole remainder of the reserve. Though it was the whole of the reserve which could be made use of, there was a good deal of sand and swamp on the land, and, as honourable gentlemen would see, the swamp was not property that could be handled by a communistic society; it must be dealt with by one person to be of any value at all. He might state what his own idea was in agreeing with the report in its present form; but he would not pledge the Committee generally to the same opinion. He thought this would be an auspicious day for impressing upon the Government the necessity of dealing more liberally, even now, at this hour, with the former owners of the southern part of the Middle Island, as the Council would be asked to-day to appropriate six or seven millions of acres to one gambling scheme. It must be admitted that the conduct of the Government had been frequently exceedingly shabby, and there were a number of claims continually arising of a similar kind. There were others that the Committee had to report upon during the present session; and that being the case, and believing that the matter ought to be disposed of, he thought they would not be doing wrong in bringing the matter forward in this form. It was proposed to give fifty acres of swamp, which in most parts of New Zealand is not a very great gift. He himself had four hundred acres of swamp, which he would be happy to part with to anybody on easy terms. The action followed in the past in this matter had appeared to him to be that of keeping the word of promise to the ear but breaking it to the hope. He hoped the motion would be agreed to, not as approving the particular gift, but as a measure of what was due, and as a pledge of the Council and the Government to do all in their power to dispose of the whole of these cases. It was a duty which the Government owed to these people, and which they were bound to take up.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL thought no public harm could possibly be done by the adoption of this report. The Hon. Mr. Stevens appeared to have lost sight, for a time, of the alternative recommendation that had been made—that, instead of giving this to the petitioner, the unallotted portion of the block, the value of the land elsewhere should be given. It would be a source of trouble if the Government were to give the petitioner the remainder of the block, because all the co-proprietors in the reserve at Aparima had a proportionate claim to the lands. It would be much better to deal with this case separately. There was no doubt that the petitioner was now, from having been the head man and one of the most prosperous men in the place, one of the very poorest. His gifts were originally simply from friendly intentions to the people with whom he lived; but, by degrees, circumstances developed to such an extent that when the Court sat these people came forward and got the Crown grants for the land, and many of these people were half-castes and were not strictly in sympathy with the aborigines; and he thought this was extremely unfair. When the Aparima Reserve was set apart by himself it was set apart in the narrowest dimensions he could persuade the Natives to consent to, because the position of it was such that it must necessarily be acquired as town land. In the subsequent reserves he made at Oraka and at Kawakaputaputa they were apportioned not in strict proportion to the population, but because no such reason for rigid economy existed. He had heard a rumour that it had been proposed to the Government, or by the Government, to make a further reserve on the west bank of the Wainau in order to satisfy the people who were deprived of their lands. He thought the petitioners' wants might very likely be provided for there. But he would urge upon the Government the propriety, in common honesty, of dealing liberally with these people. We had acquired a tract of thirty million acres of land at an average expenditure of a penny for eight acres. In that were included the Provinces of Canterbury, Otago, and Southland—eight acres for a penny. Out of that, Lyttelton was formed, Christchurch was formed, and Dunedin was formed, also Timaru and Invercargill; and now surely the Government could afford to give a sufficient amount of space for these people to die, if not to live, upon out of the enormous profits made out of those lands. He knew that the Government considered the alternative proposal was of a grave nature. He pointed out that the adoption of this report would simply have the effect of impressing on the Government the claims of these Natives. He hoped the Government would permit the resolution to pass.

The Hon. Mr. HOLMES was very glad that the Hon. Mr. Mantell had made the statement to the Council to the effect that he, as agent for the Government, had purchased a great portion of the Middle Island at the cost of eight acres per penny, and yet the Government had failed to make provision for the Natives who formerly owned it, who were now in the position of paupers. He considered this was a great shame, as it was not for the want of the means to make restitution. Whether the Natives had claims or not, their position deserved to be considered. There was a superabundance of land within a moderate distance of where these Natives resided. There was land in the valley of the Waiau to the east, and on the west side there was a good deal of land where Natives could be settled. He thought there could be no difficulty in giving them satisfaction in the shape of land, and the Government ought to take the matter into consideration.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS felt perfectly satisfied that the Government would endeavour to act justly in connection with these reserves, and he thought it would be the best course to leave them to deal with the matter; and, with this view, he would move, as an amendment, to strike out all the words of the motion after the word "be," in order to insert the following: "referred to the Government for its careful consideration." He presumed the Council could hardly pass such a motion as the present one in the face of the remarks of the Hon. Mr. Stevens. If the matter were left to the Government for their consideration, and if the petition was a just one, he had no doubt that they would give effect to it.

The Hon. Mr. TAIAROA wished to say a few words with regard to the proposed amendment. He hoped the honourable member who moved it would remember that if they treated the matter in this way there would be nothing done by the Government, and none of the demands of the Natives would ever be fulfilled. It must be well known to honourable members that the land referred to belonged to the Maoris, and more particularly to Horomona Paatu. When the Hon. Mr. Mantell was at Aparima, at the time of the purchase, he found Horomona Paatu there, and it was at his request that this reserve was made. He then demanded that this land should be reserved to himself and his heirs, and to his relatives who were living there with him. The difficulty in this matter had arisen from the fact that the Government had appointed a Commissioner, Mr. Commissioner Mackay, in the year 1874.

He was to go round and subdivide these lands to the persons for whom they had been reserved. Persons living at Kawakaputaputa, New River, and Oraka were admitted into these lands at Aparima; and Mr. Mackay also inserted as owners the names of half-castes who belonged to Rangiura. These half-castes had already received eight acres apiece under an Act passed for the purpose, and the other Natives had also received land in other places, but Horomona had not received any other land. Horomona was at a loss to know why these persons, who belonged to other places, had got possession of his land, and he was left with only fourteen acres. Although Horomona was the principal man there, he had only this small piece of land, and this was covered with sand, so that he could not make a living out of it. The fifty acres proposed to be given to Horomona was of no great value. It was covered with swamp and water. He hoped the honourable member would withdraw his amendment and allow Horomona to have his own land.

The Hon. Mr. RICHMOND said his honourable friend had supplied an omission which he had made: the fifty acres referred to in the report was meant as a measure of what the Committee desired to see given to this unfortunate chief, who had now fallen into poverty. He had fallen from being the chief of the tribe to one of the poorest and least considered.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES must also express a hope that the Government would see its way to agree to the recommendation and carry it out. The land in question was only a small area and was of comparatively little value. The chief was now steeped to the lips in poverty. To those who remembered the early days, before the country was occupied by European settlers, no recollection could be more pleasant than that of arriving at the township of River-ton, after a weary march along the beach, to find the warm welcome from the Maoris there. They were, in his early recollection, in very comfortable circumstances. The land yielded wheat abundantly. They had cattle, wheat, and potatoes, and with the addition of fish, which they caught in the estuary, they lived very comfortably indeed. Those were days of plenty and prosperity; but, when they came to rely exclusively on the very limited portions of land which were allotted to them, their means became less abundant, until poverty came gradually upon them. He regretted to see, in the course of the various proceedings of the Land Courts in the South, and probably in other parts of the colony also, that there was a disposition to individualise these reserves, and to subdivide them to such an extent that ultimately the Natives would cease to be able to make a living from the land. He thought the colony would not show any undue generosity if it added to these reserves, and thus enabled the descendants of those who once ruled over the whole of this country to live out their days in comparative comfort.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER said there was one thing which had been lost sight of, and that was, that the Native in question had originally given to him seven or eight town allotments, and also another piece of land of twenty-eight acres. He had given all this property away to his friends or relatives with the exception of one town allotment and fourteen acres of the other land. It was a question how far it was legitimate for the petitioner to give away land in that way and then to ask for more. The whole question of reserves in the Middle Island for the Natives had been raised, and it should be considered by the Government. It was an urgent question, and one which would have to be dealt with in some form or other. He would ask the members of the Council if they were really in a position to say what the facts of the case under consideration were. He did not know whether the representations which had been made to the honourable gentleman were correct or incorrect, nor was the honourable gentleman able to say that he spoke on this case from his own knowledge. He (Sir F. Whitaker) would certainly vote for the amendment, because it remitted the matter for the consideration of the Government, and allowed them to give that consideration to it which it deserved before they were called upon to say whether the recommendation should be carried into effect. If the matter were remitted to the favourable consideration of the Government, as proposed, the present case, with all the other cases of a like kind, would have to be considered. He was quite sure there was not sufficient information before either the Committee or the Council to enable them to say that the recommendation should be given immediate effect to.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL thought, after what had been said on this subject, that the wisest course the honourable gentleman could take would be to accept the amendment on the assurance given by the Hon. the Attorney-General. The Government said it was willing to take into consideration the report of the Committee, and he therefore advised the Hon. Mr. TAIAROA to accept the amendment.

The Hon. Mr. TAIAROA said, if the Government would give him some assurance that they would deal with the matter, he would be prepared to accept the amendment. He wished that the matter should be dealt with as soon as possible, as Horomona was in great trouble, and it was necessary that he should have something done for him soon.

Motion negatived, and amendment agreed to.

OWHAOKO CASE.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER.—Before proceeding with the Orders of the Day, there is a question I should like to bring before the Council. It will be recollected that some time ago the Hon. Mr. Shrimski moved a resolution that certain papers should be laid on the table of the Council, being part of the proceedings of the Native Land Court, having reference to some evidence affecting Sir Walter Buller in the Owhaoko case. The papers were examined carefully to see that all that had reference to the particular question were placed before the Council. These papers originally were selected and printed by the preceding Government, but, having been printed by them, the papers were not laid on the table, inasmuch as the Government retired from office before the Assembly sat. When the present Government took office his honourable friend opposite moved for the papers. They were laid on the table, and no doubt they contained serious reflections upon Sir Walter Buller. Sir Walter Buller is in England at the present time; therefore he had not been able to take any steps himself in reference to this matter; but Mr. Warren, who calls himself Owhaoko manager, and who seems to be a friend of Sir Walter Buller, and who states he was present when these transactions took place upon which the charge against Sir Walter Buller was based, has written a letter giving an explanation of what took place. I think, under the circumstances, I should lay this letter on the table, and perhaps it will be right, if the Council approves, that it should be printed; but all I ask now is that the letter do lie on the table and be read by the Clerk.

The CLERK read the letter as follows:—

“Owhaoko, 27th November, 1887.

“SIR,—I have just seen extracts taken from evidence in the Owhaoko-Kaimanawa case, recently laid on the table of the Legislative Council and printed, which contain grave charges against Sir Walter Buller. On behalf of that gentleman, now absent from the colony, I desire to say emphatically that these charges are absolutely untrue and without foundation. I speak with a full knowledge of the facts connected with the case, having accompanied Sir Walter Buller on his trip to Taupo, and was present most of the time at all his interviews with the Natives. He interviewed Hohepa, Paurini, Topia, and others in the hotel at Tokano. The Natives who gave evidence at the recent Taradale Court were not present. One of them, Te Aramoana, who was not present at any of Sir Walter Buller's interviews with the Natives, gave his evidence on the strength of what he had been told. Sir Walter Buller did not take spirits in his boat for the purpose of intoxicating the Natives, nor did he give the Natives drink previous to the meetings. On one occasion Hohepa asked me for a glass of spirits during an interview with him and others, and Sir Walter Buller advised me not to give it to him. Sir Walter Buller being himself a most abstemious man, it is exceedingly improbable that he would carry spirits about with him to intoxicate Natives, or that his tent—pitched, for convenience, beside one of the hot springs, and shared with him by Lady Buller—would be by him turned into a drinking resort for drunken Natives. It is worthy of remark that this evidence lately printed is mostly hearsay, the Natives themselves constantly using the words ‘I heard so.’ Such testimony would not be admitted in any other Court in the world, and it is no tribute to the ability of the presiding Judge that he allowed it to be taken down. It really appears as if such portions only have been selected as would suffice to blacken Sir Walter Buller's

character and place his conduct in the worst possible light. It is also strange, moreover, that other evidence, more favourable to him, but bearing on the same subject, has been withheld.

"I respectfully ask you, Sir, to have the kindness to bring this letter before the House, in order that it may have the same wide publicity that has been given to the evidence above alluded to.—I have, &c.,

"R. T. WARREN,

"Owhaoko Manager.

"The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER,

"Legislative Council, Wellington."

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER.—The writer of the letter states that, as the charges have been printed, he thought it was only reasonable that his answer should also be printed. And, if the Council will permit me, I will move that it be printed.

The Hon. Mr. MANTELL.—I shall have something to say on this subject next week; but, in the meantime, on this particular point I think it well to say that last week I saw a member of the House, and he tells me that he was present when the evidence given and printed was taken, and that he cross-examined the witnesses, whose evidence was merely hearsay. Two of these witnesses are spoken of as being drunk when they signed the papers, but neither of these was examined at all.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

The Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL.—I wish to ask you, Sir, what course you will adopt in regard to this matter, in reference to the amendment of which a contingent notice of motion has been given to be moved by the Hon. Mr. Stevens, and appears on the Order Paper.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—I would also like to know if we are to take the motion first; or are we to take the contingent notice of motion?

The Hon. the SPEAKER.—If the order, as printed on the Order Paper as No. 1, be taken and be affirmed, it would then be incompetent to enter into any alteration of the paper before the Council in relation to the proposed contract. The words are, "That this Council concurs with the House of Representatives in the draft revised contract for the construction of the Midland Railway, as reported by a Select Committee of the House." That being affirmed by the Council, it would be incompetent afterwards, without proceeding to rescind the resolution, to deal with the contingent motion notice of which stands on the Order Paper. Therefore it will be better, so as to save the contingent motion, that this order should be proceeded with first.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES.—As a matter of order I draw your attention, Sir, to the claim which I have of addressing the Council on the main question.

The Hon. the SPEAKER.—The honourable member is in possession of the Council, and is in order.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—Before the honourable gentleman proceeds, may I ask whether my contingent motion will come on immediately, or whether it can be intercepted by any other motion?

The Hon. the SPEAKER.—No, it cannot be intercepted by any other motion.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES.—Then, Sir, I have to say to the Council that I have not taken an opportunity of addressing the Council on this question. As it happens, I was absent during the session of 1884; and in the session of 1886, when the Act that was passed in that session was under consideration, I did not take an opportunity of addressing the Council. Since I have not done so, I wish to say a few words on the merits of the question now; and, although my friend the Hon. the Attorney-General told us last night that it was out of place to deal with this question, seeing that it was not the original one, it would only be fair to reply that, since it is now proposed to vary the whole agreement, that opens up the question. The Legislature has for many years had under consideration the propriety of forming a railway between the east and west coasts of the South Island. The matter was first stirred by persons in the locality. The Government took it up and sent experts to explore the whole country, which was comparatively unknown in the early days; appointed Royal Commissions to inquire into the question, assisted by experts on more than one occasion; and the almost uniform result of the reports of these experts, reporting singly or altogether as a class—Commissioners reporting more generally as laymen, assisted by experts—was to the effect that it was not at all essential to construct a railway across from sea to sea through the Provinces of Canterbury and Westland; that if such a railway was to be constructed it would not be likely to pay, and would be a very poor investment; that the time had not come to undertake such a work, and that the colony was not in a position to afford it. Now, the reports of these experts went fully into details in all particulars—the character of the country, the great engineering difficulties attending the construction of the work and the enormous expense that must be incurred, and the comparatively inferior character of the country for settlement. That the country was rich in some parts was agreed, but that it was well adapted for settlement was not contended. It was not a country that would open a field of settlement for a large number of agriculturists. Still, however, those who desired to have the work constructed pressed their views upon the Government and the colony, and the result was that after a time an Act was passed giving authority to the Government to enter into a contract. This Act was passed in 1884. Under the authority of that Act a contract was framed in 1885. Seeing that that contract did not appear to give all the necessary powers and all the necessary concessions which were required by the contractors to enable them to carry out their undertaking, or to get some others who were willing to take up the contract under cover of theirs, a further Act was passed in 1886. Under the authority of the Act of 1886 negotiations had been going on in order to get a contract which was likely to be carried out by the contractors, and the result hitherto had been that nobody had been found—no capitalist had ever been found who would agree to undertake the work on such terms as they could arrange with the Government. On different occasions draft contracts have been sent out from Home to the Government by persons who proposed to take up the work, and agents have endeavoured to arrange matters with the Government, but we find they have been unsuccessful. One particular point cannot fail to catch the attention of any one who looks carefully over all these papers, and that is, that when the Government agreed to give certain concessions the company asked for some further concessions; and so they have gone on, until our Agent-General—in reference to whom I cannot fail to express my own appreciation of the very able and firm manner, a manner beyond all praise, in which he defended the interests of the colony—warns the Government that the time is drawing near when the Government must determine whether they should refuse any other concessions. In the course of the negotiations that have been going on, the Agent-General warns the Government that a fresh point is turned, a new point of departure; and I do not know whether I can do better than refer to his own words in regard to that. Sir Francis Dillon Bill, writing on the 23rd August, says,—

"Upon carefully examining the August draft I find that it substantially repeats the May amendments; but there are some entirely new provisions, of which the following seem the most important:—

"(1.) A recital is inserted in the preamble, declaring that the land to be granted to the company is to be 2,304,000 acres:

"(2.) The condition in the December draft for dividing the cost of survey is struck out, and that cost is to be borne entirely by the colony:

"(3.) The time for allowing interest on construction is to be extended to 1897:

"(4.) The condition in the December draft that £150,000 should be spent on the Brunner-Teremakau section is struck out, and the construction of it at all is made contingent on the necessary capital being obtained:

"(5.) The restriction in the December draft against deviating from the surveyed line is struck out, and, while the line is still to go by Arthur's Pass, the existing surveys are not to be binding:

"(6.) It is assumed that a contract containing the May amendments and the new alterations can be entered into without fresh legislation; but, if any be necessary, then it is to be obtained before the end of 1890.

"It is obvious, therefore, that the whole character of the original contract of 1885, as well as of the arrangement between the company and myself last year, is fundamentally changed; and, of course, such a contract as is now proposed by the company is impossible without an entirely new Act."

That, Sir, opened up an entirely new phase. The Government of the colony had agreed that a certain area of land should be set apart, out of which any company which undertook to construct the work would be allowed to select an amount of land that would be of an estimated value of £2,500,000, and the minimum price was to be fixed at 10s. per acre. The company desired to have a guarantee that the land they might select would be worth the amount of money; and they desired that, if it should turn out that the land which they did select would not be worth the amount at which it was estimated, they should be paid the difference in money. That is the point in question. That is the point we have been debating the last two days. Does this particular agreement fairly guard the colony against the possibility of giving a great deal more than it has been inclined to give, and has hitherto promised to give? I was rather struck by the remarks which fell from the Hon. the Attorney-General in the course of his remarkable speech yesterday. He said, talking about the contract, we were bound by the Act to make a further contract. I suppose he meant the Act of 1886, and I looked it up to see whether this Act really contained an imperative provision that Parliament should enter into a fresh contract; but I am unable to read it in that fashion, and I will read to the Council the only clause in the Act in which I could see that any such provision could be claimed, and leave it to the Council to determine whether it is mandatory or not. The 2nd section of "The East and West Coast (Middle Island) and Nelson Railway and Railways Construction Act, 1886," says,—

"Upon the company being duly registered in New Zealand under the provisions of 'The Companies Act, 1882,' the Governor in Council may, on behalf of Her Majesty the Queen, enter into a contract with the company under this Act.

"In such contract the company shall undertake to carry out and be bound by all the provisions of the original contract, with such modifications thereof as are mentioned in the correspondence set out in the Second Schedule hereto; and such modified contract, and any allocation of land thereunder, shall be deemed to be a contract made and an allocation of land approved under the provisions of 'The East and West Coast (Middle Island) and Nelson Railway and Railways Construction Act, 1884,' and the principal Act therein mentioned, and shall, immediately upon the execution thereof, and without any further or other proceeding, be operative and have full force and effect, notwithstanding that the terms thereof may be repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the provisions of the said Acts, or either of them: Provided that the company shall have the right to deviate from the line of railway, as delineated on the plan marked A attached to the original contract, from Lyell to Nelson, in such direction as may be agreed upon between the Government and the company."

It says there that the company shall be registered. I suppose it is registered, but I am not aware whether it is or not, and I do not think we have heard any statement to the effect that it is registered. If not, they could not make any claims. This appears to me to be the only provision which might be said to refer to this: if there is anything further, I am unable to discover it. This does not make it imperative on the colony to go blindly into any contract. There is no desire, I apprehend, on the part of any in the colony to withdraw in any way from any honourable engagement to which it may have been committed by the action of the Legislature of the past three years, and by the contract which has already been entered into. There is only one contract, I may say in passing; but, whatever obligation may have been incurred by the Legislature of the last three years, there is no one in the colony who would desire to be freed from such obligation; and therefore it is that I refrain from endeavouring to reject altogether the proposal which is now under consideration, provided that we could modify it in such a way as to make it perfectly safe for the colony to indorse it—to make it safe for the colony to agree to it,—covering the same terms which the previous negotiations, and the previous legislation, and the previous contract led contractors to expect that the colony would be willing to grant, and which, I think, the colony should be considered in honour bound to carry out. This was one point which caught my attention when the Hon. the Attorney-General was speaking; but I am unable to see that there is any urgent necessity, that it is in any way imperative on the colony, to make a contract at all hazards. That there is an honourable obligation to enter into a contract on the terms that are fair, I admit; but that it should be imperative under any circumstances, I am unable to see. Another point that my honourable friend referred to also caught my attention. He referred to the advantage—the superiority—of the proposals contained in the present draft contract over the original contract with respect to the mining community. Now, Sir, I am not disposed to say that the late Government, although it may have entered somewhat hurriedly into the contract of 1885, was by any means neglectful of the interests of the mining community. Now, we have many Acts of the General Assembly affecting the working of the gold-mines. Under these provisions it would be quite competent for the Governor to take possession of any lands which are found to abound in gold and are fit for mining. Under the Mining Act, section 40, full power is given there, and I apprehend this clause would bring the Mining Act into operation, so far as it affected any lands granted by this contract. That section says,—

"All lands which since the twenty-ninth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three, have been or may hereafter be alienated or agreed to be alienated from the Crown, whether by way of absolute sale or lease or for any lesser interest, and all lands which have been so alienated at any time previous to the above-mentioned date, with the consent of the owners thereof respectively, shall be liable to be resumed for mining purposes (except lands alienated expressly for mining purposes) by Her Majesty, on paying full compensation to the licensee, lessee, or owner of the fee-simple thereof for the value, other than auriferous or argentiferous, of the lands and improvements so resumed, upon the terms and conditions hereinafter provided."

I apprehend that that gives ample power; and, if that was not enough, we have in the legislation of the year 1882 an Act providing for the resumption of land for mining purposes, and, if this Act does not cover the whole of the field, then that Act certainly does. The whole purport of that Act was to enable the Government to resume land for mining purposes whenever required. I believe the object of the colony, as well as of its Ministers, is to act fairly by those with whom they have been negotiating for some time. Many Councillors are not satisfied that the proposal which is now under consideration should be carried. If they are not, they should allow a Committee of this Council to consider the question, and leisurely revise the draft contract. In that there can be no harm. If they are satisfied that all provisions are made which are necessary, it is possible that no alteration may be made in the contract. If they are not so satisfied, then I have no doubt that the Ministers themselves would willingly accept of any alterations such as are likely to attain the desired effect. This I am quite certain of: that Parliament means either to give the guarantee or to refuse to give it. How much better it will be to express that decision in such terms as cannot be misunderstood! At the best, from what has fallen from the Hon. the Attorney-General, it appears that he first of all moved the adoption of this draft contract under the impression that the provisions it contained were sufficient, and last night he informed the Council that he was ready to make such alterations as would make the matter sufficient.

The Hon. Sir F. WHITAKER.—I made the statement that the original contract was not insufficient, but that to suit the views of honourable members I would alter the contract.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES.—The very fact of his bringing this forward showed that something further was necessary; and it is in order to satisfy the Council on these matters that I now move that the consideration of the draft revised contract be referred to a Select Committee, to consist of the usual number of members. I move, That the consideration of the draft revised contract for the Midland Railway be referred to a Select Committee, consisting of the Hon. Sir F. Whitaker, the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse, the Hon. Mr. Holmes, the Hon. Dr. Pollen, the Hon. Mr. Miller, the Hon. Mr. Johnson, and the mover.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—On a point of order, I understood you to say, Sir, that the contingent motion I placed on the Order Paper will not be intercepted.

The Hon. the SPEAKER.—That is so—intercepted, of course, by any one when you had the opportunity. The honourable member is in possession of the Council, and it is quite competent for him to take advantage of his being in possession of the Council, and one of the privileges of a member in that position is that he can move an amendment to a question that may be before it.

The Hon. Mr. LAHMANN.—I must acknowledge that the leader of the Council has been out-generalled for the time being on this question. I was satisfied with the amendment moved by the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse, and also with the addition given notice of by the Hon. the Attorney-General. The repute of New Zealand in the Old Country is of a tender nature, and the Hon. Mr. Holmes has made it his particular business in this debate to make that repute worse than it is. If it had not been for his remarks I should not have risen on this occasion. The honourable gentleman delivered a speech which might well have been made in 1884, when the question arose, "Shall we enter into the contract or not?" But the question now is simply this: "Shall we facilitate the efforts of the company to raise money in order to carry on the work?" The question as to whether the work shall be carried on has long been decided. It is now considered that it might be beneficial to all parties to give better concessions to the company. These concessions have been well considered in another branch of the Legislature. The proposed concessions have been passed there, and they have been sent to the Council for approval. The Hon. Mr. Holmes made it his business to speak against the contract itself. He based his objections to the contract on unreliable reports, which have been subsequently contradicted, and on the report of a Royal Commission. I consider that the report of the Royal Commission was not worth the paper it was written on. I base that opinion on my own observation of how that Commission went to work in order to get the necessary information. By making the proposed concessions the colony will be benefited considerably. We must not forget that the making of this railway will extend over a period of from ten to twelve years. Employment will thus be given to a large number of those who are now unemployed. Already a great many hundreds of labourers have found employment on the railway. The construction of the railway will also give an impetus to shipping and other business, for the amount of material to be brought here must be very great. The Hon. Mr. Holmes said that the railway could never yield any return, and that the land was not worth anything at all: at the same time he said the colony had no right to part with such an extent of land to the company. If the land is worth nothing at all, then the sooner we part with it the better. But I decline to accept the honourable gentleman's assertion. I should like to know from whence the honourable gentleman got his information. I have also some information on this matter, and it is information gained from my own observation, and is information founded on fact. I know, for instance, that, since this railway has been started at the West Coast end, timber land in the neighbourhood has gone up in price. Land which formerly was valued at 10s. an acre is now valued at £10 an acre for the timber alone. I have not the least doubt that the specified sum, £1,250,000, will be obtained within the prescribed area. There are certainly tracts of land there which are not worth much; but we know, at the same time, that the country is full, if not of gold, at any rate of coal and iron. There may not be five millions of acres of land fit for agricultural purposes, but I have no doubt that there are many thousands of acres which will be found to contain gold. Therefore it is wrong to say that the land is not worth anything at all, and that this company is more a sham than anything else, and that they will never be able to carry out the work. All this has been stated, and we know very well that the present repute of the colony in England is partly owing to speeches made in Parliament. It is detrimental to the interests of the colony and detrimental to the functions of the Legislature to give the colony such a bad name. No good can be derived from it. I trust that the word "repudiation" will never be used in this Council, or in any other place in New Zealand. If the colony declines to carry out the contract it has entered into the country will be very much worse off than it is now. We have now to endeavour to agree to a contract which will be carried out by the parties; and, if we can concede anything without imposing any burden on the colony, we ought to do so. I am fully prepared to agree to the proposed concessions so long as the colony will not be responsible for any loss which may result in case the land does not fetch £1,250,000. The proposed contract fully conserves the mining interests, which the former contract did not. That, in my opinion, is a very important matter.

The Hon. Mr. BARNICOAT.—I hope the Council will not pass the amendment moved by the Hon. Mr. Menzies. The Council has already permitted a similar amendment referring the matter to the Committee to be withdrawn, and I trust the present amendment will be negatived. The question of the worth or policy of the Midland Railway has already been settled. We have now nothing to do with that. It is a question of the past. The question now before the Council is, whether it will grant certain additional concessions or refuse them. Some of these concessions are embodied in the contract now before the Council. There is one important point, and it is only to that that I shall direct the few remarks I wish to make—the point referred to by the Agent-General as the central point in the whole matter. It will be found in the following words:—

the company and granted by the Queen does not, on sale, realise the sum of £1,250,000, the Queen will, upon the completion of the said railway, grant such additional land as may be necessary to bring the total selling value of the land granted up to the said sum of £1,250,000."

I confess that on reading this I was very much startled. It seemed to weaken or remove any interest in or motive for good or careful management on the part of the company, and to involve a possibly very large future demand on the colony. After more fully considering the point, I see it in a different light. I have endeavoured to place myself in the position of the company, and it does seem to me a very natural demand to make. To refuse this concession would, I think, seem to betray suspicion that the land which is to be given in payment for the railway is not worth what we profess to believe it is worth. The value, no doubt, of land in the future is very doubtful and speculative, and I think that the company are not unreasonable in calling on New Zealand to share to some extent in that speculation. Sir Dillon Bill represents the agent of the company as putting it in this light: "The company take up the ground that the clause guaranteeing the value of the land does nothing more than express, in simple and intelligible language, the terms of the original contract, and the understanding on which all the negotiations have been carried on from the first." This does not seem to me to be an unreasonable mode of putting the concession that the company now ask, especially as it is very largely modified in the draft contract now before the Council. The words in the draft agreement seem to me to preclude any money demands being made by the company under any contingency; but, inasmuch as the Government now propose an amendment that will preclude any possibility whatever of such a demand being made, I shall vote for the amendment of the Hon. Mr. Stevens when it comes before the Council.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE.—I wish the Council to understand exactly the position in which the matter now remains. I take it that the question you, Sir, will put will be, "That the words proposed to be struck out stand part of the question," and that that will not prevent our adding any other words in addition, explanatory of our intention, as, for instance, the words proposed by the Hon. Mr. Stevens.

The Hon. the SPEAKER.—The Hon. Mr. Stevens has put a question to me which I found great difficulty in deciding, and so reserved it for further consideration. The question was, whether it would be competent for him to move the contingent motion that appears on the Order Paper in the event of the Council deciding that the first order of the day should stand as printed; in other words, whether, if the Council should decide that these words stand part of the question, he could move for words interpolating that question. The difficulty is a novel one. It is proposed to alter the words in the first order referring to the contract that has been laid on the table; therefore the question is, If it is decided that the contract should stand as sent to us from the House of Representatives, could it be amended by interpolating these words? On reflection, I have come to the conclusion that that cannot be done, but it is competent for the honourable member to move words in addition that are not contradictory to the question, that the words stand part of the question. I would take the opportunity of pointing out to the Council that there is among the Standing Orders a Standing Order which is of a very comprehensive character. It is Standing Order No. 150, which is as follows: "No amendment may be proposed to be made to any words which the Council has resolved shall stand part of, be inserted in, or added to a question, except the addition of other words thereto." That is large and comprehensive.

The Council divided on the question, "That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the question."

Words retained.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—I now move the addition of these words: "Provided that, in the contract to be formed thereon, section 8 be amended as follows: That the following words be inserted in clause 8, line 7, after the figures '£1,250,000': 'the only claim of the company in respect of such difference (if any) shall be a right on the part of;' and, in the same line, after 'company,' to erase the word 'may;' in line 8, after the word 'thereafter,' to insert the word 'to.'"

The Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL.—I wish to say that I think the history the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse gave us the other day of the whole of these contracts was an exceedingly lucid and able one. He traced the contracts from the beginning, and showed exactly how we came out. Now, the original contract, he showed us, was that fifteen miles of land should be appropriated on each side of the railway, and the Government would get alternate blocks. I have been over a good deal of this land, and I know it. I have also gone into the Bill very carefully. It gives power to the Government to give a promissory note for £1,250,000. I contend that cannot be denied. Now, I ask, if the railway is worth making at all, why should we not construct it? The subscribed capital of this company, it has been pointed out, is only £250,000. I do not know how much of that has actually been paid up; and this company will go in for selling this for a very considerable amount, and they can transfer to anybody. I was very much struck with the remark of the Hon. Mr. Pharazyn, who said this company might become a land company, and he thought it was very likely to happen. I have been told, upon very good authority, which I would not dispute, that the land to be given is worth considerably more than it has been estimated at—10s. per acre. I have been informed that a portion of it could be sold at 25s. per acre. You do not offer the company any inducement to sell it at more than 10s. There is also a part of the land which is subject to obligations, and the people residing on it will have to be driven down to the Waitaki in order to make up the whole concern; and I have been told, by a man whose opinion I would take before that of any Minister of the Crown, that there will be a loss of £500,000. Then, we know we have not got a contract, and we do not know that they are going to complete the line. If you will read the agreement through, you will find no agreement that the company shall complete the contract; and why on earth should we go and enter into this without getting corresponding advantages? I was surprised at the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse consenting to withdraw his amendment. The Government ought to have some concession made in their favour in this matter. The concessions seem to be going all the one way. I have been told that 750,000 acres of this land was actually gazetted by the late Minister of Mines in defiance of the Government.

The Hon. Mr. BUCKLEY.—No.

The Hon. Mr. CAMPBELL.—Of course I must accept the honourable gentleman's statement. There is land here which will go for 10s. an acre, and which the Government of Sir George Grey reserved from sale at £2 an acre. I consider that we are proposing to give the company the pre-emptive right to take out all the best land in the country. The Solicitor-General has forwarded us a memorandum stating distinctly that the words proposed to be added should be included in the contract. I say things are bad indeed when we refuse to refer this matter to a Committee. I will take very good care that a report of this debate shall go Home to England to all the banks. Why should we be afraid to refer this matter to a Committee? Surely it can do no harm.

The Hon. Mr. RICHMOND.—I have given a vote this evening which is not at all according to my desires. I must thank my honourable friend for having brought forward this amendment. I feel certain that the more explicit we are the better it will be for all parties concerned—not only for ourselves, but for those who have to find the money for this scheme. I think the greater the candour we show in every respect the better; and the plain speaking we have had, and the plain speaking I hope we shall have to the end of the chapter, will be useful. It would mean nothing but mis-

chief to the colony to have this affair undertaken upon any mistake, or upon any unreal expectation fostered by us. I have thought it my duty on more than one occasion to speak my mind plainly, and I thank the Hon. Mr. Holmes for having spoken as plainly as he has done. I will add my little testimony in the same direction. I will reply to something which has fallen from the Hon. Mr. Lahmann. He was highly indignant at the mode in which the prospects of this line were dealt with by the Hon. Mr. Holmes and others. I would remind the honourable gentleman and the Council that the goldfields, which really are the only tangible hope of profit out of this line, for no one of any experience expects that coal and timber will be carried over Arthur's Pass—these goldfields do not require a railway for their development. They have existed for years; they were for a considerable period a very important part of the industry of the country; and they were opened and fed then not by a railway, not by fine steamers and through harbours with tolerably-accessible entrances, but by small coasting vessels, and the smallest class of steamers, and without any roads for a considerable time. There is no industry that less demands railways than the gold-mining industry. As for coal, no one who has considered this question or who has any knowledge of railway operations would dream for a moment that the coal or timber on the West Coast was going to be transported over Arthur's Pass. There is not the slightest probability of it. In speaking plainly we are doing something towards removing a reproach which I heard cast on this scheme in words which I shall always remember—namely, that it is "the most mendacious proposition that ever proceeded from any quarter in New Zealand." Those are not the words of a stranger—of some one unacquainted with the affairs of the country—but of a very old settler, who has travelled over every part of the colony and a great deal outside it—a very cautious and, I will say, a very wise man. The result of the scheme is sure to be a failure in London and New Zealand. At the same time, we have gone so far that the old legal maxim, "Fieri non debuit, factum valet," comes into force. We do not know at this hour what interests have arisen under the contract. We have no right to assume that there are none. The loss under the scheme will fall upon people who have taken it up in perfect good-faith. We have been told several times that we have the authority of Mr. Brodie Hoare and his colleagues as to the valuable quality of the land that is offered, and the value of the line when constructed. I am quite certain that no man of ordinary judgment going over that line would say that there is a fair prospect of fair gains to be made out of it; and Mr. Hoare's honesty can only be defended at the cost of his common-sense. That there will be large profits made upon the manipulation of the money I do not doubt. My regret is that the distance to which this matter has gone prevents my voting as I should have desired to vote on all occasions—namely, in direct opposition to the scheme. Now that the thing is established I desire to give really the fairest chance possible of profit to those who undertake it. I deeply regret that the Legislature should have taken up the matter in the first instance, although I cannot deny that they are bound to continue it liberally, having begun it.

The Hon. Mr. WATERHOUSE.—I congratulate my honourable friend who has just sat down at having been able to work up his sentimental feelings upon the most unlikely of all subjects to arouse one's feelings of sentiment, and that is the Midland Railway. I do not know whether it is that I am of a colder and more phlegmatic nature than my honourable friend, but I must confess that the Bill has not aroused my sentimental feelings. To me it is the most unsentimental and, I may add, one of the most unsightly pieces of legislation I have ever had to do with. I agree with a great deal that the Hon. Mr. Richmond has said, but my action in this matter has been determined by force of circumstances. I recognise that the Bill must pass one way or the other, and my object has been to make it as little injurious as possible to the colony; and, with the amendment proposed by the Hon. Mr. Stevens, I think it will now be brought into a shape similar to that in which I expressed three years ago my readiness lukewarmly to support the measure—namely, that it should not involve the colony in any expenditure whatever.

The Hon. Mr. TAIAROA.—I desire to explain my reason for voting with the "Noes." I thought it would be advisable to refer this matter to a Select Committee; and I thought the Council should give careful consideration to the question of this railway. It must be acknowledged that it is from the formation of so many railways that we, collectively and individually, have been compelled to borrow money. It is owing to the large sums of money which have been raised that the difficulties now fall upon us—both Europeans and Maoris. We are all in the hands of other persons. It is all very well for honourable members to laugh; but it cannot be denied that we are being taxed even down to the poorest man. I am a farmer, and I own perhaps more farms than many honourable members in this Council. I bought those farms at a high price, and now they have gone down to a very low price. I think that this fall in the price of land is owing to the large sums of money spent on railways; and it is owing to this that the public have no money of their own. Before there were any railways the price of land was high enough, and people had money. Now we propose to give away our land to foreigners. The company is not formed by ourselves. It is quite possible for us to raise the money on these lands and to do the work ourselves. Those who form that company may be from many nations. I maintain that we are giving away our land to other persons, when we could well do the work ourselves. That is why I thought it advisable to refer the matter to a Select Committee. I do not think we ought to be governed by what passes in another Chamber; I think that we, being unprejudiced, are the persons who ought to consider more fairly the subject of this railway. I have not any objections to the railway itself; but I think we should be careful before passing such a measure as this, because we are the persons who will have to suffer eventually. We are too apt to blame the railway or the way in which it is carried out; but we should remember that we are the persons who authorise the railways. I agree with the Hon. Mr. Campbell that this amounts to the issue of a promissory note for the sum named. I think that all the Acts we pass amount to promissory notes, because they incur liability. I therefore think the Council should be careful before passing this measure.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER.—It has been assumed by one speaker that it is not still open to the Council to appoint a Select Committee to consider this matter. I think that is an error. It is still open to propose a Committee to examine this subject, and to propose that the names shall be balloted for, or other names inserted in place of those suggested. The question that the Council has decided is that the Committee, consisting of so many names, shall not be appointed. So far as I understand it, that only has been negatived. I do not say it is desirable to appoint a Select Committee. I think that the acceptance of the suggestion of my honourable friend Mr. Waterhouse by the Government, and the proposal of this amendment, which I suppose the Council will adopt, gets rid to a very considerable extent of the necessity for the appointment of a Select Committee. With regard to the matter which I brought before the Council—namely, the necessity for legislating against the possibility of these private railway companies adopting discriminating rates, rates discriminating between one customer of the railway and another, the adoption of which plan has had so disastrous an effect in the United States—I have consulted the Attorney-General, and I understand that he has consulted his colleagues about it, and I am assured that, while they recognise the desirableness of legislating in that direction, they do not think this opportunity is the most fitting, and that, in their opinion, a fitting opportunity should be taken to legislate not only with regard to the limitation of the power of adopting discriminating rates by this company, but by another private company in existence—namely, the Wellington and Manawatu Company. That it is absolutely necessary that injury to that sort should be passed I feel perfectly convinced. The evidence has, in the last day or two, accumulated in my hands as to the extreme corruption, and the extreme injury to free and proper business, in the United States owing to certain companies returning heavy rebates to certain customers. It has resulted in this: that certain railway companies unite and actually crush out of existence some firms. It is most important that such a thing should be prevented from occurring in New Zealand. Finding that, in the opinion of the Government, this occasion is not the most fitting one to legislate on this subject, and that they acknowledge the desirableness of legislating on it, I shall watch their actions in this matter, and, if they do not stir on a proper opportunity presenting itself, I shall myself propose such legislation. I think a fitting opportunity would be when a Public Works Bill is before the Council, or a Bill dealing with some such matters as come before us in a Public Works Bill. With regard to the general question, I have hitherto, in this debate, refrained from expressing any opinion whatever. The only time when I have thought it my duty to express an opinion on the subject was four years ago, when I not only spoke against this scheme, but voted against it. I have been absent from the Council for a period of two years, and in my absence the Council has legislated on this matter, and it stands in a very different position now from the position which it occupied when I voted against it. And, Sir, although my opinions have not changed—the opinions I expressed on the occasion to which I allude—yet the circumstances in which we stand have very much changed. This land has been visited by representatives of this company—men who, so far as one could gather in intercourse with them, are as well able to guard their own interests as we are to guard ours. They have had their agents travelling all over this land which is to form the endowment, and, if they are satisfied that by means of these endowments they will be able to construct this work, I say I should be very glad to see them do it. I am not convinced that the work is absolutely necessary, but I think that eventually communication by railway between the east and west coasts of the South Island would be desirable. If, therefore, by any endowments of this kind we can, in the present depressed condition of the colony, insure the completion of this work, I do not think that we should push our objections any further. We have given our opinions on the value of the endowments; if, after this, we should be right—I do not say we should be right absolutely, because I have heard friends of mine, who are quite competent to express an opinion as to the value of a great part of these endowments, say that these are very much misunderstood and very much underrated; but, Sir, if we should be right as to the value of the land, we have delivered our souls. It is from these considerations that I gave my vote just now in favour of the motion before us standing part of the question, as against the proposal of the Hon. Mr. Menzies that the matter should be referred to a Select Committee. I think still that the contract ought to have provided a penalty for non-completion. I think that that is now the most important defect in this contract; but I do not agree with the opinion which has been expressed by one or two honourable members, that it would be to the interest of this company to sell their lands carelessly for what they could get. That evidently is not to their interest. The lands are only estimated to amount to 50 per cent. of the cost of construction; and I would point out that if they make a large profit on these lands it will go in reduction of the part they have to furnish in cash. Thus it is clearly to their interest to get as much for their land as possible. Then, there is the question as to whether, in handing over the endowments to the Company, they should not be bound to construct two sections of the railway before they receive the endowment for one. It seems to me that, instead of being paid in land 50 per cent. of the cost of the section which has been last completed, they ought only to be paid for section No. 1 when section No. 2 had been completed. We should by this plan have held some guarantee that the work would be prosecuted. But I do not see that the colony holds any guarantee that when one section has been constructed, and the endowment handed over for the section, the work shall be proceeded with; the colony is not in a very strong position in insisting on the prosecution of the work. However, as I before said, the matter has now arrived at that point when I do not think it would be very useful to traverse the whole of the old contract. We are bound to contract for it in some way, and I suppose the best contract we are likely to get is the one before us.

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI.—The honourable gentleman who spoke last told us that provision should be made with reference to the railway tariffs which are to be charged hereafter on this railway.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER.—The tariffs are provided for in the schedule.

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI.—The honourable gentleman said they could be altered, and that when a Public Works Bill was brought in he would take an opportunity of getting that attended to. I thought the honourable gentleman was one of those who at all times objected to retrospective legislation; and any Act which may hereafter follow this contract will not affect the contract of this company in any way whatever. In fact they would only then come back to the Legislature and ask for further concessions, their rights having been interfered with by any subsequent legislation. Having once accepted their contract, how can we then alter it without protecting existing rights? I had not intended to speak on this question to-night, although I had made up my mind to vote and act in the way I intend to do. I cannot help seeing the wonderful change that has taken place in the opinions of some honourable gentlemen in this Council. And when I go back to former years, when the first contract was entered into, and remember the speeches made then as compared with the speeches made on this occasion by the same honourable gentlemen, it proves to me that all depends upon who is on the Treasury benches and who is not. Sir, the company entered into a contract in 1884, and they knew perfectly well what they were then undertaking, and what they were asked to perform. That contract specified that they should receive alternate blocks of land, and at a given price. At that time the honourable gentlemen who now form the Government and their friends denounced it as a very wrong transaction; they said that it was giving the public estate to private companies, and that the colony ought not to agree to it. I speak as I think, and I have always done so, and I believe the Council will give me credit for doing so.

HON. MEMBERS.—Hear, hear.

MR. SHRIMSKI.—I say, had the late Government introduced a measure of this kind they would have been hunted out of the colony by those who are now giving the great concessions imported into this new contract. I have no hesitation in saying that the defeat of that Government at the last election was caused by those who would have denounced such a proposal if made by them; and yet we find those who very strongly denounced the late Administration are the very parties who are now giving the company concessions which no reasonable man in this colony would sanction. Sir, as I said before, under the original contract alternate blocks were to be taken, and the price was to be 10s. an acre; and it was the duty of the Government, whether the company agreed to it or not, to insist on their carrying out the contract they had entered into. I appeal to the Hon. Mr. Oliver, who was Minister for Public Works, if it is not a fact that men who had entered into contracts for railways, and, through stress of weather and other misfortunes and casualties, were unable to complete them in terms of their contract, have yet had to abide by it, and in some instances, to their own ruin, have had to forfeit, and have had to pay penalties for doing so.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER.—Very seldom.

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI.—That has been the case, and it is the case up to the present day. This company have undertaken a contract on certain terms and conditions, and now they come before the Government and the Legislature to ask for further concessions. Had the contract been carried out on the original scheme, that of taking every alternate block, the blocks left in the hands of the Government would, by the construction of the railway, have so increased in value that the value of the land given to the company would have been actually little or nothing compared with the increase in value of the land left in the hands of the Government. But what is the consequence now? We give them all the land they like to take. We repeal the Act making the value of the land 10s. per acre, and give them power to take whatever they think proper. It is too much for the colony to submit to, and I think it would have been far better for the colony to have borrowed the money at £80 or £90 for its bonds, and to have constructed the railway itself, than to have given the concessions provided under this contract. Sir, we are giving a guarantee to this company of a million and a quarter of money. To do what? To spend three millions of money. Why, surely the colony could have borrowed that money on better terms. It could not have cost them one and a quarter millions, and it would have been far better for the colony to have carried the work out than to have allowed a company to do so. Then, what guarantee has the colony that the company will carry out the work? Not the slightest. As the Hon. Mr. Campbell says, it is a question whether they have got, or are likely to get, the means for carrying out the work. I do not wish to detract from the character of the people who are constructing this railway, because I should like to see it constructed, as it would provide means of employment for the people; but I do say the colony is not right or justified in giving the company the lands now asked for. I therefore oppose the measure on these grounds.

The Hon. Mr. HOLMES.—Sir, I wish to say a few words in respect to the amendment of the Hon. Mr. Menzies. I think the Government will understand that the passing of this resolution and the division we have had has determined that question; and I think, therefore, it would be only just to those parties who desire full information before passing the measure to place it before them. There is a great deal of information that could be placed before them. I doubt very much whether any one in this Council has seen the opinion of the Solicitor-General on the question. There is a great deal of information collected by the Committee of the other House, and that should be accessible to the Council. Well, if all that were brought forward it would satisfy the minds of honourable members as to whether they were doing right or wrong in giving their assent to the measure. At any rate, it would not prevent the passing of the resolutions; so I think the members on the Government benches should be sufficiently magnanimous to satisfy the Council in that respect. I agree with the remark of the Hon. Mr. Waterhouse that we should never vote on a measure without having sufficient information about the subject. Some are in the dark when considering the effect of passing important measures. I have no desire to keep this Council any longer; but there are one or two phases of the question to which I desire to call attention. One is in reference to taking the best blocks of land throughout the six millions of acres. It is a well-known fact that already they have offers for some blocks, and no doubt these would fetch £1 or £1 5s. per acre. We could have parted with it for cash at any time. So that of that portion of the endowment we may expect that the company will avail itself immediately. Then there is another question affecting the public. When the Manawatu Railway Company got permission to construct their line it was a condition that the land should be sold publicly, that there should be no private bargaining about it; and the result of this has been that every block of land has been submitted to auction at Wellington, so that the general public had as good an opportunity of getting it as anybody. In fact, there are a great many amendments that are absolutely necessary and that have never been referred to, and hence the necessity of this information. In regard to the alternate blocks, this system has been followed out in America.

The land is all divided into square blocks of 640 acres, and every alternate block is kept by the Government. The result is that the price is doubled, and the American Government get the railway made for nothing. After the railway is made the Government get as much for half the land as they would have got for the whole of the land before. This land will all be sold in large blocks, and the public will have no opportunity of acquiring any of it. Some honourable members who have gone round the country have declared very violently against large estates, but when they come to the Legislature afterwards they go in for giving away two or three million acres of land in a block. Sir, whatever happens, this undertaking is only a speculation, and I have no doubt that a great deal of money will change hands for it in another country. There may be victims in New Zealand—the Government and the people who have to pay—but there are also victims in the poor unfortunate parsons, widows, and spinsters, and others who may invest their money in a transaction got up for the purpose of working a speculation in this land. The non-completion of the contract has been referred to: that is a most unbusinesslike matter. There is no reference in the draft contract to the completion of the contract. I think all these matters should have the attention of the Government.

The Council divided on the question, "That the motion, as amended, be agreed to."

COUNTRY TELEGRAPH OFFICES.

Mr. MOAT asked the Postmaster-General, Whether he will consent to the closing between seven and eight p.m. of those small country telegraph offices where little or no business is done during that hour, if requested to do so by the residents in the neighbourhood? A few days ago a somewhat similar question in respect of post-offices had been asked of and replied to by the Postmaster-General. He was aware that petitions had been presented asking that the Government should do what this question suggested. These petitions had been presented both recently and in former years, and he knew the Postmaster-General had had the matter under consideration. He hoped the honourable gentleman would be able to give some relief in the direction asked for. Many people felt strongly that it was imposing an unnecessary expense on the colony, and hardship on a number of officers, who were kept at the offices for this hour when there was no business to be done, or hardly any, and who therefore could not devote the best part of their evenings to obtaining instruction or to recreative purposes.

Major ATKINSON said he should have great pleasure in doing what the question suggested.

NORTH AUCKLAND TRUNK RAILWAY.

Mr. MOAT asked the Minister for Public Works, Whether it is intended to change the proposed route of the North Auckland Trunk Railway, so that it shall pass through Port Albert? He had been induced to ask this question from the fact that a number of persons residing in the neighbourhood of Port Albert had been exercised by seeing a report in the Auckland papers of an interview between the Minister for Public Works and a deputation which recently waited on him with reference to this railway, in which it was stated that the deputation strongly urged the line should be continued as far as Port Albert. According to the proposed route, it was never intended that the line should go within several miles of Port Albert, and it was to ascertain if it was intended to change the route that he asked this question.

Mr. MITCHELSON said the Government had no intention of changing the route of this railway, nor of extending it as far as Port Albert, the amount at the disposal of the Government for expenditure upon this line being insufficient to enable them to do so. It was true that a deputation of northern members had waited upon him with reference to the extension of the line, but it was for the purpose of urging the Government to make further provision for the extension, and not for the purpose of getting the route changed.

NATIVE LANDS.

Mr. PARATA asked the Government, Whether they will be prepared to amend section 16 of

"The Stamp Duties Act Amendment Act, 1885," in the direction of altering the definition of Native lands so as to limit it to land held under Native custom, for which a certificate of title or memorial of ownership has been issued or granted by the Native Land Court? He had asked a somewhat similar question a few days ago, but had not then fully explained the matter. His object in asking the question was to point out that the law, as it now stood, appeared to contravene the original intention, inasmuch as it imposed the payment of duty on all lands the title whereunto might be investigated by the Native Land Court; whereas it was assumed that the object in imposing the duty in the first place was to secure a payment to the revenue as compensation for waiving the right of pre-emption over purely Native land secured to the Crown by the Treaty of Waitangi and the 73rd section of the New Zealand Constitution Act. To impose payment of duty on land over which the Native title had been previously extinguished before taking it into the Court to have the ownership investigated, was manifestly unfair, as no concession had been granted by the Crown to justify a charge of this kind being tacked on to property that had been set apart for Native purposes under some special arrangement. Under the present state of the law, all the Native reserves in the South Island recently dealt with by the Native Land Court were subject to duty in the event of the owners leasing such lands to Europeans. There were also lands in other places on the same footing on which, in fairness, the duty ought not to be imposed. It was hoped, therefore, that the Government would recognise the justice of altering the law to exempt the lands alluded to from the provisions of the Act, if it was found that the assumption was correct.

Major ATKINSON said it would not be possible to deal with this question this session, but during the recess he would look into the matter and see what relief the Natives were fairly entitled to, if any, and make provision if necessary.

A. CARTER.

Mr. LEVESTAM asked the Minister for Public Works, If it is true that a man named Alfred Carter, who is employed at the hydraulic lift at Greymouth, has not been paid any wages for the last nine weeks; and, if it is true, what is the cause of such delay? He had given notice of this question in consequence of a communication that had reached him making the statement referred to in the question. He should like to know if this was true; and, if so, whether steps would be taken to remedy the grievance for the future. This man was a constituent of his, and therefore he thought it his duty to bring the matter under the notice of the Minister.

Mr. MITCHELSON said the statement was correct; but the man had been working for the Greymouth Harbour Board, and not for the Government. The amount of wages due to the men had been certified to by Mr. Martin, the Government Engineer. The Board, however, being short of funds, could not pay them, and the long delay was caused by the Board having to negotiate with the Bank of New Zealand at Auckland for an advance of £5,000. This had been arranged for, and the men had had their wages paid to them.

Mr. LEVESTAM said that, when he spoke to the honourable gentleman on this matter, the honourable gentleman told him to put a question on the Order Paper.

ADDINGTON GOODS-SHED.

Mr. TAYLOR asked the Minister for Public Works, If he will cause to be erected a small goods-shed at Addington, the want of such shed being a great inconvenience to the people living in the locality?

Mr. MITCHELSON said that, as there was a goods-shed within a mile and a half of Addington, the Government did not see their way to spend money in erecting one at Addington.

ROTORUA-WAIROA ROAD.

Mr. KELLY asked the Minister for Public Works, If it is intended to have the road between Rotorua and Wairoa put in repair, so as to enable tourists to visit that place during the coming tourist season? The road that he wanted put in repair was about nine miles long, leading from Ohinemutu to the old Village of Wairoa, which was destroyed by the late Tarawera eruption. Last season the road was put in repair, but in consequence of a large quantity of stuff having fallen from the hills the road needed further attention. A large number of tourists had been to Rotorua already, but they could not get to Wairoa by vehicle, and he hoped the Minister for Public Works would be able to give a favourable answer to the question.

Mr. MITCHELSON said it was not the intention of the Government to put this road in repair; but it was intended to divert the road from Rotorua to Rotomahana via Pariteru, and a sum would be placed upon the estimates in order to carry it out.

RESIDENT MAGISTRATES' COURTS CHARGES.

Mr. MARCHANT asked the Minister of Justice, Whether his attention has been directed to a recent case in the Hawera Resident Magistrate's Court, in which the costs, where a 5s. fine was imposed, amounted to £3 17s.; and whether he will devise some means to relieve country settlers from excessive costs in the Resident Magistrates' Courts? In this case a Stratford resident had been fined 5s. at Hawera, whilst the costs amounted to £3 17s. The greater portion of that sum was made up of mileage on the summons and on two subpoenas, the charge for which was £2 11s. In all probability, however, the summons and the subpoenas were served by the constable, who travelled free over the railway, the State being put to little or no expense in consequence. If this case had stood alone he (Mr. Marchant) would probably not have drawn attention to it, but whenever a Stratford resident was summoned to Hawera or to New Plymouth the same hardship occurred, the charge for mileage in the latter case being about half as much again as to Hawera. Moreover, it was generally believed that the fees in the case of New Plymouth did not even go into the coffers of the State, but that they were the personal perquisites of the bailiff. He hoped that the Minister of Justice would inquire into the matter, with the object of relieving country residents from this injustice.

Mr. FERGUS said the attention of the Government had not been drawn to this matter until the honourable gentleman had put his question on the Order Paper; but, on making inquiry, he found that the Justices were not aware that they had the power to remit the costs, or any portion of them; otherwise they might have done so. But he also had a telegram from the Resident Magistrate, who said that he had been informed that the case was a very bad one, and that the penalty, including costs, was richly deserved. Still, he thought that something might be done to provide that, in cases of this kind, the person charged might, if he were guilty, at once plead by letter, and thus be saved the necessity of attending the Court. The Government would take the matter into consideration during the recess.

CUVIER ISLAND LIGHTHOUSE.

Mr. PEACOCK asked the Government, What progress is being made with the erection of the Cuvier Island Lighthouse, and when it is expected that this important work will be finished? The lighthouse referred to was very important in the interests of the shipping and maritime portion of the community. He understood that the lanterns and other apparatus had been in the colony some time, and it was understood that the work of erection would be proceeded with at once. He should be glad to hear whether the works were progressing, and when they were likely to be finished.

Mr. FISHER said it was quite true that the apparatus was in the colony; but he would ascertain the exact position of the matter in a day or two, and inform the honourable gentleman of the intention of the Government.

Mr. PEACOCK said the work was to have been proceeded with last year.

LADIES' PRIVILEGES ON RAILWAYS.

Mr. T. MACKENZIE asked the Minister for Public Works, If he will issue instructions to the Railway Department to provide a carriage for ladies only, to be attached to the express train running between Dunedin and Invercargill, and also upon all long-distance lines where they are not at present attached?

Mr. MITCHELSON said there had for some time past been such a carriage attached to the trains running between Christchurch and Dunedin, but on five days out of six there were no ladies travelling in it. As the experiment had not been a success on that long length of line, it was not proposed to try the experiment on the line referred to by the honourable gentleman. It was very costly to draw an unnecessary carriage all that distance; and he understood that there were conveniences on the carriages running between Dunedin and Invercargill. If it were not so he would make further inquiries.

LOCAL RATES.

Mr. W. P. REEVES asked the Premier, Whether the Government will consider the advisability of inserting a provision in the Rating Act to compel the rate-collectors employed by local bodies to make a reasonable effort to recover from occupiers of rated properties before making demands on the owners thereof? It seemed that rate-collectors employed by local bodies often did not endeavour to collect the rates from the occupiers. They let the rates stand for some time, and in the meantime it was often found that the tenants had made themselves scarce, and the owner had to pay. It was suggested that rate-collectors had done this because of a friendly feeling towards the occupier, but of that he had no proof, and could only say that complaints had been made.

Major ATKINSON could hold out no hope that what the honourable gentleman wanted would be done. It seemed only reasonable that the landlord should look after his tenants. The local bodies had quite enough to do to get the rate from the land.

Mr. BLAKE thought that the honourable member for St. Albans had never been Chairman of a Road Board.

SIR J. FERGUSSON.

Mr. W. P. REEVES asked the Premier, Whether Sir James Fergusson was acting as Governor of the colony when he purchased certain Native lands in the Waikato district on a written understanding between the Native Department and himself that the law relating to the tenure of such lands should be altered? He understood that Sir James Fergusson did not purchase the land first-hand from the Natives, but that he had purchased land which had been bought from the Natives. The title to the land was not complete, owing to restriction against alienation, but it was understood that there was a pledge that the restrictions would be removed.

Mr. MITCHELSON said that Sir James Fergusson never had purchased this land from the Natives, but that it had fallen into his hands as mortgagee during the time that he was Governor of Bombay. The land was purchased from the Natives by Mr. Every Maclean, of Auckland, and a letter was given to him by the Native Office promising that the restrictions should be removed; and when he sold the land to the gentleman who mortgaged it to Sir James Fergusson the document referred to went with the purchase, and that was how it passed into the hands of Sir James Fergusson.

LAKE ELLESMERE RECLAMATION.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN asked the Minister of Lands, What is the intention of the Government as to carrying out the proposed works in connection with the reclamation of Crown lands adjoining Lake Ellesmere, and providing a better outlet for the River Halswell? A great deal of preliminary work had been done in connection with the reclamation of this lake, and the settlers on the flat were suffering enormously in consequence of the quantity of water overflowing their lands from this work. He hoped the present Government would carry out the intention of their predecessors with regard to this reclamation.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON regretted that it was out of his power to give a favourable reply to the question, as it appeared that, on the most moderate computation, the work would cost several thousand pounds.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN would point out that there were two questions, and he presumed the reply had reference to the lake. Could the Government provide a better outlet for the River Halswell?

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON said the reply referred generally to both questions, but he would look into the matter referred to in the second question more fully.

STATIONMASTERS IN GRAIN DISTRICTS.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN asked the Minister for Public Works, Whether he will arrange that at such railway-stations in large grain-growing districts where there are no regular station-masters temporary provision may be made during, say, two months of the grain-delivery season, by the appointment of one of the line-men, or other employé that can be spared, to act as stationmaster for that time? The Minister for Public Works must agree that it would be a very great convenience to a great number of settlers in a large grain-growing district to have temporary provision made during the grain-delivery season as suggested in the question, and he believed the cost would be very trifling, if anything at all.

Mr. MITCHELSON said the matter had already been brought under his notice by the honourable member for Akaroa, who had communicated with him by letter. It was still under consideration, and if the concession asked for could be agreed to it should be carried out; but before that was done inquiries would have to be made.

PETANE-WAIROA ROAD.

Captain RUSSELL asked the Minister of Lands, If he will authorise a detail survey being made of the best line of road from Petane to Wairoa, Hawke's Bay, and cause a bridle-track to be made on that line out of funds available for opening up lands before sale? There was, he understood, a considerable area of land in the neighbourhood of Wairoa, to which there was no access except by the precarious method of going by sea and landing on an open beach.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON said he had learnt on inquiry that the land in question was of a somewhat difficult and inferior character. The road-line between these points had been surveyed, and the estimate of the cost of making the road was £25,000, and of a bridle-track £10,000. In the meantime the Government were unable to undertake this work.

GRASS-SEED-SOWING.

Mr. TANNER asked the Government, If they will give instructions that grass-seed be sown on the forest-lands of the Crown immediately after a fire has passed through, also on roads which have been cut through forest-lands? It was well known that when a fire passed through a forest a quantity of undergrowth sprang up which could not be burnt off, and it was therefore a very important point that grass-seed should be sown after a fire.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON replied that the question of sowing forest-land was important, and it was now the recognised rule both to sow down roads in grass and areas of forest recently burnt when notice of such fires had been sent to the Government; and this principle would be adhered to so far as funds permitted.

MAKARETU ROAD.

Mr. TANNER asked, If the Government will take steps to improve the road through the new Makaretu blocks (recently sold) at a spot known as "the Ravine," to enable settlers to reach their sections? The road had been recently cut, but there was no Road Board, and the road was in such a state that he understood no pack-horse could be taken past the ravine. He understood that, in the opening of these roads, the practice of the Government was to open them sufficiently to enable settlers to get to their land, but in this case that had not been done.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON said, with regard to this, the House would be asked to vote a small sum for expenditure on the road to the Makaretu Block.

VOLUNTEER REGULATIONS.

Mr. WARD asked the Minister of Defence, If he has any objection to there being issued under section 14 of "The Volunteer Act, 1881," an Order in Council for embodiment in the Volunteer Regulations: (1) the compulsory retirement of all officers, unless for good and sufficient reasons, on attaining the age of sixty years; (2) the approval of the Commander-in-Chief, so long as they are not repugnant to the Act and regulations now in force, to "standing orders" of any regiment of cavalry, artillery, brigade of naval artillery, or battalion of rifles; (3) permitting any battalion of rifles to work upon a "regimental system," if they should elect to do so?

Mr. FERGUS, in reply, said there would be no objection to retirement of field officers at sixty-five and other officers at sixty years of age. But a system of retirement after so many years' service in each rank as in Her Majesty's service would be preferable, whether or not combined with a fixed superannuation age. As to the second question, there was no objection to it. As to the third, where Volunteers desired it this would be advantageous;

but the wishes of each corps would have to be considered before taking away their present independent organization, and therefore the decision of a simple majority of the battalion would not be sufficient.

AUCKLAND RESIDENT MAGISTRATE'S COURT CASES.

Mr. MCGREGOR asked the Minister of Justice, Whether his attention has been drawn to the manner in which Mr. Baddeley, the Assistant Resident Magistrate of the Court at Auckland, conducts the business of the Court? He considered it unfortunate to have to draw the attention of Ministers to the decisions of Courts of justice; but this case was notorious, and he thought it right to call the attention of the Department of Justice to it.

Mr. FERGUS replied that the attention of the Government had been directed to certain decisions given by Mr. Baddeley, and it was the intention of the Government to inquire into the matter.

ABSENT OFFICIALS.

On the motion of Mr. TURNBULL, it was ordered, That there be laid upon the table of the House a return showing the number of Government officials absent from the colony, their annual salaries, and the time and terms on which leave has been granted.

TRUST FUNDS.

On the motion of Sir J. HALL, it was ordered, That there be laid before this House a return showing the securities on which the several trust funds of the colony, whether sinking funds, Savings-Bank funds, funds of the Government Insurance Department, of the Public Trust Office, or any others, are invested.

NAVAL DEFENCE BILL.

A message was received from His Excellency the Governor, transmitting the Naval Defence Bill.

The House having resolved itself into Committee of the Whole,

Major ATKINSON moved, That the Committee recommend that leave be given to bring in the Bill.

Mr. TURNBULL.—Will the Colonial Treasurer be kind enough to inform the Committee what amount has already been spent for defence purposes?

Major ATKINSON.—I am sorry to say that I cannot state the amount positively; but, speaking from memory, I think that, including £54,000 of liabilities on the 30th September last, there has been about £369,000 expended. But I speak from memory, and of course am open to correction.

Mr. TURNBULL.—It is difficult to ascertain the amount, as it is classed with harbour works and defence. I think we have got into the position in which we now find ourselves through having a military man as Governor, our timidity being increased in consequence of a paper read by him before an institute here. We have spent between £300,000 and £400,000 in putting our harbours in a state of defence; and now we are called upon to do what, I freely admit, would have been the proper thing to have done before. Would the honourable gentleman tell us the amount which is proposed to be taken under this Bill?

Major ATKINSON.—On the basis of population it will be about £20,000 a year. It would, however, be more convenient to take the discussion when the Bill comes on for second reading. The honourable gentleman is under a misapprehension in supposing that the earth-works, and so forth, do away, or were supposed to do away, with the naval defence. These are simply a basis upon which the navy can act. I will explain all that more fully when I move the second reading of the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and the Bill read a first time.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS BILL.

Mr. MITCHELSON.—Mr. Speaker, in moving the second reading of this Bill, I shall endeavour to show honourable members the reasons that have decided the Government upon asking the House to hand over the control of our railways to a non-political Board. Ever since the inauguration of our railway system dissatisfaction has existed, and year by year this dissatisfaction has grown to such an extent that we now find the public from one end of the country to the other are clamouring for a change. One need only look at the Order Papers of the present and previous sessions to ascertain that in the minds of honourable members a great deal of dissatisfaction also exists. In the Provincial District of Auckland a very large number of people advocate the adoption of what is known as "Vaile's system." There is no doubt whatever that if that system were adopted throughout the country the users of the railways would be very largely benefited; but those benefits would be derived at the expense of the general taxpayer. While, in the present condition of the colony, I should not be disposed to recommend a trial of Vaile's system throughout the country, as I feel satisfied that by doing so great loss would result, yet I think it is a matter for the Board to consider, when appointed, whether or not it would be in the interests of the country to give that system a trial upon one or more sections. We are continually receiving applications from various parts of the colony for conveniences, extra accommodation, and other matters, and there are also complaints of inconsistencies and anomalies in our present scale of rates and charges, and repeated applications for reductions. The question has now arisen, whether the Government railways are to remain under our present system of management, or whether we shall adopt another. I myself have for many years been against appointing non-political Boards, fearing that by so doing we should be parting with too much power. I have during the past year considered the question very carefully, and I must say that I have reluctantly arrived at the conclusion that the only solution of our present difficulties is a non-political Board. I have come to this conclusion after giving the matter a very great deal of consideration. If it were possible that a Minister could be appointed to the position of Minister of Railways and Public Works for a definite period, then I should say, Maintain our present system; but where we have responsible Government, and Ministries are subject to come and go at the will of the House or of the people, it is a matter of impossibility for any Minister, no matter how clever he may be, to grasp the position, or make himself thoroughly acquainted with the intricacies of railway management, which require years of careful thought and study to thoroughly master. In the unfortunate position of Minister—who, perhaps, is only in office for a very short time—he has to rely, to a very large extent, entirely upon the advice and information he receives from the officials of the department; and this will always be the case so long as we carry out our present system of appointing Ministers to the position who have had no practical experience. I may, however, say that, as far as I am concerned, during my connection with this Ministry I have nothing whatever to complain of as to the officers of the department, for I have received from them every facility, and the greatest support from Mr. Hannay, who has, in the General Manager's absence, managed our railways in a most efficient and praiseworthy manner. I may also say that, in the years 1882-84, when I had the pleasure of occupying the position I now hold, I had then Mr. Maxwell, the General Manager, under me; and I may say that I then considered that he was a very able and very efficient officer: but he was very unfortunate in having to offend a very large section of the public. In endeavouring to do his duty to the country he had to refuse facilities and conveniences which, had he conceded them to the public, would have made him intensely popular; and from my observations then made I feel convinced that as a railway manager he will be hard to replace. So that, in asking the House to agree to the second reading of this Bill, it is not in any way casting reflections upon the previous management of our railways. The system itself will have to be remedied. The system now proposed has been in vogue in Victoria for four years, and there it has been so successful that the neighbouring colony of New South Wales has framed a Bill upon similar lines to that in operation in Victoria. It is some what an improvement on the Victorian Bill, but there is no doubt that the Government of New South Wales introduced it after being assured of the success of the Victorian measure. Of course, in dealing with a country which, from its configuration, is so peculiarly situated as our own, in which so many different elements are competing against us in the shape of water-carriage and roads, it is not quite right to compare it with either Victoria or New South Wales. We have a great many more difficulties to contend with; and, no matter whether our railways are managed by a Board or by a Minister, these difficulties will exist; nor can we hope to obtain as good results as they have done; and for that reason differential rates, perhaps to a greater extent than they have them, however objectionable, will have, to a certain extent, to remain in force in this country. The Bill we have now before us is chiefly based on the Victorian Act. There are in it some clauses taken from the New South Wales Act, and there are some new clauses, and we have endeavoured to improve the Bill so as to meet the requirements of this country in every way. The language of the Bill is very plain, and I do not think it necessary for me to dwell at length on each particular clause, but I shall briefly refer to them, and, where necessary, shall comment on them. Clause 3 empowers the Governor to appoint the Commissioners, and fixes the date on which the Act is to come in force. This is necessary because we must have time to consider where the Commissioners are to be obtained from; but no unnecessary delay will take place. Clause 6 provides for the appointment of the Commissioners, and fixes their term of office. This is fixed at five years; but in Victoria and New South Wales the term is seven years, and I myself think it would be wise to strike out the "five" and insert "seven," because I think by that we shall be able to secure the services of better men, and give more satisfaction to the public. Much better results will, I am sure, be obtained by fixing the term at seven years. Clause 7 provides for the tenure of office of the Commissioners, for their removal and suspension, and also that, in the event of any Commissioner being suspended, a statement of such suspension shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament. It also protects the colony against any laches on the part of any Commissioner. Clause 8 provides for the appointment of the Chief Commissioner, who, under this Bill, will not have the supreme power that the Victorian head has. I think that is a mistake in the Bill, and that it will be necessary to give him supreme power, as in Victoria, where the provision is,— "That the Governor in Council may appoint one of the Commissioners to be Chairman, and, if the Chairman should differ from the decision of the other two Commissioners with respect to any matter that is before them for determination, such matter to be deferred for twenty-four hours, when it shall be again brought forward; and, in the event of the Chairman again differing from the decision of his co-Commissioners, such matter shall be determined by the Chairman, who shall enter his reasons in the minute-book, and shall forward to the Minister a true copy of such minute for presentation to Parliament."

I think that would be a very wise course for us to adopt, for it is a mistake to introduce an expert with a high salary and then allow him to be overruled by the two other Commissioners, who may not have the same knowledge as he possesses. Clause 9 provides for salaries and allowances. Clause 10 provides that any two Commissioners shall be a quorum. Clause 11 provides that if, at any meeting when only two Commissioners are present, a difference of opinion should arise, the matter is to be postponed for a full meeting. Clause 14 stipulates that no Commissioner shall be interested in any contract or other emolument, under a penalty of a fine or imprisonment. Clause 15 defines the duties and powers of the Commissioners, giving to them the management, working, and maintenance of all railways now constructed or to be constructed. I think that is a very important provision, and I feel certain that a great saving will be effected by handing over to the Commissioners the power to construct railways. In the past our railways have been constructed in a manner which has not been satisfactory, and consequently a very large amount of money has been voted by Parliament out of every loan for improvements upon open lines which would not have been necessary if the lines had in the first instance been properly constructed. Of course a great deal has been spent on rolling-stock, which is a matter of necessity; but a great deal has also been spent in reconstructing actual lines, in straightening curves and flattening grades, which should not have been necessary. By placing construction as well as working in the hands of the Commissioners I feel sure a large saving will be effected. Clause 16 vests in the Commissioners all railways within the meaning of the Public Works Act of 1882, giving them full power to construct, purchase, or acquire any railways which are now worked by and on behalf of Her Majesty, and all rolling-stock, machinery, goods of every kind, land, and, in fact, everything in connection with our railway system. Clause 18 provides that the titles to lands are to be registered in the names of the Commissioners. Clause 19 provides that all conveyances and agreements made before the commencement of this Act by the Minister shall be binding on the Commissioners. Clause 20 confers upon the Commissioners all the powers under "The Public Works Act, 1882," respecting the working, management, and maintenance of railways. Clause 25 empowers the Commissioners to undertake construction-work. Clause 26 vests in the Commissioners any railways that they may construct. Clause 27 is a most important clause, as it prevents either the Governor or the Minister from having any control whatever over the railways. Clause 30 provides for the reconstruction, duplication, or other extension of any existing railway. It also provides that the Commissioners shall not incur liabilities to a greater amount than Parliament has appropriated, except in cases of emergency, and then only after having received the consent of the Minister in writing. Clause 31 gives to the Commissioners the authority to decide upon the position and erection of stations, sidings, piers, wharves, buildings, and other works of accommodation. I think that is also a very useful clause, as in numerous instances in the past stations and sidings have, through political influence, been erected in places where they would not have been erected had proper discretion been used. Clause 36 gives to the Commissioners power to make or alter by-laws for the objects mentioned in the subsections. Clause 39 vests in the Commissioners the working of the telegraph-lines as agents for the Postmaster-General. Clause 40 gives the Commissioners power to enter into contracts with the Postmaster-General for the conveyance of letters, papers, parcels, and any other thing in connection with the postal service. Clause 42 gives to the Commissioners power to make contracts for everything required by them for the purpose of carrying out the Act. Clauses 43, 44, and 45 also refer to contracts, and how they are to be carried out. Clause 46 vests in the Commissioners the power to control and expend all moneys appropriated by Parliament for the construction or other work upon the railway. Clause 47 provides that the Public Revenues Act of 1878 shall apply to the Commissioners, and that all moneys collected or received by them shall be paid in to the credit of the Consolidated Fund. Clause 48 provides that before intrusting any of their employes with the control of money satisfactory security must be taken. Clauses 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, and 59 relate to employes, showing how they are to deal and be dealt with. They are all safeguard clauses. Clause 60 stipulates that the Commissioners shall lay upon the table of the House an annual report within a month of Parliament meeting. Clause 61 gives to the Commissioners power to appoint and remove employes, to regulate salaries and wages paid to employes out of moneys voted by the General Assembly, and provides that persons in the employ of the Government shall have the same rights as if they had been appointed by the Commissioners. Clause 62 states the powers vested in the Commissioners respecting regulations as set forth in subsections (1) to (11). Clauses 63 and 64 set forth how appointments are to be made. Clause 65 is a most important clause, as it provides that no appointment shall be confirmed until the probationer has effected an insurance upon his life for an amount which will be considered satisfactory to the Commissioners. Subsection (2) provides that from the salary of every officer, clerk, or employe a percentage to be prescribed shall be deducted, which shall be invested in the Public Trust Office at interest; and upon retirement from the service of such person, from whatever cause except for the commission of a crime, the amount to his credit is to be paid over to him. This will be a great boon to the railway servants, as by adopting this means they will to a certain extent be provided for. With reference to this clause, I think it would be well for the Government to subsidise this fund by putting into it the amount which they now have to pay for accidents or injury to men, and also adding to it the amount now at the credit of the accumulated fund account. The absence of a benefit fund has been a great blot on our system, the amount of money that the men have received in case of accident being very small indeed. Practically, it has been no benefit to them. Clauses 66 and 67 relate to promotions, gratuities, and overtime payments. Clauses 69 and 70 relate to discipline. Clause 71 makes the Commissioners, or a majority of them, a Board of appeal for employes. Clause 75 saves the existing rights of Civil servants. The meaning of that clause is this: that all persons now in the Civil Service who are entitled to pensions or retiring-allowances when leaving the Service, as soon as they receive appointments under this Board will have their pensions or retiring-allowances computed, and the amount placed to their credit; so that, if they take service under the Board, they will cease to have right to pensions or retiring-allowances; and when they leave the service of the Board the amount of the computed value will be handed to them. Clause 76 provides for the investigation and reporting of accidents. Clause 77 provides that the Governor may direct a formal investigation to be made as to any accident that the Minister may consider has not been properly inquired into. In conclusion, I have only to say that, if the House will pass the second reading, and will assist the Government in making the Bill a workable measure in Committee, I shall be very much pleased; for I am convinced that, unless we pass this most important measure this session, we shall not be doing our duty to the country, and the inconsistencies and anomalies in our existing scale of rates and charges will still be a cause of irritation to the public. If, on the other hand, the Bill is passed and the Board appointed under it, I trust and feel sure that they will rearrange the tariff so as to give general satisfaction to the public throughout the country.

Mr. E. RICHARDSON.—I have very great pleasure in rising to make a few remarks on this Bill; but I should first like to be allowed to congratulate the honourable gentleman on the speech he has just made, giving a short description of the very important measure he has introduced, and, further, on the evidence of the care and trouble which the honourable gentleman has taken in preparing this Bill. I have reason to know what that trouble has been, because on previous occasions I have gone through the same process myself, and have prepared at least three Bills on this subject, to one of which I shall presently refer. I do not propose to follow the honourable gentleman in his description of the Bill, or in the remarks he has made, but rather to call attention to a few points which he has not laid much stress on, and which to me appear to require to be brought before the House and to be thoroughly understood before this important Bill is passed. The honourable gentleman said that since the railways have been opened in this country dissatisfaction at their management has existed, and that that dissatisfaction has increased from year to year. I have no doubt that he was speaking from his experience when in his present office in 1883 and 1884, and also now, and that, if he has extended his inquiries to what is going on in the adjoining colonies, he has found that the dissatisfaction in New Zealand is not a tithe of what it has been in Victoria and New South Wales, and, further, that the dissatisfaction which has existed in these colonies is not nearly so much as the dissatisfaction which has existed in connection with railway management in older countries such as Great Britain, and in several European States. He will find that dissatisfaction has existed and has grown in every country in which railways have been constructed on a scale of any magnitude. I shall presently refer very briefly to the reasons—which the honourable gentleman has not really stated—why the Colony of Victoria has adopted this system of railway management, and why New South Wales is about to do so. I was very sorry to hear the honourable gentleman say that he thought it not improbable that the Commissioners might try what is known as Vaile's system of working on some of the lines. I do not believe at all in that system, and I hope they will not waste much time in considering it, because, if they look into various works which have been published on railway management, and the reports of the proceedings of various institutes in older countries, they will find that fully twenty-five years ago this matter was discussed, and the plan, I am told, was even tried on a small scale, and it has been condemned absolutely by all those who have really had anything to do with railway management, not only in Great Britain, but also on the Continent of Europe. I have a work now before me in which the matter is dealt with in a very able way. I was exceedingly pleased to hear the honourable gentleman state so emphatically as he did that the Government, in bringing forward this measure, had no intention of casting any reflection on the officers of the Railway Department. I entirely agree with that, and I may say here that the officers of our Railway Department generally have shown the possession of capabilities of a very high order indeed, and they are, as a class, very superior to those who, till quite recently, were employed on the railways in the neighbouring colonies, and a class of men who, if they had had freedom of action in dealing with our railways as a commercial concern, apart from all other considerations—some of which I shall refer to presently—would have caused our railways to show very much better and very much larger results than they have done hitherto. The honourable gentleman went on to say that the real point—the decision we have to come to—is, whether the system has to be changed. Now, I should have liked to hear him go a little more fully into this matter, and say what he means by changing the system; because, as far as I am aware—and I think, probably, I am as fully informed as it is almost possible for any one to be—as to the action taken by the Railway Commissioners in Victoria, and also what has taken place in regard to the management of the railways in Victoria prior to their being placed in the hands of the Commissioners, having had the good fortune to be closely associated with some of those largely connected with the railway management there;—I say, from my knowledge of this, I understand that the system of management by the Victorian Railway Commissioners is practically the same as it is now in this colony and, practically, all the world over where there are railways. The difficulty that has been met with in our railway management—the honourable gentleman did not lay much stress on it—has been the interference, if I may so call it, of political pressure as to the question of rates; and the same difficulty has existed to a large extent in the adjoining colonies. I think there has been very little else that has caused difficulty in this colony. The honourable gentleman then went on to say that, owing to the peculiar circumstances of this colony, and the position in which the railways are placed as regards competition, differential rates are necessary here. Now, there also I should have liked him to go more fully into the point, because I propose to say a few words further on it; and my remarks on this head probably would not have needed to be so long if the honourable gentleman had been a little fuller and stated explicitly what he meant. Before going further I may say that there is a very considerable difference between the Victorian Act and the Bill now before us; and the New South Wales Bill differs largely from both. When the honourable gentleman was referring to the appointment of a Chief Commissioner an honourable member asked if the rate of remuneration for that officer had been fixed; and I understand the Government have not yet fixed it. Very great powers are proposed to be given to the Chief Commissioner, as in Victoria, and very much will depend on the rate of remuneration the Government offer as to the class of man the Government will be able to induce to come to the colony, if they go to Europe for him. That is a very important point, and one on which very much depends as to making this system successful. I shall pass over a number of other remarks the honourable gentleman made until I come to what he said with regard to the expenditure incurred on opened lines. On hearing the honourable gentleman's remarks, it struck me that he inferred that a large part of that expenditure had been needlessly incurred; whereas the facts are these: When our railway system was initiated in 1870 and 1871, it was proposed that the lines should be of a light, cheaply-constructed character, and that the rolling-stock should be of the same character; but since the lines have been opened there has always been pressure exercised to increase the speed of running trains, and to bring our railways generally more up to a class of a very much higher character than what was proposed on the initiation of our system. The consequence has been that, as the rate of speed has been increased, it has been found that heavier rolling-stock was indispensable; and this, in its turn, necessitated very considerable additions in the way of strengthening, ballasting, and so on. In fact, both the lines and the rolling-stock have been made of quite a different, more expensive, and more permanent character than what was intended when the railways were made. The honourable gentleman passed over clause 25 very lightly, and it was to that clause that I expected him to draw the attention of the House especially, because it is by that clause that the entire future construction of the railways is placed in the hands of the Commissioners. The honourable gentleman has not told us what the views of the Government are as to the instructions which will be given for the guidance of these Commissioners—I mean by "instructions" the general method of the future management. To show what I mean in this respect, I have taken some notes of the references by various speakers in a recent debate; and I have found that among those who have referred to the railway-management question opinions seemed to be just about equally divided as to what should be expected of the Commissioners. That is to say, some honourable members have stated that the railways should have been made more, in the past, for the purpose of opening up the country, and those honourable gentlemen have added that they do not think that the railways ought to be expected to return interest on the money laid out on them. On the other hand, we find an equal number of members who have addressed the House stating that the railways ought to be put in the hands of a Board such as is here proposed, and to be worked on commercial principles, and be made to pay interest on the cost of construction. Of course, if the Commissioners are to have this great power, it will be necessary, before the House gives them that power, that some understanding should be arrived at as to what the railways are to be expected to do. As to the provision for employees who may meet with accidents, I will only say that, in respect to the sum of some thousand pounds which has accumulated from fines inflicted during several years past, it was the intention of the late Government, if the Board Bill had been passed in 1885, that this sum should be handed over for the commencement of such a fund as the honourable gentleman proposes to make under this Bill. Now, I think there has been a great deal of misapprehension in this House and in the country generally as to the reason why the railways of Victoria were handed over to a Board. It was not owing to any such system of management as the honourable member referred to, but it was because of the enormous political influence that was brought to bear for securing employment on the railways for the friends of members of Parliament, supporters of the Government for the time being. Abuse in that direction had grown to such an extent in connection with the Victorian railways that it was absolutely necessary that something should be done. It was a notorious fact that the skilled officers in the department, those who really understood their work, were actually being impeded by the enormous number of persons forced upon the department owing to that political influence of which I have spoken. That was really the reason of the Government of Victoria adopting this different system of management. And, if my information is correct—and I am sure it is, because it comes from one of the highest authorities in New South Wales,—that sort of thing has also gone on in New South Wales, although not to the same extent as in Victoria; and that is regarded as a cause for alarm. It seems to them that the only way out of the difficulty is to completely alter the system of management. It is not my intention to draw any comparison between the working of the railways in New Zealand and in the other colonies; but, when I state to the House that the Government of New South Wales are about to spend something like half a million in the way of reorganizing their workshops and their general management, I think the House will see that it is time indeed that they did alter their arrangements. Before leaving this part of the question, I may say that since 1880, at any rate, none of those abuses with reference to the appointment of officers to which I have been alluding have taken place in New Zealand. The system of classification adopted here in 1880 on our railways has been, as far as I have been able to see, carried out fairly; and improper appointments have not been made as the result of political pressure. It is almost impossible that they should be made. However, the fact is that you have now, and have had for some years, in force on the railways of this colony precisely the same system that has been adopted in Victoria, so far as that part of the management of the railways is concerned. Of course I do not say that we have any right to claim originality, for we had taken our system from those which had been adopted by other countries. However, such is the fact, and it is a fact that, I think, has been overlooked, that you have already in this colony the system of classification that is in force in Victoria under the Railway Board, and that it has been brought into operation by the departmental officers. Now with reference to this question of differential rates. In reading through this Bill, though I have had some little experience in these matters, I am bound to say that I should have liked to see the specific powers which it is proposed to give the Board set out at much greater length, for it seems to me that some necessary powers are omitted, while one or two of the powers proposed to be given ought, I think, as I said at the outset, to have been further alluded to. Among those I now refer to are those of fixing rates. The Victorian Board has power to make what are called contract rates for quantities. I believe it is doubtful whether such a power exists here. At any rate it is not specified in this Bill. I believe that it has been used to a small extent on the New Zealand railways, and it has been used to a considerable extent on Victorian railways; and it is a point on which there is a great deal of dissatisfaction in many directions in Victoria. In this Bill it is proposed specifically to authorise the Board to make differential rates of charges for the carriage of passengers or goods. Now, there is a very great difference of opinion among experts as to what this term "differential rates" will cover. In older countries differential rates have been made for export traffic, import traffic, and rates for long distances and rates for short distances; and these already exist to a very considerable extent in this country. These rates have been made after careful consultation with importers, exporters, merchants, and traders generally, and also not in entire forgetfulness of the interests of producers and consumers. Of course it is quite understandable that a rate which may suit an importer will not suit an exporter, and a rate which will suit the consumer may not suit the producer: hence all the trouble and dissatisfaction that have been caused under the different railway systems, not only here, but in the older countries. I dare say the honourable gentleman had seen Mr. Grierson's work, which is the most recently published work on the question, and if any honourable member looks through that work he will see chapter after chapter on this question, showing how these different rates operate under different circumstances on the railways throughout the world, and how they have given rise to the appointment of various Commissions by the Houses of Parliament in England, the sittings of one of which Commissions lasted over two whole sessions of Parliament. It will be seen from the evidence of experts that a large number of persons who use the railways get what they ask for, and they are never heard of; but those who fail to get what they want are heard of very often, and, as a rule, the smaller the complaint the more you hear about it. That is to say, you never hear of those who get what they want; but those who have any cause to be discontented come forward and continually worry till they get what they want; and, if they do not succeed with one Minister, as soon as there is a change the worry begins again. No doubt honourable members will carefully look at this Bill, and I dare say they will discuss the matter much more freely and much more capably than I can, and they must see—that is, if I read the Bill aright—that a very great power will be placed in the hands of the Commissioners to follow in the footsteps of the Board in Victoria and make these special rates; and that, if it is allowed to go to any large extent, would produce dissatisfaction far greater than anything we have yet seen in this colony in connection with our railways. Act after Act has been passed in Great Britain and on the Continent of Europe to prevent this very thing, and they have stopped it as far as it possibly can be stopped, and it cannot be done openly in England; but, of course, differential rating is allowable, and exists to a very considerable extent. Although it has only been in force to a very small extent here, owing to the extraordinary troubles which the honourable gentleman in the course of moving the second reading of the Bill alluded to as opposing those in charge of the railways, still I am quite sure it will obtain, if the railways are put under a Board, to a much larger extent. I am sure the honourable member will bear me out when I say that the Manager or Acting Manager of the Railways has told him that he could bring in a considerable amount of revenue if he could make a rate in a certain direction, but, at the same time, he had pointed out that, if this were done, the Ministry must be prepared for a repetition of what had taken place before, and that, if they were not strong enough to resist it, although the rate would bring in a large amount of revenue in one part of the colony, yet in another part, if pressure were brought to bear, and it were adopted there, it would bring about a very large loss. The question of different rates in different parts of the country I have heard referred to in recent debates on more than one occasion, and I have no doubt we shall hear a great deal more about it. I have no hesitation myself in saying that there is room for a very considerable alteration in that direction, and that in that way a very large additional revenue may be got from the railways without doing anything that any reasonable-minded man could object to. I shall not trouble the House further. There are several other points in this Bill, but they are more Committee objections, and to refer to them would involve such an amount of technical description that I should trouble and weary the House. I can only again say, with regard to my action in this matter, that in this House on several occasions misrepresentations have been made when I have not had an opportunity of replying; and that those misrepresentations have been repeated outside, and very much magnified. I spoke very strongly in favour of Boards of Management before I took office in 1884.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Hear, hear.

Mr. E. RICHARDSON.—“Hear, hear,” the honourable member says. Well, immediately on my taking office I gathered all the information that could be got on the subject from Victoria, and I may say I have been constantly engaged on the subject. I communicated with officers in Victoria and in other colonies, and I prepared a Bill—a Bill I have here—which was introduced by me into this House in 1885. Now, it is an open secret—and there can be no harm in my saying it—that the original Bill I prepared is almost on the same lines as that now before the House. But the Government of which I was a member did not consider that they would be justified, in view of the feelings of the country, in centralising the whole of this power in Wellington and having one Board only; and I was called upon—though to a certain extent against my will—to alter this Bill, and to propose the establishment of two Boards, one in the North Island and one in the South. Now, that Bill was not discussed in this House, and my reason for not pressing it was that I found, from consultation with various members of the House—and my colleagues will bear me out here—that there was by no means a strong feeling in favour of this measure at that time, but rather the reverse; and the business of the session was such that it was not considered worth while to take up the time of the House discussing it, for we had not the slightest chance of passing it, and we thought it better, as I stated in the House at the time, that this Bill should be circulated, and that we should hear what the constituencies had to say about it. Before the end of the session I had a very large number of copies of that Bill struck off, and they were sent about in many directions; but between that and the next session we hardly heard any reference made to this question throughout the country. I mention that fact because it has been stated very freely, and it was said in this House by an honourable member only a day or two ago, that the late Government did not dare to bring forward a Bill on this subject. The late Government were quite prepared to deal with this question; but, from the various causes I have just referred to, the matter was not considered sufficiently pressing to force it through the House. There is not much difference between the Bill of 1885 that was introduced into the House here and the Bill which is now in force in New South Wales: in fact, many of the clauses are the same, as must be the case, because they are drawn from very much the same sources. In many of the clauses of the New South Wales Act the wording of our Bill of 1885 has been adopted in preference to following the Victorian Act, and I had the honour of sending copies of this Bill, by special request, to New South Wales. I am not going to take up the time of the House further, but will only say, in conclusion, that, if this Bill goes into Committee, if I can be of any assistance to alter it or improve it I shall be very glad to do anything in my power to help the honourable gentleman in the matter.

Mr. COWAN.—I have very much pleasure in rising to support this Bill. It embodies a proposal which the country looks to this Parliament, and, if it is at all possible, to this session of Parliament, to give legal effect to. It is a source of considerable satisfaction to me to have heard the late Minister for Public Works promise his cordial help in passing this Bill through the House and Committee, because I know it was through adverse circumstances that that gentleman, when he was head of the Public Works Department, was unable to put the management of the railways under a Board as is proposed in this Bill. I therefore think it is a matter for great satisfaction that this Bill will have his support in making it a workable and efficient measure as it goes through the Committee of this House. Now, Sir, there is no doubt this question is one of very great magnitude and one of very material interest to the country. In the first place, it deals with the management of a property which has cost the country over fourteen millions of money. In the next place, the best and most vital interests of the producers of this country will be at the mercy of the Board of Management which it is proposed to constitute. Our railways may be made a huge taxing-machine. As such, that machine can be put in operation for either the weal or the woe of the producers of this country; and therefore I consider that this Bill is one of the most vital importance, and it ought to be looked at from the point of view of the interests of the producing part of the community. Now, it has been stated, and no one can doubt, that the management of our railways has, from North to South, produced nothing but dissatisfaction. As I have said previously in this House, that dissatisfaction has been brought about not so much from the conduct of the officers in connection with the management of the department as from the fact that this Parliament looks to the officers connected with the railways to produce a certain revenue from them. Those officers have, unfortunately, adopted what I call cast-iron rules. From carrying out those cast-iron rules with a view to producing the amount of revenue which they had instructions to produce, this dissatisfaction has in a great measure arisen. Now, although it is my intention to help the passing of this Bill to my very utmost—and I trust it will get fair consideration from both sides of the House—still I must say that the blot of this Bill seems to be this: that no direction, no indication is given to the Board in this Bill as to what they are to produce from the railways. That is an omission which strikes my mind as being a blot on the whole Bill. If such directions are not given to the Commissioners under this Bill, the amount of dissatisfaction that may be created in this country through the operations of these Commissioners will be at least tenfold what it now is. If these Commissioners think of producing not only interest on the capital of fourteen millions but revenue in addition, the effect of that policy will be that it will crush out our producing community; it will have a most deleterious effect upon the best interests of our producers. And therefore I would urge the Minister to take this matter into consideration, and that he should, by legal enactment, give instructions to these Commissioners as to what our views are of what they should produce from the railways. That is a point that strikes my mind as being most necessary in regard to this Bill. The Minister for Public Works has referred to what is known as Vaile's system; and I have a certain knowledge of the proposals of Mr. Vaile, and I know the result of the Committee's inquiries into his proposals. His proposals in regard to passenger traffic failed entirely only on account of the paucity of our population; but I can see this: that, if Mr. Vaile's proposals, instead of having reference to the passenger-traffic of our railways, had application to the goods-traffic, and the carrying of the produce of the country, then I think that that system would be productive of immense good; because, in a few words, Vaile's system is this: It puts an individual resident a hundred miles from a port in the same position with regard to freight as an individual ten miles from a port. That is the plain English of Vaile's system, so far as I understand it. And if such a system could be put into operation so as to put the producer a hundred miles from a port in the same position as a producer ten miles from a port, then an immense impetus would be given to the producers of the colony. But, as I say, so long as we have a limited population and no leisure population, Vaile's system, as applied to passenger-traffic, cannot be a success. Now, in regard to the omission in the Bill of guidance with regard to what the Commissioners are to do with reference to a revenue from our railways, there is no doubt that the manner in which to produce satisfaction in the management of our railways would be to reduce the rates. No doubt that is the process, and, until the rates are reduced, depend upon it this competition that we have had from the roads as against our railways will still continue. But, on the other hand, the reduction of the freights on our railways will bring about an injustice to some of the taxpayers of the country, because there are large districts in New Zealand that have not the facilities of railways. Depend upon it, if the rates are reduced so as to reduce the ultimate revenue from this source of income, that will produce an injustice to those taxpayers who, without having facilities, will be called upon to make up the loss in the revenue. It is a patent fact that the management of the Victoria Railways under a Board such as is proposed by this Bill has been productive of an immense success. But, on the other hand, we must not expect to have similar results here, because in our colony the circumstances are very different. We have the competition of water here, and we have a straggling country and very many centres; whereas in Victoria the whole produce of the colony centres at one point, and therefore their circumstances in this respect of the management of railways are very much in advance of what we can look for in regard to ours. Another omission of this Bill, as far as it strikes me, is that the management of the railways in both Islands is to be centred in one Board. My view is that a greater amount of satisfaction would arise if two Boards were appointed, one for the North and another for the South; but I prefer to abandon the two, on the score of economy, so as to have a trial for a few years of the management under the one Board. The Board should not be centred either in one Island or in the other, it must necessarily be a peripatetic Board, and, in order to bring about the greatest amount of satisfaction, it must not be centred for very long in any one portion of the two Islands. As I say, I shall waive my objection in this respect, so that we may have a few years' experience of the working of the Board; and then, if the necessity arises, a Board for each Island may be appointed. Then, with regard to the term of years for which the Commissioners are to be appointed, my view is that we should adopt the smaller number of years proposed in the Bill, and not the number suggested by the Minister for Public Works, because I think, if they were appointed for five years to begin with, if they are not a success, and if their powers are not put into operation in such a manner as to foster the best interests of the producing portion of the community, then we ought to have the power in five years to bring their work to a conclusion. I am glad to know that the Bill will have the support of the late Minister for Public Works, and I trust that in its passage through the House it will be made as workable as possible, and be so framed as to conserve and foster the interests of the producing portion of the inhabitants of this colony.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—It is with very great satisfaction indeed that I hail the introduction of this Bill into the House. For a long time past I have felt that until we got the railways of the colony under the management of a non-political Board we should not only have popular dissatisfaction all over the colony—as has been mentioned by the Minister for Public Works, and also by the late Minister—but we should from year to year find more extensive cause for that dissatisfaction. The honourable member for Kaiapoi has told us that no such dissatisfaction has existed in this colony at any time as has existed in Victoria, in New South Wales, and also in England. While I defer very largely indeed to the honourable gentleman's much greater experience, and will therefore not attempt any positive contradiction, all I have to say on the point is this: that very great dissatisfaction has existed here, and—as far as I have been able to judge—with a very large amount of cause. The honourable gentleman said the original design upon which our lines were constructed was very different from what is sought for now: that the railways were constructed of light material, and were intended only for slow travelling, and to carry light weights. I am bound to agree with him in that to a large extent; but I would point out this to him: that that does not at all, in my opinion, excuse the numberless mistakes—which it is very difficult for any man of common-sense to understand—that have been made in the location of the lines and the gradients fixed for those lines. The most familiar and forcible instance that occurs to me is on the Manawatu line, that line having, in the first instance, been laid out under political supervision. Though it will be hardly credited, I have the best authority for stating it as a fact that on the length of that line between Otaki and Longburn two sections of it were laid off by the Government with grades of from 1 in 40 to 1 in 50, and curves down to so small a radius as seven chains. Any one who has travelled along this line—and a number of members of this House must have done so—could scarcely see how human ingenuity could have planned grades and curves such as I have described. The line is now constructed by the Manawatu Railway Company with, I am informed, not a single grade exceeding 1 in 100. Such is my information, and I shall be very glad to be corrected if I am in error. Numberless instances such as that will occur to any one travelling along the lines of the colony, and it must be abundantly evident that very little business knowledge and very little of the commercial idea could have been present to the people who laid off those lines; and we now have, unfortunately, to pay for this in the great cost of working those lines. Under the Victorian Act it is incumbent upon the Commissioners to furnish a report to Parliament before any new lines are constructed, showing what the expectation is as to the working results; and I am sorry to see, as far as I have read the new Bill, that there is no such provision in in as that. I hope the Minister for Public Works will insert such a provision, for I think it is one of the most important in the Victorian Act. Now, the honourable member for Kaiapoi laid special emphasis on clause 25, and expressed his inability to gather from the Bill what was expected from the Commissioners—that is to say, the lines on which they were expected to act in fixing freights and fares. I confess I did not quite understand the meaning of the honourable gentleman; and I could not help thinking that clause 36 was much more to the point than clause 25. Under the corresponding clause in the Victorian Act—that is, the clause relating to by-laws and fixing freights and fares for passengers—the law gives the Commissioners power to enact such by-laws; but the Government reserve to themselves the power to assent to those by-laws, and they cannot come into force until an Order in Council gives them effect. I have been picturing to myself the position into which the Commissioners would be launched with powers such as are contained in this Bill. What guide are they to have as to whether they are to manage the railways from a strictly commercial point of view, or where they are to draw the line? I hope that when the honourable gentleman replies he will make it clear to us what the policy of the Government is in this direction. The honourable member for Kaiapoi, in giving the reasons which induced Victoria to appoint a Board of Commissioners, stated that the pressure there had been enormous to find work for the unemployed, and also in the direction of getting cheaper rates; and that pressure somewhat similar to that had existed in New South Wales before they appointed a Board. He also stated that no such abuses existed here. In so far as that they do not exist in this colony to the extent to which they exist in the two other colonies, I agree with him; but I cannot admit that no such abuses exist in this colony. Can any honourable member who recollects what has occurred in the House within the last few days say for one moment that pressure has not been brought to bear on the Government? Do they not recollect member after member getting up whenever certain railway questions were before the House; and can any one say that pressure has not been brought to bear on the Government? I cannot help thinking that the honourable gentleman, no doubt quite inadvertently, has to a certain extent misled the House; and I am sure that in relieving the Government in the future from political pressure this Bill will be conferring a great benefit on the country. Another point raised by the honourable gentleman—and I am glad he referred to it, because I could not otherwise have understood the remarks he made—was as to the dissatisfaction which he says exists in Victoria owing to the special rates as to quantities. I have here the last report of the Victorian Railway Board, giving all the instances in which these special rates have been made for quantities and for other reasons, and I can hardly understand how any dissatisfaction can exist, because the whole number of instances in which these special rates have been made is only nineteen. I have a summary showing the different reasons for making them, and I may say that there are only six of those nineteen instances in which the special rates have been made on account of quantities, and in nearly every case it has only been for short distances—that is to say, from Melbourne to the port and vice versa. I cannot help feeling that the honourable gentleman is misinformed as to the extent of this dissatisfaction which he says exists in Victoria. Of course there is this to be said: that the Commissioners who may be appointed here may take a different view of their duties, and extend these special rates very much more largely than the Victorian Commissioners have done; but the fact remains that it is simply impossible, so far as this item is concerned, that any large amount of dissatisfaction can exist in Victoria. The honourable member referred to the Bill which he himself had drafted; and, recollecting also the very emphatic language he used before he came into office in 1884, it must be evident that very strong reasons existed in his mind in favour of such a Board as this. He explains to us to a certain extent, but only to a certain extent, the reasons which brought about a change in his mind. I shall not dwell on his reasons any further than to cite one of them, which he gave in speaking to his constituents at Kaiapoi, that Harbour Boards, such as Timaru, Oamaru, and Kaiapoi, would be injured.

Mr. E. RICHARDSON.—I did not give that as a reason why the Bill was not gone on with. I simply said it might be the effect, if the Bill were drawn on the lines of the Victorian one.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—I will leave the honourable gentleman himself to answer, when I ask him what other inference any one could draw from his remarks than this: that the position of these Harbour Boards formed one of the reasons which actuated him in not pushing on the Bill which he had drafted.

Mr. E. RICHARDSON.—I never made use of any such argument. I simply pointed out what would probably be the effect of working the line between Oamaru and Hurunui if it were worked on purely commercial principles. It had nothing to do with the drafting of the Bill or pushing it on. It was merely a local question.

Mr. BUCHANAN.—Well, I am not disposed to dwell upon that, and will accept the explanation of the honourable gentleman. I was very glad indeed to listen to the remarks of the honourable member for Hokonui with regard to the question of whether one or two Boards would be most advantageous. I do hope, in the best interests of this Board, if it is to be appointed, that the Bill will pass with one Board and not two. I also hope that members from the South Island generally will take the same view as that taken by the honourable gentleman to whom I have referred. I regret that the Minister for Public Works, in moving the second reading of the Bill, did not give us a summary, from his point of view, of the results accomplished by the Victorian Railway Board as compared with what was done under political management. I should like to make a short statement of what I have gathered on the subject. I find, for instance, in the report furnished by the Victorian Government for the year ending December 31, 1883, that the gross receipts from the railways had been £1,898,000, and, deducting the working expenses, it left £611,044, leaving a loss on the year's working of £235,000. That is to say, the consolidated revenue had to pay £235,000 for interest which the working of the railways under political management failed to cover. The first report from the Commissioners was brought down in 1885; but I will not refer to that, so as to save time. In the next year the report showed that the revenue from the railways had increased by £147,000, although the freights and fares had been reduced for the year to the extent of £100,000. This means that, as compared with a deficiency of £235,000, which had to be supplied from the Consolidated Fund in 1883, the report presented last year showed that a surplus profit of £61,000, after paying interest, had been paid into the Consolidated Fund; and this year we find that, although reductions have been made by the Commissioners in the freights and fares equal to a total of £253,000, a surplus of no less than £40,000 was paid into the consolidated revenue. The honourable member for Hokonui said it was not to be expected that we should get the same successful results from a Board here: and with that I fully agree; but I am strongly convinced that, though the results here may not be so great as in Victoria, yet the system will be an enormous improvement on the present if we are only fortunate enough to get the right man as Chairman—of course, very much indeed will depend on that. The success of the Commissioners' management in Victoria is also emphasized by this fact: that, while the population has increased by only 9 per cent. since the Commissioners took office, the receipts from the railways have increased by 80 per cent. It has given me great pleasure to be able to state these few facts in support of the Bill, and I hope the measure will be carried into effect, with the necessary amendments suggested by the late Minister for Public Works, and others which will no doubt be suggested by other speakers.

Mr. WHYTE.—I intend to support this Bill—at all events, its second reading—because I think that it holds out a slight hope of mitigating one of the more prominent of the evils connected with the system of representative government. We are all aware that representative government has many defects in its working, and I fancy that hitherto our railways have supplied a glaring illustration of at least one of these defects. They have shown it not only as regards their management, but also as regards their construction; and, in the management, not only as regards the rates, but also as regards the appointment of officials and employes generally. Perhaps dealing with the matter of construction now is something like locking the stable-door after the horse has been stolen; but, nevertheless, it is better late than never. There is no doubt in my mind that if our present system of management were continued our railways would, in time, become a great political engine, if, indeed, they have not become so already. I am glad to say they have not yet become so to so great an extent as they had in Victoria before the present system of management there was established. The late Minister for Public Works has told us how bad the Victorian system had grown and what an engine of corruption and mismanagement it was. I am glad to say that, so far, here that has not been the case. But I think prevention is better than cure; and this Bill holds out a hope of affording the required prevention: otherwise I fear that in course of time our railways would come to be manned from end to end by those who are little better than political agitators; for, if you give employment in any grade on the railways, be it high or low, through political influence, of course the men will be engaged not on their merits in railway-work, but on their merits as political agitators and street-corner politicians. In my district the question of railway-management was really the burning question of the late election; and I dare say this will be readily understood when I say that my district is about a hundred miles from a port, so the question of freight is continually coming up and agitating the public mind very much: indeed, the state of feeling there in regard to railway-management is not sufficiently described as one of dissatisfaction—it almost amounts to one of exasperation. I cannot illustrate that more forcibly than by saying that the House and the country very nearly lost my valuable services through this very question, as I was considered to be not quite energetic and radical enough upon it. The Minister for Public Works has already alluded to Mr. Vaile's system; and, whatever may be the merits of that system, in my district the belief in it almost amounts to a religion, and very many clear and hard-headed men believe in it; and, although, I regret to say, I have never been able to see my way to support it in its entirety, still there are certain lines in Mr. Vaile's policy of which I approve, and that are capable of being productive of good results. It must, however, be manifest to all that a change is required, and also that it is absolutely necessary that some policy as to working our railways should be indicated by the House to guide the Commissioners; and, speaking generally, I believe that the encouragement of production and settlement should be the object aimed at in working our railways, rather than the raising of revenue only. Of course the getting of revenue must also be considered; and, in the present state of the country's finances, it perhaps may be admitted that we could not afford to receive a less total than at present from the railways. Still, I think production and settlement should also be duly regarded; otherwise country districts at a long distance from ports will become depopulated instead of peopled. I also think some difference should be made in the direction of favouring the longer distances by a graduated scale of charges, or in some other way. This is, however, not the time to go into the details of any policy. All I wish to point out at present in that respect is that a policy should certainly be laid down by Parliament in the Bill for the guidance of the Commissioners, and, as far as possible, it should go in the direction of encouraging production and settlement. I know I shall be told by honourable members who represent districts that have no railways that that would be unfair to them. And no doubt to some extent it would be unfair to them; but I dare say the House will be surprised to hear that the proportion of the population in the colony that is not served by railways is only about 11 per cent., and that that percentage is decreasing every day. Only about 11 per cent. of the total population do not directly reap some benefit from our railways; and in many cases these people have had assistance in the way of harbour and other works in their districts, and therefore the position is not so unequal as it at first appears. It must be remembered also that even they will reap some benefit from an improvement in the management of our railways, because, if settlement and production are encouraged, that must mean increasing the number of our population, and decreasing thereby the burdens that are now pressing upon the general mass of the people. In speaking of the past management of the railways, I must say, in fairness to those who have been responsible for it, that they have been very much handicapped by there having been no definite policy at all laid down for their guidance. They have been told to make the railways pay. But, on the other hand, they have been subjected to very unequal political pressure to reduce rates. In some districts political pressure has been strong in one direction, and in other districts there has been pressure in another direction not equally strong, and therefore it has prevailed in some places and not in others. But even when political pressure has prevailed in getting what might be a perfectly proper reduction in one district, as soon as it has been made there has been an accusation of unfairness. As the late or ex-Minister for Public Works said, the same reduction has then been insisted on all over the colony, and consequently a great loss to the revenue has ensued. Speaking generally as to the policy on which the railways should be worked, I will just say that I think those who use the lines for the longer distances should be favoured as much as possible—that is to say, people travelling or sending goods one hundred miles or so should be allowed to pay a less rate per mile than those who only use the railways for a distance, say, of ten miles. That is the principle which regulates wholesale and retail trade, and I believe it is perfectly sound on commercial principles. I also think that the fares should not be so high as to be an absolute bar to people travelling, and that no one should be prevented from going about the country, to look for work or otherwise, by high railway-fares; but, to meet that difficulty, I would only lower the fares for the second class, while those who wished to be select, or who wanted comfort and plenty of room to sprawl over the cushions and take their ease, should be made to pay for it. In my journeys throughout my district and other districts in the colony I have found that a very great part of the existing dissatisfaction—nineteenths of it, I believe—is caused by the high charges upon small consignments, and by the extreme uncertainty as to what the charges will be. No one seems to know with certainty what he will have to pay; consignors have found by experience that they have been charged 10s. one day and 15s. the next for the same article. Of course the departmental officers tell us that should not be, and that it is owing to the mistakes or carelessness of officers, and that these things should be complained of, and they would be put right. That is all very well, no doubt; but, though possibly complaints might be made and grievances redressed after a lot of trouble had been taken, yet many people do not care about being compelled to take that course. There are many people who have a strong objection to complaining, or even to writing a letter, and many of such people, to my own knowledge, have become so irritated and angry at the mismanagement and overcharges by which they have suffered that they have ceased to use the railways at all except when they cannot possibly help it. With regard to Mr. Vaile's scheme, of which we have heard so much, one of the principal reasons why, though sympathizing with the object in view, I could not entirely approve of it was that it seemed to me to begin at the wrong end, by dealing with passengers' fares instead of with freights. It seems to me that the question of freights is of much more importance than the question of the fares of passengers. It is true that Mr. Vaile says that he can apply his system to freights equally well, and perhaps he can; but he has not done so yet at any rate: therefore at present we can only consider his system as applied to passenger-fares. Moreover, it appears that the prospect of lowering freights is contingent with him upon the financial success of his scheme as applied to passenger-fares. He expects to make £200,000 a year more than at present by means of his system of passenger-fares, and with that money he would be able to reduce freights by one-third. The earnings in respect to freights amount at present, I believe, to about £600,000 a year; and by means of this £200,000 he expects to be able to reduce freights generally by one-third. However, as I was not convinced that this scheme would prove a financial success, I, as one of the Committee appointed to consider the matter, would only agree to give it a trial in some part of the colony on the condition that the district in which it was tried should be responsible for any deficiency to the revenue that might accrue. I was afraid that if his system were tried generally, without any such restrictions as that, it would result in a large deficiency, which would, of course, have to be made up by extra taxation. I desire to say, however, that this is only my individual opinion, and that, on the other hand, there are many practical men in my district and elsewhere who cordially approve of Mr. Vaile's proposals. I desire also to say that such a hold has this system taken upon the public mind in the Province of Auckland that nothing but a fair trial of its merits will set the question at rest. Of this there has been ample evidence; and the agitation in its favour will, I think, never cease until a trial is accorded to it; and I trust the Board will see their way to grant one. Meanwhile I should like to see freights reduced, more particularly with reference to articles for export. I think that such articles should be carried at cost price. The question of differential rating and special rating has been referred to by previous speakers. Now, any one who has considered the subject must admit that differential rating is an absolute necessity if we are to get any revenue from our railways. If we do not take into consideration such things as cheapness of working in some localities as compared with others, and the competition there is with the railways in certain places, we shall find the trains, especially near the large towns, running empty. Now, I wish to say a word as to the Victorian Railway Board, about which we have heard so much. As I have said, I intend to vote for the second reading of this Bill; but I do not expect anything like the benefits to ensue from it which we are told have ensued in Victoria. I emphasize "we are told," because I have my doubts, and I have heard very varying accounts of the working of the Board in Victoria. At any rate, supposing it to be a success there to a large extent, it does not follow that it would be equally so here. The circumstances are entirely different. There the railways form one system, radiating from one centre, and, generally speaking, all running inland; whereas here we have about a dozen different systems. We have the Whangarei-Bay of Islands system, the Auckland system, the Napier, and the Wellington and Foxton systems, in the North Island. In the South Island also we have pieces of scattered railways on the West Coast, and the Picton, Nelson, and Hurunui-Bluff systems, each of these particular systems requiring separate staffs and surplus plant; and, moreover, they have, in many cases, to compete with water-carriage either by sea or by river. Therefore we cannot possibly hope to have the same results from the adoption of this scheme as have been secured in Victoria. Another thing seems to be lost sight of also, and it is this: that the rates in Victoria—I have had occasion to look into this rather closely lately—are, on the average, higher than they are in New Zealand. Now, I hope and most sincerely trust that the rates here are not going to be raised, because, if so, the people of the country districts, situated at the longer distances from a port, will not be able to live at all. We hear a good deal about Protection, but if any class in the country requires protection just now it is the small struggling settlers, and I venture to say that protection to them would benefit the colony more generally than any protective duties upon imports. We have been told that local conditions should not be considered. I say it is absolutely necessary to pay attention to local conditions. I freely admit it would be very difficult for any Government to introduce special rates, because they would be at once accused of favouritism, and there would be great dissatisfaction. We have seen it attempted to a small extent already, and it is always said that it is done to suit this or that person, and that it is done to benefit Auckland or Canterbury, or whatever place the Minister for Public Works happens to come from. This, I think, would not occur with a non-political Board. I am glad to see that the present double system of constructing railways and managing them by separate departments is to be abolished, and that both are to be put in the hands of one body. I think every one who has paid any attention to the working of these departments must know well that the dual system has not worked well—that one party is always undoing what the other has done. I am glad to see that this is abolished by the Bill. I think it is a very necessary change. And also, as to the matter of construction of future railways, I am sure that if the proposal contained in this Bill had been in force in the past we should have saved a great deal of money. Certainly some of what are known as political railways would not have been built. I notice also a proposal in the Bill to maintain a system of account-keeping as between the Railway and the Postal and Telegraph Department. I wish to throw out the suggestion that I think it is unnecessary, and that the railways should, as a matter of course, carry the mails for the Postal Department and do the telegraphing without any account-keeping. It would not affect the general revenue, though it might result in the department being credited with moneys which did not properly belong to it. But we have got rid of that sort of thing in connection with the stamp duties; and, although we do not know exactly where the revenue comes from, I do not know that that matters very much. I also wish to say that I agree with the system of insurance, and think that a man should be forced to make some little provision to meet the requirements of his family in the event of his being injured, killed, or discharged. There is another question that I should like to say a word upon, and that is as to damages. I think that when this question is being dealt with there should be a little reciprocity—that, if individuals are to be liable for damaging the railways, the colony should be responsible to individuals who are injured by the railways. I am certain that some of our farmers will be ruined sooner or later by fires created by the railways, and I think that the Government should be made clearly liable for this sort of thing. There seems to be no clear law on the subject just now. Sometimes persons suffering loss by these fires gain actions, sometimes they lose them; but I understand that the Government always plead non-liability. I think that, as damages have to be paid to the Government in certain cases, the Government should also be liable in similar cases. I regret that, owing to the hour for adjournment being so near, I have had to curtail my remarks upon this subject, which is of such vital importance to the country districts. I shall therefore simply conclude by saying that I shall support this Bill at present; but I do not bind myself to vote for it when it comes out of Committee, because I think it is capable of a great deal of improvement, and it will be time enough for me to decide what I shall finally do when it comes out of Committee. My main reason for voting for it now is that it holds out a hope of at least lessening one of the evils of our representative system of government. Honourable members need only refer to the Order Paper of this and last session to see how the present evil is growing and is likely to go on growing, until our railway system will become little better than a field for political intrigue and patronage. For that reason I support the second reading of the Bill, and beg to congratulate the Minister for Public Works on his efforts to improve the existing state of things and to provide against worse in the future.

Mr. SAMUEL.—If the second reading of this Bill goes to a division I shall vote against it; and I will try to shortly explain why. When I entered politics three years ago I was of opinion that it was necessary to have the railways managed by a non-political Board; but my opinion has changed. The principal reason for that change is this: that we have seen the experiment of the Insurance Board. That Board was appointed for the purpose of getting rid of the perpetual attempts made to serve the interests of individuals at the expense of that institution, but it was an utter failure. And that Board had a greater chance of being a success than this. That was an elective Board, the members of which could be rejected at the will of those who were chiefly interested. It is not so in this case. This Board will be a power in the land; and I venture to predict that, at no great distance of time, from one end of the colony to the other we shall hear complaints about the management of this Board, and that we shall be doing our best to do away with it. I sympathize with the Minister for Public Works in his desire, and with the ex-Minister for Public Works in his desire, to give the management of the railways into the hands of a non-political Board; for there is no doubt that the management of the railways is the chief cause of the unpopularity of successive Ministries, and it also causes greater trouble to members of this House than any other subject. It is quite natural that Ministers and honourable members should like to get rid of this question; but I venture to say that the change will not satisfy the country. The railways are necessary more for the purpose of encouraging settlement and promoting production than for supplying revenue; and I venture to say that no non-political Board that could be appointed under this Bill would sufficiently recognise that fact, and I think that the appointment of a Board which will make everything subservient to getting revenue will mean the sacrificing of the best interests of the colony, because the Board's only aim will be to show as good a return as possible. For that reason, if this Bill goes to a division I shall vote against it. I am convinced that if it does pass there will immediately be a revulsion of feeling against the system, and the most strenuous efforts to undo the mischief the House is now so anxious to perpetrate.

Mr. PEACOCK. — Sir, there is no doubt whatever that the Bill which is now before us asks us to take a most serious step with regard to our railways. While it cannot be denied that there is a very large amount of dissatisfaction throughout the country regarding our railway charges and management, still it is questionable whether we should look at the matter in the light the Minister for Public Works has put it, that some change is wanted, without looking very cautiously and carefully into the scheme proposed to be substituted for the present state of things. The position, I believe, that most honourable members are in with regard to this question is that, while many of them were unfavourable towards the management of our railways by a non-political Board, they have recently come to look favourably at that proposal from the experience which has been had in Victoria with regard to a similar Board. At the same time, I think it must be apparent to most honourable members that the information which we possess upon that subject is of a very meagre kind. It is true we know that, whereas before the Commissioners took charge of those railways there was a large deficiency in the revenue to meet expenses and interest, now there is a considerable surplus. But I cannot help thinking it would have been well had the Minister for Public Works, in introducing this Bill, taken the trouble to get the particulars with regard to the working of this system in Victoria, so that honourable members might be able to come to a better judgment on the matter. It is evident that a great deal would depend upon these particulars. If we had some tables put before us, giving in a condensed form the particulars contained in the Victorian railway report, we should be able at all events to see whether the improvement which has taken place in the Victorian railway-management is of such a character that we might fairly hope that similar results would obtain in New Zealand.

Of course we are all aware of the very great difference that exists between the geographical features of the two colonies; and I think it would have been well if we had all the information it was possible to get before being asked to come to a decision upon this point, for we must take care that we do not, to use a homely phrase, "jump out of the frying-pan into the fire." It is the more necessary, if the new system is to be made binding for a series of years, that we should be thoroughly persuaded in our minds that it is a judicious and prudent thing for us to do. It might be said in favour of the Victorian system that since the Commissioners took charge of those railways, the returns of revenue and the improvement in the finance have been of a gradual and increasing character. I believe that in 1884-85 the amount of revenue earned was equal to 4.18 per cent. on the whole cost of the railways, the increase of the revenue for the same year being £280,117; and in 1885-86 there was a further increase of £147,000, less increase in the expenditure of £33,000, leaving the net increase at £114,000; making in all, compared with the year 1883, an increase of £647,317. It is also stated in the report for 1884-85 that there was a deficiency to meet the working expenses and interest of £39,000, and that in 1885-86 there was a surplus over all working expenses and interest of £61,483; and in the same year a reduction in the rates took place to the extent of £100,000. Now, I admit that the fact that the returns of revenue and the general results in the railway-management of Victoria have been of a gradually improving character says much in favour of the adoption of that system. I believe that the evil which has existed in our own system has been this: that the rules which may be applicable to one portion of the colony are not equally applicable to another, and that the rules have been of such a rigid character, with such a want of elasticity in them, as to be not suitable to meet the requirements of particular districts. It would be evident, I think, that if the Commissioners spoken of in this Bill are to be appointed, and there is to be only one Board, it will be absolutely necessary that the Commissioners shall reside for a certain time in each Island in order to become thoroughly acquainted with the particular requirements of the various districts. Unless such a course is adopted on the part of each Commissioner, I am afraid we cannot hope for that improvement which we have seen to mark the Victorian system. The intention which the Minister expressed, of increasing the term for which these Commissioners are to be engaged from five years, as stated in the Bill, to seven years, does not meet with my approval. I think, if we make such a very serious change as this, it is not wise to bind ourselves to a long period, and that it will be necessary that the colony should have some means, if the change were found unsuitable, of reverting to the present system, or to some other which might be thought to be more serviceable. I mentioned, when I spoke generally on this subject in the financial debate, that it would be absolutely necessary for this House to decide as to what rules should guide these Commissioners—whether they should be supposed to aim at earning interest on the money invested in the construction of the railways, or whether we should give chief prominence to the settlement of the country and look to the indirect gain flowing to the colony from that source. My own opinion is that we ought distinctly to look for our railways being made to pay a reasonable amount of interest on the money that they have cost. I do not say that I would go to the extent of asking that they should be made to pay the full charge of 4 per cent. which we have had to pay for the money; but I say that we might possibly aim at their being made to pay 8 per cent., leaving the margin of 1 per cent., which might fairly be looked upon as covering the indirect advantages to which I have referred. We are at a disadvantage as compared with Victoria, as our population is scattered, and we have a great amount of water-communication; and there are other circumstances which, by bringing competition to bear on our railway system, will make difficulties in the way of any Commissioners making our railways pay, possibly at any early date, because I believe it will be necessary for any men acting with business prudence to make sure that the railways carry a fair amount of traffic, even although, to secure that, the rates have to be made so low in the first instance as not to enable them to reach the amount of interest on the cost of construction, which they should aim at in the future. There is one point in the Bill about which I have considerable doubts, and that is, whether it is a wise thing to bring in the question of the construction of new railways being placed under the Board of Management. It is quite true that those gentlemen who will be found most useful in giving effect to this scheme might be engineers, men trained in the actual making of railways, or in mechanical engineering, or otherwise, and that it might be possible they would have that knowledge which would enable them to give effective assistance in the way of constructing railways. At the same time I think it must be borne in mind that it does not necessarily follow that this engineering experience would be the best to carry out this from a business point of view. I think, myself, that it might very fairly be confined, in the first instance at all events, to the actual management of the railways, leaving the question of the construction of new lines to be dealt with by those who have specially devoted themselves to that subject. With regard to the remark which has been made by the honourable member for the Waikato that this system, if it were introduced, might do away with what are called "political railways," I do not see that that has any force, inasmuch as the House would still have to deal with the question of what new railways should be constructed, and this Board would merely deal with the carrying of them out; so that the question of political railways, or of railways being made which are not necessary under the circumstances in which the colony is placed, would not be affected by the appointment of such a Board as this. The honourable member for New Plymouth made the remark that he had been in favour of giving the management of our railways to a non-political Board, but that he had changed his mind, and he gave as a reason for his change of opinion that the Insurance Board had been a failure, and he argued from that that the same result might come from the Board we have now under consideration. But I will point out to the House that the two things are not on parallel lines at all. In this case it is proposed that we should put in charge of our railways men who have special aptitude for the particular work to be undertaken, and that they should devote the whole of their time to these duties, whereas in the Insurance Board we had a number of men who were supposed to give a portion of their time to that purpose. Therefore the cases are not parallel, as they would be if, in the case of the Insurance Board, the men had been actively engaged during the whole of their time, and had been men of practical experience in carrying out such a system as an insurance scheme. I will only repeat that it would have been well if the Minister, in bringing down the Bill, had given us—and I hope he will do so yet—in a condensed form, the particulars supplied by the Victorian railway reports, so that honourable members may be able to judge as to the particular changes that were made during these years by the Commissioners in charge of those railways, and be able to judge how far a similar course of treatment would be applicable to this colony, or likely to produce the result which we anticipate. I shall support the second reading of this Bill, but I shall reserve to myself the right to make further inquiry with regard to the details of the measure. Possibly in Committee it may be modified to a considerable extent, and I shall await that process before coming to a final decision as to the action I shall take.

Mr. FISH.—I think, Sir, the Minister for Public Works may fairly be congratulated upon the clear manner in which he has placed this very important subject before the House. At the same time, I do not think that the arguments he or other speakers have used in favour of the Bill are sufficiently conclusive to justify the House in taking a departure of such a very serious character as this is. The principal reason that appears to be urged in favour of the reform now sought to be effected is that it will relieve the Government of what is called political pressure. Now, I am free to confess that it is quite possible, and no doubt true, that a considerable deal of political pressure has from time to time been brought to bear on the Government of the day in connection with our railway system; but I am not prepared to admit that that pressure has assumed such a phase as to justify us in taking this very extreme step. It is said that the people of the colony are clamouring for a change. To a certain extent, no doubt, people may be dissatisfied, but I take leave to express my very strong opinion that, even when the railways are placed under this Board, there will still be a great deal of dissatisfaction; and people will, in all probability, clamour for a change in the management of the Government railways as much hereafter, if not more than now. It is a moot point, and one fairly open to debate, as to whether the Government should retain the control of the railways in their own hands or not. I admit there may be arguments used on both sides of the question. I am strongly of opinion, however, that it is right for the Government of a country to have the control of its railways; and, if we once concede that principle, I think we should hesitate very seriously before giving up the control of Parliament. I think that Parliament should be extremely jealous as to giving up the right they have of criticizing freely the management of these railways from the meeting of one session to the other. I am very much inclined to think, with regard to political pressure, that these three Commissioners, if they were appointed, would be all subjected to pressure, perhaps almost as strong as that to which the Government of the day is. And when we talk of political pressure being brought to bear on the Government, and that it is used to the disadvantage of the railways, what a humiliating thing we have to admit! We have to admit that the Ministry of the day is unable, or not strong-minded enough, to resist pressure of an improper character. That is no argument for a change of system. It is only an argument in favour of getting a better and stronger-minded man to be the Minister of this particular department. If the Government of the day were to have an efficient manager of railways under a political head, I see no difficulty in the Government, and that gentleman, carrying on the railways in as satisfactory a manner as they would under a Board. I beg leave to express an opinion that the great cause of the fault-finding with regard to the manner in which our railways have been managed in the past does not so much arise from any inherent defect in the system, but is to be attributed more to the fact that the working head of the department was not a competent man. I have heard the Minister for Public Works this afternoon, and subsequently, at a later stage, the late Minister for Public Works, pay great compliments to the General Manager, Mr. Maxwell. I do not like to speak of a gentleman in his absence, or of a person who cannot defend himself; but, still, when talking on an important subject of this kind, we must do what is our duty, though we have to mention names. As I said, I think the cause of a great deal of the complaints we have heard may be attributed to the incompetency of the General Manager of Railways. Now, I do not think for the salary that was paid that gentleman you could get the best man possible for the work. If the Government establish this Board, it stands to reason that if the Board is to be intrusted with the enormous irresponsible powers proposed to be conveyed to those gentlemen they must give the head of that Commission a very large salary indeed—not less than £2,500 or £3,000 per annum. Now, if the Manager of our railways had been paid a salary of £1,500, and you had got a man who was worth that money, the possibility is, I think, that we should have heard very little grumbling with regard to the management of the railways. I utterly deprecate the idea that it is not a possible thing to manage our railways properly and economically whilst under the control of the Government, and consequently under the control of Parliament. I am not at all prepared to admit the Minister for Public Works' dictum that the only solution of our troubles now is a non-political Board; and neither am I prepared to admit that the dissatisfaction throughout the country is so general or so strong as to justify so great a departure as is proposed in the present Bill. The honourable gentleman has said that Ministers are not long enough in office. I am free to admit that, as a rule, they are not, but I do not know that it is absolutely necessary for a Minister to be very many years in office in order to carry out the working of the railways properly, because, under any circumstances, whether he is a long or a short time in office, he must rely to a large extent, and properly so too, upon the General Manager under him; and it only requires the firmness of an ordinary business-man to be able to resist any pressure of an improper and mischievous character. Strange how office sometimes does alter the minds of honourable gentlemen! We heard, as I said just now, the late Minister for Public Works passing very eulogistic remarks on the General Manager. I recollect the time, before that honourable gentleman got into office, when he held an opinion very different indeed. I think I recollect hearing him say once that, if ever it should be his lot to get into office, it would not be long before the General Manager received his congé. However, as soon as he got into office he became quite enamoured of the General Manager; and, after being three years in office, he passes a high eulogium upon the General Manager. I trust he deserves it, and that the honourable gentleman was wrong in the first instance and right in the second. Now, it has been said that this system in Victoria has been proved to be a success. I quite agree with the last speaker that we have not sufficient data before us to justify us in coming to a safe conclusion on that point. The profits derived from the railways in Victoria may have increased since the appointment of these Commissioners; but it must be borne in mind also that the great profits derived from the Victorian railways come from the suburban lines, and the traffic on these suburban lines has during the last few years enormously increased. But you will find, if you read the last report from the Commissioners of Victoria, that almost every length of line they have made lately, and which they are now constructing, is being worked at a loss, and in some cases a very considerable loss indeed.

And I do not hesitate to predict that in years to come the profits arising from the railways in Victoria will decrease instead of increasing. With regard to the profits, there is no analogy between New Zealand and Victoria. We may have the same length of lines here as in Victoria, and we shall be doing as well as or even better than they even if they are making 5 or 6 per cent. and this colony only 2½. First of all, we have to go through a far greater length of sparsely-populated districts; we have to compete with water carriage, and we have to suffer from small centres of population,—all of which causes tend in the direction of lessening the profits on the railways. And speaking on the profits of railways brings me to a very important matter in connection with the consideration of this question, and that is, upon what lines the Commissioners shall work these railways. I understood the last speaker to say that the railways should be made to pay a very considerable portion of the interest upon the cost of their construction. Well, I differ from the honourable gentleman in regard to that. I say the indirect advantages given to the country by the construction of railways, and the necessary opening-up of country in consequence thereof, the cheap transit they get both for passengers and goods, are a profit to the country in itself, and that you should not make a main principle of working our railways the getting of the interest upon the cost of their construction. They pay the country in an indirect manner, and thereby benefit the country, even though they do not pay interest. I was sorry to hear the Minister for Public Works state, in criticizing or explaining the clauses of the Bill, when he came to that clause which referred to the length of term the Commissioners should hold office, which in the Bill is stated to be five years, that in the opinion of the Government that period of five years should be increased to seven. Now, we are entering upon an experiment so far as we are concerned; and it appears to me that to bind us down to that experiment for seven years would be a most woeful mistake. If we do go into the undertaking at all, if we, by a majority of this House, think it is wise to create a Board of this kind, then, I say, as it is an experiment, we should make the term of the appointment of the Commissioners as short as possible; and I think that the term should not in any event exceed three years. What will be the result if you do otherwise? If you find, after a trial, that this system does not work satisfactorily, it is all very well to say that you can alter it by repealing the Act; but the passing of any other Act repealing this one will not obviate the necessity and the right of the parties so dismissed to obtain compensation from the colony for loss of office, and very justly so too. Therefore, I say, under any circumstances we should limit the term of these first appointments to as short a time as possible. If the thing works satisfactorily, the term can easily be extended to such time as the Legislature in its wisdom may think wise and desirable. Then, in connection with these Commissioners, there was another statement the honourable gentleman made which I was very sorry to hear, and which, I think, if carried out, would be a step in the wrong direction, and that was, in the event of the Commissioners disagreeing upon any particular point of policy, that then the Chief Commissioner's opinion was to be final and conclusive, and to override the opinion of the two other Commissioners. It appears to me that that would be a most disastrous thing. That is a line of policy which, I am told, is now carried out in Victoria; but it is a policy that I have never seen adopted in connection with anything of this kind before. It is always right and proper that a majority should decide whether a thing should be done or not; but to say that, if the two other Commissioners disagree entirely with the Chief Commissioner, he shall be the sole judge and have the right to do as he likes, seems to me to be a most pernicious thing. If that is to be the case, why not appoint one Commissioner? Why have two others, unless they are to be satellites to go all round the country and do as the Chief Commissioner wishes? However, that is rather a Committee objection, and can be dealt with when we get there. There is another thing to be considered, and that is, will one Board give satisfaction to this colony? We are differently situated in that as well as in other respects from the Colony of Victoria; and it appears to me that one Board of three Commissioners will never give satisfaction to this colony. If we go into this scheme at all, I think we are almost bound to have one Board for each Island. If not, you must perforce have one Commissioner stationed in Wellington, and the other two travelling about the two Islands; therefore you will seldom get a joint meeting of the whole of them. I think you will find that the establishment of only one Board will be very unsatisfactory to the whole of the colonists. I will now merely remark, in conclusion, that I think the powers sought to be conferred on the Commissioners are altogether too great. Notwithstanding the Victorian example, I think we are taking a leap in the dark, and that in taking that leap we are erring in the direction of rashness in conferring such large powers on a Board of this kind. On the whole I would suggest that, if this Bill is read a second time and discussed, it should be left to stand over till next session to be further dealt with by the Legislature. We know very little about it now, and, as has been suggested by the honourable member for Ponsonby, it would be well for the Government to get full information from Victoria as to the working of the system there from its inception to the present time, and this should be supplied to members during the recess, when we shall be prepared next session to vote for or against the proposal as we think best. It appears to me that, in a change of such magnitude, it would be unwise—and I do not suppose the Government wish it—to hurry its completion. It is true the matter has been talked about before, but I believe very few persons have paid any particular attention to it, and therefore, as I say, I think it would be wise to leave it till next session.

Mr. T. THOMPSON.—I do not intend to enter into the merits or demerits of every clause of this Bill. No doubt the provisions in many of them commend themselves to the minds of most honourable members, and the objectionable ones may be so altered in Committee as to be satisfactory to the majority of the House. For myself, I intend to support the second reading, knowing from experience that the feeling of the great majority of the inhabitants of this colony is one of great dissatisfaction with our railway-management and our railway-system generally. I feel certain any change in the present system of management will be greeted with great pleasure by the country settlers especially, for they are very much handicapped under the present tariff. However, my object in rising was not so much to discuss the general merits of the Bill, but for a special reason, and it is this: I notice there is no provision in the Bill whereby a trial can be given to a scheme of railway-management that has been brought very prominently before this House and the country for some years past. That scheme has been supported by petitions signed by at least twenty thousand persons, and also by local bodies throughout the country. Some honourable members seem to be amused at the position I am taking up in this matter, but I can assure them that, if they had been placed in the same position as I was in during the last election, they would have found it a very serious matter. There were a very large number of electors in my district who were very anxious to see a trial given to this system—I mean Vaile's system,—and if that gentleman had not been defeated by a small majority he would have been here instead of me to fight the battle for his scheme. It must also be remembered that a Committee of the House during the last Parliament reported in favour of a trial being given on a section of our railways, provided the district in which it was to be so tried rated itself in case of loss. Of course this condition rendered the report useless. I should be glad if the Minister for Public Works would give facilities in Committee for inserting a clause making it compulsory on the Commissioners to give that system a trial. We all know that great reformers are often laughed at for a considerable time, and so are great inventors. Sometimes men fail during their whole lifetime to get their ideas carried out, but the time comes when their value is recognised, though the originators may meanwhile have passed away in obscurity. It may be so with this matter. At all events, no great loss can ensue from giving the system a trial on one of the Auckland lines, and I hope the honourable member in charge of the Bill will not oppose it.

Captain RUSSELL.—Sir, I admit fully that I have not had this Bill in my possession for a sufficiently long time to make myself acquainted with all its details, and therefore I shall not presume to criticize them at all. But, sad as I am to think that it may be my duty to vote for this Bill, I cannot but think that it is a serious reflection upon parliamentary government when we admit that it is impossible our railways can be managed by the chief legislative body. It is as much as to say that we have been continually doing what we know to be wrong, instead of insisting on what is right being done. I do not believe that under the proposed Bill we shall get much better results from our railways than at present. The honourable gentleman who introduced the Bill paid a high and, I believe, a just compliment to the officers working the department. They are gentlemen who have devoted much time and attention to the administration of the railways; and, if it were not within the power of members of Parliament to go nominally in the interest of their constituents, and bother the heads of the department for relaxations here and concessions there, our railways would be much better managed. But I recognise the thing is inevitable, and, sad as it is, I am afraid we must have a non-political Board. My object in rising is to say that I do not believe, under such a Board, our railways will pay a much better dividend than they do now. It is possible there may be better management in matters of detail than there is now; but, generally, results are governed by wider influences than mere details, and these wider influences are against our railways paying. The last speaker said it would be a good thing if the Commissioners were instructed to give Vaile's system a trial. I do not believe myself that Vaile's system can do anything but result in loss. Still, if there are any enthusiastic gentlemen who believe, like Mr. Vaile, that there will be a dividend paid by managing the railways as he proposes, by all means let some company be formed and hand over to them some section of railway, upon their guaranteeing to pay to the colony the same dividend that that section paid last year, and then, if they do a good thing for themselves, it will be a good example for us to follow. Under those conditions I do not see why the system should not be tried; but I venture to say that you will not find any body of business-men in the colony who will attempt anything of the sort. One has only to travel over the lines to see that it is not want of money which prevents people from travelling. People here are too busy to travel much for pleasure, and when they have to travel on business they travel no matter what the cost is. A large proportion of the people in this colony travel first class. In other portions of the world you will find that even rich people do not do so. I happen to know of one particular instance in which some junior members of our own Royal Family were travelling from Florence to England, and, I suppose having that amount of snobbishness which appears to be inherent in Englishmen, they took first-class tickets from Florence to the next station at which they could change, because it would not look well for members of the Royal Family to be seen leaving Florence in anything but a first-class carriage; but as soon as they got some sixty or seventy miles away, to a place where they were not known, they travelled second class from there to London. That is an absolute fact, as I chance to know, because a friend of mine, who knew them by sight, travelled in the same train with them. We are told that people here do not travel because they cannot afford it; but I contend that that is not the cause, inasmuch as people who do travel travel first class instead of second, as inevitably they must if their powers of locomotion were restricted by want of money. We are continually told of the marvellous success that attends the running of excursion-trains; but that is no argument at all that Mr. Vaile's scheme would be a success. On public holidays people having nothing to do are fond of going into the country on excursions, and, as it affords them a cheap method of relaxation, they avail themselves of the opportunity of taking a run into the country. I have a very distinct recollection of the opening of the extension of the Napier line to Woodville, when every carriage on the line was used to convey excursionists over the line, and I am sure that if you had offered the great bulk of those people £1 each to travel over the same line in the same carriages next day they would not have done it. The idea that people are restrained from travelling by the high fares is an absolutely fallacious one. But the bottom of this whole question is the number of miles of railway we have in New Zealand in proportion to the population. In looking over the subject some months ago, I found that as steadily as the number of miles of open railway has increased in this country so steadily have the average net earnings of the lines decreased. In 1885 the average net return was £217s. 3d. per cent., and it had been as high as £3 18s. 6d. a year or two before. From £2 17s. 3d. it dwindled in the next year to £2 11s.; and last year the net return was only £2 6s. per cent. on the capital invested. The reason for all that I believe to be that we have more miles of railway in this colony than of people who can profitably employ them; and if you compare our position in that respect with the position of other countries, you will find that New Zealand has a greater length of railways in proportion to population than any other country in the world. In New Zealand we have 299 miles of working railway to every 100,000 of population; and in the United States, which comes next, there are only 210 miles of railway to every 100,000 of population. Then there is a very large drop to the United Kingdom, where there are only 52 miles of railway to every 100,000 of population, and the proportion of miles of railway to people is far greater in Great Britain than in any country on the Continent of Europe. I willingly admit that New Zealand is a richer country than most other countries in the world, and therefore that we here can afford to spend more money in travelling than can the people of other countries; but still the fact remains that the net return from our lines has decreased the greater the length of railway open has become; and there is also this fact:

that by the time all the railways now authorised are completed, unless the population increases in the meantime far more rapidly than it has done for some years past, there will be in New Zealand 400 miles of railway to every 100,000 of population. I say we are so completely over-railroaded that there is no probability whatever of largely increasing the net return from the lines. If you carry the argument a little further, and look to the dividends which are paid by railway companies in other countries, you will find that, taking all the railways in the world, they only return an average profit of 3½ per cent. on the capital invested in them; and if you consider how much capital that has been invested in railways has been altogether lost, which makes no return at all, and wipe that off, I believe it would not be understating it in the least to say that the railways of the world do not return an average profit of 3 per cent. Therefore I think there is no ground to hope, however good the management of our railways may be made by a non-political Board, that they will give a much larger net return, because every mile of railway you make in the colony will steadily diminish the average net return, and good management cannot prevent that. It is said continually that the management of our railways is so bad, and the charges so high, that people are deterred from travelling and sending their produce by the lines; but if you compare the New Zealand railway tariff with those of Australia you will find that ours in numerous instances is the lowest. I had no intention whatever of speaking this evening or I would have got the exact figures, but I do know that in almost all classes of freights and fares in this country the charges are lower than those in any of the Australian Colonies. In these circumstances the Commissioners may endeavour to increase the trade by diminishing the charges, but I believe the result would be that you would not get a much increased trade and no increased revenue. You hear continually that dray-traffic is competing successfully with the railways; and it is so in some instances, though it does not seem what one might expect. But there is this to be remembered: that grain and other farm-produce has usually to be carted some miles before it can be carried by railway, and when it gets to the end of the railway journey it has again to be put on drays and taken elsewhere; and therefore, in a country like this, where horses and horse-feed are so ridiculously cheap, it is not at all a matter for wonder that dray-carriage can, in some cases, compete successfully with railway-carriage. I know from my own experience that where the distance is such that a dray can take a load of produce and be back with a return load in a day, it is absolutely impossible, whatever rate you may offer on the railway, to divert the traffic from the road. You may endeavour to get further traffic by reducing the charges, but I believe that, with a very few exceptions, you will fail altogether to do so. There is only one other point I will allude to. The honourable member for Dunedin South said the powers proposed to be given the Commissioners are altogether too large. I do not agree with that at all. If the scheme has any merit in it at all, and if the problem is to be carried to a successful conclusion, I think the best we can possibly do is to make the Commissioners almost autocrats, and give them such a tenure of office that they will not be afraid to face, as they inevitably will have to face, if the railways are worked on a commercial basis, an almost universal howl of disgust from one end of the colony to the other.

Sir J. VOGEL.—It is somewhat odd that I should do anything but cordially support this Bill, for in times past I have expressed very strong opinions in favour of the management of our railways being confided to a Board or Boards somewhat after the plan proposed in this Bill. But I candidly confess the observations I have been able to make since I have been in the colony have led me to think, admitting, as has been stated several times during this debate, that there is a great deal of dissatisfaction with the present management of the railways, that that dissatisfaction is not of a character which this Board could remove, but is, so to speak, in an entirely opposite direction. Before proceeding further I would like to say this: that I hope this Bill will be considered purely on its merits, and not as a party measure. I cannot help thinking that the debate which has already taken place, and any further debate which may take place on this measure, whether it is passed or not this session, will be of great advantage, because we shall have obtained the opinions of members representing the various parts of the country. I do not feel that, having altered my opinion very much on the subject, I shall be entitled to vote for the second reading of the Bill, which, I think, would mean my affirmation of the policy of the measure; but I certainly shall not vote against it. On the contrary, I think it would be an advantage if the Bill passed its second reading, and, if possible, the various large points which it raises should be discussed in Committee. I think the Government may be contented with the Bill being read a second time, and, if they find the various questions to be too much to deal with in Committee in the time at our disposal, I think they should not be reluctant to allow it to be postponed until next session. I am of opinion, from the views which have been expressed by honourable members on the different points raised in the Bill, that they will take a very long time to discuss; and not only that, but it may not be undesirable that those views should be placed before the country for consideration. Therefore, while I shall not oppose the second reading, and shall offer no obstruction whatever to the Bill in Committee, I shall not be sorry to see that the Government decide ultimately not to press the Bill through to its conclusion this session. In speaking on this measure, I wish rather to bring forward prominently what I conceive to be the objections to it; but, in doing so, I wish to say this: The Bill is before us, and those points of which we approve are presented to us, and it is not to be supposed, because I pick out the points which I object to, that I do not admit there is a great deal to be said in favour of the proposals. In fact, it appears to me to be a question of a very open nature. Obviously, there is a very great advantage in divesting the Government of political control over the railways. Obviously, there is a great advantage in removing from this House the duty of voting the salaries of railway employees, and removing the railways from the possibility of being used by the Government for political patronage; and there are other advantages to be found in leaving the railways to the control of those who will devote their entire time to attending to the railways. But I cannot help thinking, on the other hand, that there is this to be considered: that there are hundreds of owners of property who are not wise in the management of it, but who yet would rather manage it unwisely themselves than put the management out of their own hands and into the hands of trustees, they receiving the revenue the trustees made the property earn for them. The case is pretty much the same here. We admit, or think we admit, that the railways are not well managed by ourselves; but the question is, whether, therefore, we should remove them entirely from our own management and place them in the hands of those who will have no responsibility of a serious nature to ourselves, and divest ourselves of the control. I think there has been a great deal said as to change of opinions on this subject, which should make us exceedingly cautious in taking a step which it would be very difficult for us to retrace. I do not wish to be understood as saying it would be quite impossible to withdraw from a step which we might take in this direction, but I quite agree with the honourable member for Ponsonby that the time which we should bind ourselves for in this matter should be so limited as not to fetter the future freedom of the country and the House in dealing with this great question. Now, I wish to turn to the point as to whether the present discontent with the management of the railways will be removed by the proposals of this Bill. I have closely watched the complaints which have been made about the management of the railways, and those complaints seem to me, more or less, to go in this direction: that the department does not exercise sufficient discretion as to the different treatment of different parts of the country; that its rule is of too cast-iron a nature, and that there is not a sufficient disposition to conciliate the persons using the lines. I think I may say a few words about a gentleman who, if his name has not been mentioned during this debate, has, at any rate, been mentioned during the session—that is, Mr. Maxwell. Now, he is not a popular man—very much the reverse; but, at the same time, there is no question that he is a man of very great ability. He has not the powers, or functions, or disposition I should say, perhaps, which enable him to make himself personally popular; but, as regards questions relating to the railways, he has made himself thoroughly acquainted with the subject, and most of his decisions are sound in themselves, and, after all, more annoyance is generally felt at the way in which he announces them than because of their purport. Now, if we are going to make these railways subject to management of purely a commercial nature—that is, to run them to the best advantage from a pounds-shillings-and-pence point of view—I exceedingly doubt whether the dissatisfaction felt will be at all removed. In my opinion, it will be rather intensified. If the railways were run upon commercial principles a very great advantage would be offered to those who use the railways largely. For example, persons who have a thousand bales of wool to send on the railway would be treated more liberally than those who have ten or fifteen bales to send, and similarly with other products. You see in Victoria they have to gazette all departures from the scale rate; and sometimes a lower rate is charged because of a whole cargo being the subject of a contract, and so on. Now, I question whether the feeling of the country would respond to treatment of that kind. The railways have been made at the expense of the colony; they do not pay sufficient to cover interest on cost, and the colony is charged with the deficiency. It was no part of the original intention to run the railways as a commercial concern, but in view of the immense direct and indirect advantage that would accrue from them in the way of colonising the country. Now we are asked to change the nature of the railways from a colonising machinery to a commercial undertaking. I doubt whether the feelings of the people will respond to that. We see that the honourable member for Ponsonby has spoken of different treatment in the South and in the North, and we know that there are a great many paragraphs appearing in the newspapers about the Government allowing competition by carriers. Why is that competition allowed? In most cases it is for this reason: No doubt the railways could run the carriers off the road, but, if that were done, we should have to reduce the rates, and, if such reductions were applied to all parts of the country, there would be a serious loss to the revenue. Thus, now competition is very often permitted because the moment you made the reduction in one district you would have to make it in another, and so the colony would lose in the end much more than it would gain by running those particular carriers off the road. Of course, if a Board had charge of the railways, it would simply consider the question as to what would pay best, and would make exceptions in cases where large quantities were concerned, or where opposition had to be run off. Mr. Vaile's scheme has been advocated by the honourable member for Auckland North, who asks that that should be especially forced upon the Commissioners. I have always felt that there was a considerable foundation of truth in the principle advocated by Mr. Vaile; but, as a matter of fact, Mr. Vaile's proposals are not new in principle—they are a more exact application of the principle that already obtains in the management of railways. The whole subject has been gone into very fully in a book lately published by Mr. Grierson, who was for many years General Manager for the Great Western Railway Company. Now, what is the foundation on which Mr. Vaile bases his contention? He says, what is undoubtedly the case, that when a train start from a station for a number of points you may be sure that by the time it reaches the last point there will be very few of the original passengers still in the train. In other words, the way-traffic is much larger than the through-traffic. Upon this well-known fact Mr. Vaile has ingeniously worked out a precise system. But the conditions of various parts of the country are so different that his precise limits will not answer, in my opinion. As regards the general principle, it is recognised and acted upon, because the rate per mile is reduced over longer distances; or, in other words, it pays better to take long-distance freight cheaper, rather than lose it. Let us suppose a train is to run a hundred miles, and that, without additional expense for haulage or rolling-stock, extra freight can be carried fifty miles because of the train not being filled. In such a case it is evident freight can be carried over a hundred miles at little more than would pay for fifty miles. But this is one example out of thousands which admit of no precise deduction. Then, if you place the railways in the hands of the Board, to work entirely from a commercial point of view, there will arise an important question as to the harbours. It will be no part of the business of the Board to consider what has been done in connection with harbours, or what the interest that the ratepayers may have to pay: it would be the duty of the Board to try and run the harbours off, and to carry the traffic at the lowest rate that it could be carried at without large loss. Then, there is another point well worthy of consideration, and it is this: Whilst I admit that we would much rather not have to vote the salaries for the railway officials in this House, there is a great danger in handing over the whole power of dealing with this matter to the Railway Board, because invariably this would be found to be the case: that they would fix a scale of their own for retiring-allowances, and perhaps pensions, unless they were prevented by the terms of the Act from doing that, and, the profession being what may fairly be called a technical and skilled one, the salaries would rise to a higher scale than it seems to be the intention of the House should prevail in the public service; and as the major cannot go back to the less, as we could not reduce the salaries in the Railway Department, there would soon be influences at work, silently but none the less powerfully, in the direction of introducing a higher scale of payment throughout the public service generally. I shall go back now to a point which I have already touched upon, and which I reserved for further treatment, and that is the question of the railways not having been constructed for commercial purposes but as a colonising agency. And, first, I may say that I heartily concur with the remark of the honourable member for Ponsonby, that it would not be desirable to leave so much control to the Board in the way of deciding what should be the railways undertaken in the future. The railways constructed in this country were constructed upon an understanding which was thought to be indefeasible, and that was, that there should be a through trunk line constructed from one end of each Island to the other. When it was agreed that the most payable parts of the lines should first be constructed it was never supposed that there would be a breach of the obligation to complete the trunk lines right through. At present, and until the lines are completed, this is what is the case: During the construction of all lines and during their working, till they pay the full amount of interest which is payable on their account, the whole colony is charged with a portion of the cost. Can it be fair that those portions of the colony which have got railways, and have obtained them partly at the expense of the whole colony, should turn round and say, "We prefer not to go on with the railways because the continuation of them will not be a payable undertaking"? I proposed, when I first brought down the public-works policy, that there should be a tax imposed upon lands benefited by the railways. Had that been done, how different would have been present results! A great many of the branch railways would never have been made, and there would have been a larger recognition of the principle that parts of the country not already supplied with railways are entitled to be so supplied. Is it fair now that we should, having commenced with the assurance of making the trunk railways, place the control, the decision of this matter for the future, in the hands of Commissioners? I must say that I do not think it is fair. If it is, and we are to look upon the railways simply as a commercial undertaking, then there can be no extension of the railways, except in the case of short suburban lengths, such, for example, as that from Christchurch to Sumner. If we are to be guided by that principle, we should come to the decision that no other railways except suburban lines and feeders should be made. But no one who knows anything of the past history of the colony would advocate such a course. If I were now in a position to make proposals I should consider that, far from extending the commercial principle on which the railways are worked, it would be desirable for us to lower to the minimum extent we could consistently with there not being a loss on the carriage—to lower the rates upon local produce and local manufactures of all descriptions. I am convinced that a larger assistance could be given to local industries of all kinds, whether of a pastoral, agricultural, or manufacturing description, through the railways than by any other means. I believe that nothing would be more conducive to the interests of the country than to propose at once, as I believe it could be now, or to propose that within a very short period, a very few months, we should lower the tariff materially upon all articles which are the subjects of local industry. If that cannot be done at present, is it desirable that we should shut out from ourselves the power of doing it in the future?—as we shall if we enter upon this proposal of a Board for seven years with the large powers proposed to be given to them in the Bill we are considering. Now, there is a great deal, I think, to be said in favour of the proposal made by the honourable member for Foxton. Of all the proposals that have come down for the solution of these difficulties, I believe a Parliamentary Committee, with power to sit during the recess, would probably bring more into harmony with the wishes of the House the management of the railways than any other plan which has been proposed. Besides, I think the railway rates should be looked upon very much as part of the revenue of the colony, and be generally decided, at any rate within very narrow limits, by Parliament itself. The argument that is used about getting an experienced man from Home is, I think, overdone. You may get a man of very great genius—I believe in Victoria they have one in Mr. Speight—yet, Sir, honourable members would be under a mistake if they supposed that the railway system of Victoria has become popular. It is less popular than it was. No doubt it is more remunerative, but the evidence shows that it has not been worked more safely than formerly; and with regard to safety certainly we have reason to be proud of the way in which the New Zealand railways are worked and managed. But, returning to this experienced gentleman from Home, if you were to ask persons in the Home-country what they consider to be a clever railway manager, and a person fitted to take charge of railways, they would tell you that the genius of railway management depends upon the way in which a company can fight off competition, or deal with it if it cannot be prevented. That, Sir, is what makes the railway kings in Great Britain and America—the dealing with competition. As regards the management of the railway traffic, and so on, that is divided into many hands, and, whilst very high salaries are paid to men in the highest positions, still there is such a division of duty that it will not be found easy to find an all-round man familiar with the whole of the details. Putting apart that objection to which I have referred, I doubt if for three times the salary you could obtain as competent a man as Mr. Maxwell; and it is a matter of fact, as regards the management of our railways, that from time to time offers are made to the railway officials of New Zealand to go over to the other colonies at largely increased salaries. It is not long since that a gentleman happened to be visiting a colony, one of the largest of the whole, on leave of absence from our railway department, and he was, so to speak, caught up by the Government and prevailed upon to remain there to make examinations and reports; and the Government had to extend his leave, I think, three times to oblige the Government of that neighbouring colony. We might pay a much larger sum, in my opinion, and not get better men than we have now. As I have spoken so favourably of Mr. Maxwell, I wish to say, also as regards Mr. Hanney, I believe you might go a long way and pay a great deal more money than he receives and not get a better man. Sir, I shall not refer to many of the points which can be discussed in Committee. I will terminate my remarks by saying that I have made these criticisms not at all in a hostile spirit. On the contrary, as I said, I shall not oppose the Bill. I recognise that if I had not changed my opinion considerably I ought to support the Bill. I have changed my opinions, so that I do not feel certain that I should vote for the policy of the measure, but certainly I shall not oppose it; and I say that advantage will arise from discussing the Bill both in the House and in Committee, even should it not be considered desirable to press it to a conclusion this session. Therefore, Sir, I hope the Government will not consider that I have offered these remarks in any hostile spirit, and will not consider themselves debarred from agreeing with them to such an extent as they may be able to concur with them. This is a large question, and it would be a wrong and a shameful thing if we could not, for the sake of the country, discuss such a matter as this without allowing any party feeling to have place in the discussion.

Sir J. HALL.—I quite echo the sentiment which has just fallen from the honourable gentleman opposite, that this is a question which we should endeavour to approach entirely free from any party feeling, and I, for one, quite recognise that the honourable gentleman appears to have done that. Although I may not agree in all that he has stated, I quite believe that he has been animated by a wish to put before the country a proposition which he believes will be beneficial, irrespective of party bearing. Like the honourable gentleman who introduced the Bill, I am a convert to the principle which it embodies. I have taken a great deal of interest for a long time in the question of railway-management, and I have been, as Minister in charge of that department, concerned in the working of the system. For many years, although I was conscious of the evils of the present system, I could not see my way through the difficulties which appeared to me to surround the management of railways by one non-political Board. Those difficulties—arising chiefly out of the peculiar manner in which this colony is settled, and the extent to which its various settlements are isolated from each other—no doubt surround the question of railway-management; but as time has gone on the difficulties of the present system have continued in spite of the earnestness and ability of the gentlemen who have had charge of our railways; and I am very glad to be able to add my tribute to those which have been paid to the ability and zeal of those gentlemen. I say, as time has gone on, the evils arising from political influence and constant political pressure have not only not diminished, but have gone on increasing. Whether in this House or out of it, that pressure is now so strong as very largely to interfere with the proper working of the system, and to very largely interfere, I may say, with the discipline of the department. That pressure is felt not only in this House, but during the elections. I suppose that almost any member who has in his constituency a large number of railway employes will admit that he is very strongly urged, when he comes here, to advocate their interests.

An Hon. MEMBER.—No.

Sir J. HALL.—Well, that is my opinion; and if he is supposed to be hostile to the interests of the railway employes they will exercise a very considerable influence against him at his election. I think that will not be denied. Now, that is a very undesirable state of things. Then, we see a reflection of that in this House. The Order Paper this session must render it impossible for anybody to deny that an amount of political pressure is brought to bear upon the Government with regard to the treatment of these employes, and with regard to rates, and with regard to concessions, sometimes reasonable and sometimes unreasonable, which it is very desirable we should get rid of. Continued observation of this fact has led me to the conclusion that it is most desirable we should try to have what I would call an independent system of management—a system which shall be, to a large extent, independent of political pressure. I had an opportunity a short time ago, when travelling in Australia, of inquiring into the working of the Victorian system, and I must say, in opposition to what has fallen from the last speaker, that I did not find that system to be, as he says, unpopular. On the contrary, whether you judge from what takes place in Parliament, where all classes are represented, or whether you gather the opinions of commercial men, I affirm, without fear of contradiction, that the system is exceedingly popular, that it gives almost universal satisfaction. Although there are one or two men in the Victorian Parliament who rail at the Railway Commissioners, as, no doubt, we shall have here, still they meet with no support and no general sympathy. Both with the commercial community and in that body which represents the country at large the system gives very great satisfaction, and no proposal to interfere with it would be considered for a moment. Several difficulties had suggested themselves to me in the working-out of this system, and I was glad therefore of an opportunity of a conversation with Mr. Speight, the Chief Commissioner, and explained to him the difficulties which had occurred to me, and I found that in practice there were really no difficulties at all. He is not, as has been stated, dissatisfied with his position; on the contrary he is satisfied with it, and quite proud of its results. He mentioned one circumstance which I think ought to be known,—that during the last year the gross return from the Victorian railways had increased by £500,000, and the working-expenses were only 30 per cent. That, I think, is a tribute to the management of the Victorian railways by a non-political Board. Then, passing on to New South Wales, I found there the state of things which has been alluded to during the present debate. Political influence has brought about mismanagement, extravagance, and miserable returns, as it had done in Victoria, and the public there were almost unanimously in favour of the measure which is now being passed by the New South Wales Government to place their railways under a non-political Board. The proposal has also been made in South Australia. Therefore, if we are at all to be guided by the experience of the neighbouring colonies, I say that that experience is in favour of the establishment of the system now proposed by the Government. The late Minister for Public Works, whose speech on the subject I think must have given pleasure to every member of the House, went cordially into the merits of the case, and he, I was very glad to find, will support this measure. I think he suggested that there might be a difficulty if we had only one Board. I thought so at one time; but the experience of the last few years has shown, at any rate, that it is not the question of one central system of management that is our difficulty. The difficulty is that that managing body is so liable to political pressure. Then, Sir, the honourable gentleman has contended that five years is too long a term for which to appoint these Commissioners. I venture to think that five years is not long enough. The whole success of your scheme, I think, will depend on the person you get to work it. If you get a thoroughly good man I believe you may be successful, but if you do not you will not succeed. Now, to get a man of high standing, ability, and experience to come out from England, you must offer him very considerable inducements, and it is not likely that a person occupying a good position as a manager of railways will come out for a shorter engagement than five years. I doubt whether you would get one for that term, and therefore I was glad to hear the Minister for Public Works propose to increase it to seven. The honourable member for Ponsonby spoke as if the introduction of this system necessarily involved the question of differential rates. I think it has nothing whatever to do with that question. It is quite competent for this House to lay down a broad general principle on which this Board shall manage the railways. It does not follow that they are to manage them merely with a view to profit, and to neglect the development of the resources of the country. I think that would be a great mistake. But, on the other hand, I think one honourable gentleman made a very extraordinary mistake when he suggested, as one of the evils that would result from putting these railways under the management of a non-political Board, that that might injure the harbours which had been constructed at very considerable expense. What does that matter? The people of New Zealand were not made for the harbours; the harbours were made for the people; and if we can, by any proper adjustment of our system, transfer the produce that is exported more cheaply by means of our railways than by our harbours, I say let the harbours go. It is the interests of the producers we have to consult; and, if these can be better consulted by carrying their produce by rail, let the goods be so carried. With regard to the same honourable gentleman's statement that the appointment of this Board would have, for one of its results, the fixing of high rates of salary, I think that is purely imaginary. If they do anything of that kind, the estimates will come under our revision every year; and, although we shall not vote the details, still that will be an opportunity when the opinion of the House can be expressed in the manner it thinks proper to do. I cannot help saying that I differ from the honourable member for Hawke's Bay as to the small traffic on our New Zealand railways not being at all owing to want of money. His part of the country must be very fortunate. I know that in our part of the country it is the hard times that have diminished the traffic, and I believe that if we could consistently reduce the rates there would be a very large increase of traffic. With regard to the Bill itself I do not agree with the whole of it. I would only now refer to one point, which I am sorry to see in the Bill, and that is the proposal of the Government to intrust the construction of railways to this Board. It is true that it rests with the Government to say whether that power shall be intrusted to the Commissioners or not; but I must say, to commence with, that I would rather not see that in the Bill. You may get men exceedingly well qualified to manage railways when they are made—that requires one set of qualifications; but to decide where and how railways shall be constructed requires different qualifications altogether. And I think, for that reason, and also believing that in the first instance it is undesirable to hamper this new Board with too many duties, I should prefer not to see this in the Bill. There is one other objection, which may appear to be a trifling one, I was sorry to see in the Bill—that the Commissioners should have power to issue licenses for the sale of spirits at railway-stations, and that the fees to be paid should become railway revenue. This is rather an inducement to extend the sale of spirits at railway-stations to a much greater extent than there is any necessity for. I mention this in the hope that the Minister for Public Works may consider it when we go into Committee. In conclusion, I can only say that this Bill is an experiment, no doubt. I do not suppose my honourable friend can say more than that; but I am very glad that the Government have had the courage to bring it forward. I do not agree with those honourable members who say, "Let us read the Bill a second time and then drop it." We have considered the matter for many years. It is not a new subject. Opinion on the subject has gradually grown, until I believe now there is a very large preponderance of feeling and opinion in favour of the establishment of this system. I hope, therefore, that my honourable friend will go on with the Bill and carry it successfully through; and the Government will have my very best support in doing so.

Dr. HODGKINSON.—I have very little to say with regard to this Bill, and what little I have to say I am well aware will not be well received. With regard to the Bill, I am quite willing to vote for the second reading, and to see it come into operation, though I have no faith in it as a satisfactory solution of the difficulties under which the colony now labours. I believe the only satisfactory solution would be to sell the railways, and so get rid of the political influence and jobbery that are continually going on in connection with these railways. I do not intend to discuss the Bill. I can only say that I think it will only very partially effect the object aimed at—that is, to prevent the exercise of political influence. It might prevent it in the management of the railways already made, but not those to be constructed, if any more are constructed. I sincerely hope that no more will be constructed by the Government out of loans. In fact, I think that will almost be impossible. I believe that if the matter were fairly looked into the colony is at this time on the very brink of bankruptcy.—(Oh!)—Those honourable members who say “Oh!” will have to say “Oh!” in a few years more. It is a fact that for many years the colony has paid its way out of capital, not out of income. We have now arrived at a most alarming stage. The interest paid every year on the colonial debt is, in round numbers, £1,800,000; and if this were paid in wheat it would require nearly fifteen million bushels—three times the gross produce of the whole colony; or, if in frozen sheep, it would require 5,400,000 fat sheep, at 6s. 8d. each. How is that to be continued? It is all very fine to talk of the inexhaustible resources of the colony, and of our valuable assets in the shape of railways; but our railways are nothing more than a white elephant, and will be a white elephant so long as they are in the hands of the Government. I am well aware that these opinions do not correspond with the communistic views of many members in this House. But, Sir, we have only to look around and see the results of their administration for the last seventeen years; and where have they landed us? On the verge of bankruptcy, with one of the most enormous debts of any country in the world, with political corruption pervading the country, and our finances in a deplorable state. I do not intend to press any arguments of this sort upon unwilling ears, but I think it incumbent on me to speak as I have done by way of protest. Ten years ago, when I was last a member of this House, I gave expression to the views I am expressing to-night, and what has happened during that time has justified the remarks I then made on the subject. I think that, as we go on, this Bill may obtain some mitigation, but it will be no real solution, of our difficulties. We shall get deeper and deeper in debt, and the time will very likely come when our available assets will have to go under the hammer, whether you wish it or not. And, I say, while we have some control over our assets we should do what any reasonable man in business would do when he found that his business was of an unprofitable nature, or that he was not skilled sufficiently to make it pay. In that case, if he met with a purchaser who would give him good value for his business, he would readily sell, and would be very foolish if he did not. That is what I contend the colony should do with its railways—sell them. That is all I have to say on the subject.

Mr. BLAKE.—It is unnecessary for me to say that I am one of those who happen to be opposed to the placing of our railways under political Boards, for I can see no other term to apply to them as long as these Boards are appointed by the Government. As in most things, I have no particular opposition to bring forward against this Bill, except that I have a great objection, after spending so much money on our railways, to handing them over to mere strangers, who possibly might make ducks and drakes of the money. As far as I can ascertain, we have spent £14,500,000 in the construction of our railways. I think that constitutes one-half of our public-works debts, because anything over the £29,000,000 was spent on the Native war. So that, really, we are handing over half our immense property, which we have acquired by means of this debt, to be used by people of whom we shall probably know very little. I have listened to-night and heard a great deal more said about the Victorian railways than about the New Zealand railways; but this Bill is intended to deal with the New Zealand railways. I do not know whether many honourable gentlemen are acquainted with the difference between the Victorian railways and the New Zealand railways. If I recollect rightly, when we undertook the construction of railways in this country in 1870, we determined that our railways were not to cost more than £4,000 or £5,000 a mile for construction, and some £2,500 for rolling-stock; and that is about what we have expended on them, for we have constructed some 1,750 miles of railway at a cost of £14,500,000, which gives about the cost per mile I have mentioned. But what is the case with regard to the Victorian railways? The first contract for railway-construction from Melbourne to Sandhurst was let to the firm of Cornish and Bruce at the rate of £32,000 a mile—or four millions; and I cannot see how you can draw a comparison between railways costing over £30,000 a mile and railways costing £5,000 a mile. Then, again, when we started our railways we were content to have a speed of fifteen or sixteen miles an hour; but now we have changed that: we have put on stronger engines, and we are not content unless we are running at about double that rate of speed. Those who are acquainted with the working of railways will know what that means, and that it entails a much greater cost in the maintenance of our railways. One reason why they do not pay, and especially in Canterbury, is that when they were constructed we had no idea that the price of produce would fall so low as it has done. I know that it was calculated that we should never get less than 4s. a bushel for our wheat,—and that would pay; but time has shown that we are getting much less, and our produce does not pay, and therefore our railways do not pay. Another reason is that we have constructed so many lines that cannot pay, no matter how they are managed. Political pressure has been brought to bear on various Governments to construct railways in all directions different from those which were first intended. The first proposition was that we should only construct the trunk lines of railway, and it was calculated that they would pay at the rate of 4 per cent. on the money that they cost, but the political pressure which was brought to bear on the various Governments led to the construction of railways that could never possibly pay. It is useless to grumble at that now, but it is well to mention it so that those who are supporting this proposal may show how it will pay. We know that there are 1,200 miles of railway from Hurunui to the Bluff, of which 800 miles are main line, and 400 miles are branch lines. We get a return of £2 13s. per cent. from the whole system of 1,200 miles; and 400 miles of that costs more money to work than it returns. That causes a dead loss on the 800 miles, or they would be returning £3 12s. 6d., or £3 15s. per cent. interest on the money expended on them. That will show the fallacy of constructing these branch lines, and working them as they are being worked. If a system could be proposed for working main lines, or any lines which would pay over 2 per cent., and if the branch lines were worked differently, our railways would pay. I have no hesitation in saying that not more than two or three branch lines in the South Island should be worked by steam. If they were let to people in the district as iron tramways, to be worked with horses, they would act as feeders to the railways; they would not fall into decay, because of the way they would be worked; and there would be nothing to pay for clearing off the grass for fear of fire. I am quite sure if you worked these branch lines as iron tramways you would find that system much better, and that it would give far more satisfaction to the country. No doubt it would cause the discharge of the servants who are now employed on them, but it would give employment to others; and that is the only way to make them pay. Then let us come farther north. Take, for instance, the Picton line, which is paying 11d. per cent. I am sure a man and horse could take all the goods that are sent on that line. Again, in Nelson the line is paying only £1 1s. 6d. per cent.: that might be worked just the same. In the North Island there are two railways that are paying over 2 per cent.—the Wellington line, which pays £2 5s., and the Napier line, which pays £3 14s. 6d.; but what are we to say of the Wanganui line, which only pays 10s.? I say that, no matter what men you put to manage those lines, if there is no more traffic on them they will never pay the interest on their cost. The loss we are now sustaining on our railways is at the rate of £300,000 a year; for, although we talk of giving 4 per cent. on the £14,500,000, we lose in other ways  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. The returns from our railways last year were something under £300,000. Like the honourable member for Ponsonby, I do not say that they should pay full interest; but I think that with reasonable management they might be made to pay 3 per cent., and that would be a hundred thousand pounds a year more than they are returning at present. I do not wish to take up the time of the House, and I merely mention these matters to show that if the Minister for Public Works would take the matter in hand with a strong grasp he could see his way to alter the whole position without having recourse to this measure. I must say I am opposed to handing over property which has cost us £14,500,000 to persons whom we do not know, because I have seen so many things in the various colonies that I feel certain it will be impossible to get three or four or five men to manage the railways who will not in some way be under pressure, either from banks, or from loan companies, or political pressure at any rate, if they are not very different from any men I have met in New Zealand. I am not in favour of our railways being put under a Board: not that I have any particular reason for saying so, but that I am sure it will not be a better system. This I may say: that whenever anything new is proposed in New Zealand every one jumps at it, and, as this is a new proposal, every one seems inclined to jump at it. That there is no comparison between the geographical position of our railways and those of Victoria any one who considers the matter must see. We have not more than eighty miles of railway in any one place in a straight line, so that we are always loading and unloading; and we have so many interests that it is almost impossible for any man to grasp the management of the whole under a considerable time. We have had our own servants managing these railways since 1870, and surely they must know what ought to be done much better than strangers can, and for that reason I say we should not take this leap in the dark, for it is a leap in the dark when we hand over property which has cost us so much to strangers. If the scheme must be tried, try it first on a small scale in one part of the colony, and let us see then whether it will pay. It might very well be tried in the North Island, and then if any one can make the railways there pay 3 per cent. it will be time enough to go across the Strait. The trade of the country is not sufficient to make the railways pay unless you put on heavy rates, and then people do not travel as they used to do. You will see by the returns that the only railways that pay are two small coalfields lines and the Napier line. Then, there is a million and three quarters which has been expended on the Auckland line, on which we are losing some 3 per cent., which is some £600,000 a year; and then there is the Wanganui line. In fact, as nearly as I can see, the losses amount in the North Island to about £140,000, and in the South Island to £170,000 a year. I really think that if the matter were kept in hand by the Government themselves, and properly managed, it would be far better; and, although I may not vote against the second reading of the Bill, I hope that when it goes into Committee I shall be able to make some proposals which possibly may be put into practice.

Mr. M. J. S. MACKENZIE.—Sir, I almost entirely agree with the honourable gentleman who has just sat down, as I also do with the honourable member for Hawke's Bay, who spoke in somewhat the same strain. If this question were one of detail—some variation in the management of our railways—I might possibly support it; but I intend to oppose it on the second reading, because I believe that the principle on which the Bill is founded is an entirely erroneous one. What is wanted to make our railways profitable is not a change in management. I am one of those who, although they may be in a minority now, think that the railways in New Zealand are now, and have for some years past been, very well managed indeed; and the immunity from accident goes a long way to induce in me that belief. At the same time we are perfectly conscious that there is something wrong. The universal dissatisfaction expressed about our railways is but an admission of the fact; and the question is, What is it that is wrong? It is, perhaps, natural for us to blame the management, and to pour the vials of our wrath on the head of the General Manager; but any one who carefully studies the facts will come to the conclusion that it is something else—something quite different. Briefly stated it is this: that railway-construction in New Zealand has outrun the population. When my honourable friend the member for Hawke's Bay gave statistics and facts in support of that view he did not give all that might be adduced in support of it. First of all, let me say that, by a curious coincidence, we have about the same mileage here in New Zealand as they have in Victoria and New South Wales. We have 1,727 miles, and there are seventeen hundred odd miles in these other colonies. The Victorian railways pay  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., and the New South Wales railways pay  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., both colonies having double the population that we have; and ours pay £2 2s. per cent. That is to say, they have both over a million of inhabitants, whereas we have only a little over half a million; and our railways pay half, or a little over half, the interest that their railways do, which is exactly what might be expected with half the population. We have half the population, and half the profit on our railways; they have double the population in both instances, and almost double the profits we have. If these facts are not entirely conclusive, they go a long way towards proving that our railways have outgrown our population. It is alike natural and logical to suppose they have. A railway is exactly like any other trading concern. You may stock a shop to the very doors with the best possible kinds of goods, and have the best possible management, but if there are not the customers it is not possible for the shop to pay. It is the same with building in a town: it is a monstrous assumption that people would go on building for ever if there were not the population to occupy the houses put up. As soon as the thing ceased to pay they would stop building. So it is with New Zealand in the matter of our railways; and, regarding them as profitable concerns—for I am not now considering the making of railways for the indirect advantages arising from them—judging the matter only from the profit standpoint, the increase of population has not kept pace with our railway-construction, and therefore there cannot be a profit from the concern. There is some limit which checks private individuals and causes them to pull up when the paying point has been reached; but we in this colony have been building railways and disregarding the profit-and-loss question, because we have been drawing on a fund which does not depend upon the energies and self-denial of the people—the loan fund. The means of getting the money have been easy, we have got it, and we have spent it. We have gone on increasing our mileage of railways year after year, while the population has remained for several years almost stationary. If anything else was wanted to prove that statement correct, it is supplied in figures somewhat similar to those given by the honourable member for Hawke's Bay. The honourable gentleman did not go as far as he might have done in the matter; he gave the figures from 1885, but if you go a year or two further back you will find the facts are very remarkable, and well worthy the attention of the House. Here are a few figures showing the total mileage of the open lines in the colony during the past few years, and the net return per cent. on the capital cost:—

1882 .. ..	1819	3 7 3
1883 .. ..	1358	3 3 2
1884 .. ..	1396	2 9 11
1885 .. ..	1477	2 15 4
1887 .. ..	1727	2 2 2

That condition of affairs is not due to hard times. In 1881 the excess of revenue over working expenses was £814,497, and in 1877 it had gone down to £299,696: that is to say, we had constructed in the interval 450 miles of railway, in order to make a loss of £15,000. It is impossible to conceive that the hard times can account for anything of this sort. There can be no doubt whatever that, if we want to improve the condition of our railways and make them profitable, the only way is to cease railway-construction, or to construct at a very much lessened rate of speed, and allow the population to increase in the meantime; but to go on continuing expenditure on lines which, when constructed, can only lessen the profit from our railways is precisely the very thing which prevents our population from growing. Our indebtedness repels immigration. The honourable member for Selwyn gave us the results of some inquiries of his in Victoria, and, no doubt, they were very careful inquiries; but it was a rather cool assumption by the honourable gentleman, when speaking of the increased return from the Victorian railways, to ignore wholly the increase of population and trade in that prosperous colony, and to attribute all to the fact that a Board had been established to manage the railways. As a matter of fact they were paying interest on their cost before the Board was established.

Mr. M. J. S. MACKENZIE.—It is very easy to say "No." The habit of contradiction is so ingrained in some honourable members that they would, I believe, call out "No" if the question before the House were the salvation of their own souls. I know what I have said is the fact, for I have got the figures from the Victorian Blue Books, and I have seen the comments of the Victorian Press on them. If they did not then pay so well as now, they paid well enough to show that it is not the Board which has made the difference; but the fact is that the trade of Victoria, which is a prosperous colony, has enormously increased. When there has been a large increase of population and trade it is preposterous to say that all the increase of traffic has been due to the fact that the railways have been managed by a Board, or, rather, by the General Manager with a Board as an appendage. If I am right in these premisses, I think it would be a very great mistake to withdraw the management of a huge department which has cost some fourteen millions of capital from the control of the Government and the House, who ought to be responsible for its conduct, and hand it over to a Board. We have heard a great deal about political pressure, and I suppose there always will be political pressure. But it is a mistake to suppose that such pressure is always exerted in the wrong direction. I believe the political pressure exercised on successive Governments has, on the whole, done more good than harm; and the opinions of a large number of individuals, such as the members of this House, on railway-management ought not to be despised by any Government. I believe that political pressure to procure the construction of railways is very bad, because persons have a very direct interest in getting lines constructed in the wrong places. But political pressure by members of the House as to fares, freights, and other things concerning management, I believe myself has generally been exerted in the right direction. But if it be the case that, because a Government has had political pressure brought to bear upon it in the management of a huge department like this, the control of the department must be taken from it and put under a Board, it appears to me to be a most extraordinary commentary on our system of government. You have only to extend the argument to prove that the whole management of the country should be removed from the Government. I could understand a contention that, because a Government could not properly manage the Railway Department, or any other department, from inability to resist pressure, therefore they should be turned out; but I cannot see why it should be a reason for withdrawing that particular department from its control. Sir, I believe we are making a mistake in this Bill, and I intend to oppose it.

Mr. STUART-MENTEATH.—I regret that so pronounced a Free-trader as the honourable member for Mount Ida should on this occasion depart so widely from a principle which lies at the very root of Free-trade. Those who support this Bill—and I must say I am one of them—look forward to certain results from it. I agree very largely with the expressions of opinion that have fallen from the honourable member for Mount Ida where they relate to railway-construction in the past; and no doubt the reason why our railways generally do not yield a large return at the present time is that they have been pushed beyond the growth of our population—that is, no doubt, one of the main reasons why they do not pay. But the question of our railways paying the interest on their cost is not the only question involved in this Bill. I have heard very eloquent speeches and I have seen eloquent addresses in the public prints from the honourable member for Mount Ida in which he declaimed against the corrupting influence of a Government being engaged in any industrial enterprise. Now, by this Bill we aim at depriving the Government of the control of a very large industrial enterprise, which, in this country, must always be more or less associated with the commercial life and industrial life and the social well-being of the community. Why, throughout this country so large has grown the fungus growth of the public-works policy that the Government is looked upon as the cause of all good, and as able to do anything to make prosperity. Everybody in the country believes that if the Government only did its duty we ought one and all of us, from the working-man to the great landowner, to be rolling in riches; and, if it is not so, that there must be something wrong, that there must be a screw loose in the administration of our public affairs. We have come in this country to mix up the cause of material prosperity with the Government, whose functions ought to be distinctly divorced from any questions involving pounds, shillings, and pence. Now, our railway system, extending throughout the country, with its host of Civil servants, is simply one of those means through which our Government is doing that which is destructive of individual independence among our New Zealand colonists; and, in removing from the Government the management of that great institution, the Railway Department, we are really laying the axe at the root of a tree which, like the upas-tree, has been poisoning the atmosphere of New Zealand for years past. Even if the establishment of a Board—which I admit is an experiment—does not increase the net returns from our railways, if it does what we hope it will in other respects, it will deserve well of the country—that is, if it merely lessens the false prestige of the Government in the eyes of the people of New Zealand. Now, a great deal has been said in this debate about the railway employés; and I believe, from my own personal knowledge and from the opportunities I have had of studying the question, that a more deserving body of men, individually and collectively, than they are, it would be hard get. But why should the railway employés exert himself? What heart has he in his exertions? Let us imagine a railway employé who is really doing his utmost to bring credit on the department, and who takes a personal interest in the prosperity and well-being of the railway service in New Zealand. What shocks has he not to encounter! Let us suppose he is connected with the buying department. What does he find? A certain number of new locomotives are required, and, because of the pressure of some large commercial firm which exercises an influence on the Government through members of this House, the country, instead of getting its engines for £1,000 each, has to give £1,400 or £1,500 for them, and then they will not be so well put together, and may endanger the lives of passengers put behind them. Now, that is no exaggeration. We are now, under the influence of a paternal Government, paying £140 for every hundred pounds' worth of locomotive material put on the railways. That is one instance of bad administration of a great industrial enterprise by the Government. What would that mean on the purchase of a hundred thousand pounds' worth of material? It would mean that the country would have to pay £140,000. Would any railway officer, if he were manager of a private business of his own, act in that extraordinary way? Can we expect the railway employés to have any heart in their business if they are fettered with conditions like this? Then, again, let us suppose that sleepers are required for a line—even such a trifling matter as sleepers—or that some timber is required for a bridge. The railway employé who has the matter in hand knows well that a certain kind of timber is the best timber for the purpose—that it will last ten, or fifteen, or twenty years without rotting. He wants to buy it; but what happens? The member for the district makes a frantic appeal, and tells the Minister, "Here is Mr. So-and-so, the Government Engineer, actually going to bring timber down from Auckland to build a bridge in my district, instead of using local timber; and the local timber is as good as any grown in Auckland." What is the consequence? The department has to buy the local timber at a fabulous price, perhaps from some supporter of the member for the district. The timber rots in five years, whereas the Auckland timber would have lasted fifteen years. That is what goes on constantly. I do not want to weary the House by giving more examples. Instances of the kind can be given by every member of the House; and yet honourable members get up and say that political management is possible, and that the railways can be well managed on this system. Why, one of the very first principles of government is that we should divorce as widely as possible all industrial action from political influence, for we know that men guided by political influence will only meddle to muddle as soon as they import their political influence into a department of industrial enterprise. Fault has been found with this Bill because, as we are told, it is incompatible with the different conditions under which different districts have been settled. Why, Sir, the first thing we have to do, if we want to make this country a prosperous and well-governed country, is that, as representatives and as electors, we should put our foot down upon these local jealousies. If we could stamp out these local jealousies, keep them under for three years, we should have no need for retrenchment, no need for any of these other measures which are now necessary to be proceeded with to bring the expenditure within the revenue. I am quite sure that these local jealousies cost the country fully the whole of last year's deficit, and more. Had it not been for these petty miserable local jealousies we should long ago have taken a far higher position in the race for progress in Australasia; and I dare say that they will continue to clog our progress for some years to come. If this Bill is passed, and this Board is brought into existence, and the Commissioners do their duty in paying no attention to the demands of localities, we may hope for better things. No doubt localities will at first kick and plunge and roar, but if the Commissioners will do their duty and conduct the Railway Department without regard to this miserable spirit, they will soon find themselves supported by a united public opinion. The localities in New Zealand have been like spoiled children. They have been accustomed to get every thing they cry for. They have got what they wanted, no matter how ruinous their demands have been to the Government, or what strain was put upon the resources of the country. The Government cannot resist them. There are exceptional circumstances in the history of every Government which make it impossible for the Government to stand up against the improper demands made by districts represented by some of the members of this House. With a Railway Board we may hope for a check upon this sort of thing. We may hope that the members of this Board, when these demands are made upon them, will say, in spite of all influence, "We are here for five years, and can only be removed for misconduct; whatever may be the popular pressure upon us, we are conscious that we are doing right in insisting upon these reforms; we know better than those who are pressing us to accede to their selfishness; and we know that in a few years public opinion will support us: and we will do our duty." If the Railway Board takes up that position, then we shall have a new policy inaugurated, and may hope that our railways will ultimately become a source of pride to us, and also a source of pecuniary assistance to the colony's finances. That is what I hope for from this Bill. Then, we heard from the honourable member for Christchurch North of an idea which I had really hoped was worn out. We have had it declared again that when the railway policy was started a pledge was given to continue the railways. What pledge? A pledge of ruin? No. That pledge was given on the faith of the success of the railways. I have looked into that matter carefully, and I find the position to be this: It was proposed to construct railways, trunk railways, and we were told that these railways would yield certain results; and we said, "If these anticipations are fulfilled we will make railways all over the colony. If our railway policy is a success we will extend it." The meaning of that declaration is clear enough—everything depended on the result of the experiment. Did the people of New Zealand understand that the inauguration of that policy meant that they were setting a ball rolling down a steep hill at the bottom of which is a precipice; or is it to be said that when they find that out they are not to make an effort to stay the result of their action?—because that is the meaning of what the honourable gentleman says. We find that our borrowing policy is landing us in disaster, that year after year we are growing poorer, that the anticipations are not being fulfilled, that it is benefiting the few and cursing the many; and are we to be told that, because certain mountainous regions are still left without railways, we must go on building railways to keep a pledge the conditions of which have not been fulfilled, and to keep which we must ruin ourselves? Let us wait until New Zealand is peopled and prosperous, and then we may attempt to keep the pledge. What is the pledge? That we should make trunk railways throughout the colony? Sir, if we had made no main trunk railways, but had confined our attention to short lengths, we should have been better off. What does the result show? That the only lines which are paying are the short lines, or those portions of the main lines which penetrate the interior of the country, and enable the producers of the country to find a channel for the export of their produce through the harbours. Look at the geographical formation of the country: a long narrow strip of country with a long seaboard, the interior beyond a certain point being nearly all mountainous. Can any one who takes a glance at the map say that it is advisable to make railways from one end to the other of a country with a configuration such as this country has? One glance at the map will, I think, show that it is stupendous folly to make railways up and down this colony to compete with water-carriage, for the conduct of which there are numerous harbours—some of them magnificent harbours—between which we have trading some of the finest shipping lines, considering the age of the country, that the world has seen. Sir, I support this Bill, not because I feel confident that the Bill will at once effect what those who still have some enthusiasm left in them believe it will effect, not because I think it will make railways pay which never can pay—railways simply made to gratify political demands—but because I hope it will have a very large influence in purifying the atmosphere of this House, the atmosphere of our political life, in purifying the electors' aims throughout the colony, and because I think it will, at any rate in a measure, improve the returns now received from our railways. For these reasons I support the Bill. It will give a fair trial to an experiment which, both on account of the reasons that exist for the trial and on account of a similar experiment having answered, at any rate to some extent, in other colonies, we may hope will succeed. And we are certain of this: that, whether it succeed or not, our railway-management cannot possibly be worse than it is at present.

Mr. BRUCE.—Sir, in considering the measure now before the House, we have, in the first place, I think, to determine whether to affirm or reject the principle of placing the management of our railways in the hands of non-political Boards. The Bill before us is a mere machinery Bill—it is merely a Bill to give effect to that principle; and I think I may be permitted to say that it speaks well for this measure when we find that such a high authority as the late Minister for Public Works found in it scarcely any material for adverse criticism. Now, I may commence by saying that the whole question is to me one of surpassing difficulty. There can be no doubt that, rightly or wrongly, the management of our railways has met with universal dissatisfaction. In fact, I may almost say it has met with universal condemnation. That much of this dissatisfaction is of a most unreasonable character is highly probable; but, making all allowances, I believe that there is good ground for the belief that the management of the railways has not been in the best interests of the shareholders, who are the general public. We find in the Financial Statement the assertion that the system rather than the management is at fault; and, while I think that the latter has been of a somewhat imperfect character, still I think the statement is substantially correct. I have already said that to me the question is one of surpassing difficulty. In point of fact, this is a problem that can only be solved approximately, because we are dealing with unknown quantities. I intend to support the measure, and for various reasons. In the first place—I am afraid I shall be repeating what other speakers have said—I think it goes without saying that we may anticipate that our railways will be more economically administered. Government administration is, as a rule, expensive administration; and it is also, I may add, inefficient administration when carried on under high political pressure. This has been called an experiment, and no doubt it is such; but I shall hail with delight any mode by which political influence may be withdrawn from the management of our railways, and I believe that if they are to be efficiently and economically managed it is absolutely necessary that an independent authority—and when I say an independent authority, I mean one quite outside political pressure—shall have the control and regulation of all details, of all classes of railway employes, and full power to manage the railways on sound commercial principles. Sir, it has been said, during the course of the debate, that it will be impossible to institute a Board, or manage our railways, without being subject to political pressure. Well, I hope, at any rate, this experiment will prove successful in relieving us from that pressure. So long as any man whose services the department may think fit to dispense with can bring political influence to bear upon the floor of this House, or so long as that influence can be brought to bear in reference to the retention of those whose services are either inefficient or perhaps superfluous, so long will the railways be inefficiently managed. I think that goes without saying, and it furnishes one of the strongest arguments for the institution of non-political Boards of management. Now, it has been alleged, during the course of the debate, that the railway-management of Victoria is a success, whilst others have denied it. Some believe it a success, others believe it is a failure. I believe the balance of evidence is entirely in its favour. I have not heard outside or read anything on the subject myself, but have listened very attentively to the other speakers during the debate. Now, it has been urged, during the course of this debate, as an argument against the introduction of these Boards, that there has been a very serious railway accident lately in Victoria. These railway accidents, as a matter of fact, take place on the best managed and regulated railways in the world. It is no argument at all; and so long as men are liable to errors of judgment, so long as they can be guilty of carelessness or negligence, so long as they can be incompetent from any cause whatever, so long will these accidents take place on railways. But, Sir, I think that to cite as an argument against the institution of these Boards an accident of this kind having taken place in Victoria is just about as absurd as to condemn a system of machinery because there is a wheel in it in which a cog happens to give way. Now, I wish, in the remarks that I am about to make, to avoid repetition. It has been assumed by many speakers that I have listened to in this House that our railways do not pay because they do not yield interest upon the cost of construction. I am inclined to believe that, directly and indirectly, our railways are paying now, and that they will pay very much better as years roll on, and as settlement continues to advance. I may ask this question: What is a railway? It is a means to an end, just as a metalled road is. In the one case we run our vehicles individually over the road with horses, in the other case we draw our wagons co-operatively with steam. That is the difference. Now, allowing, for argument's sake, that we have spent in the colony three millions sterling on roads and tracks—I believe we have spent a good deal more; but we will put it at that—will any one contend that because these roads do not yield interest directly, while they cost annually large sums for maintenance and repair, they do not pay? Unquestionably they do pay; and if the argument is sound in one case, what is the difference when applied in the other? I venture to say that the railways have not been managed in the best interests of the shareholders, who are the general public, and I will endeavour to prove it by two or three hypothetical illustrations, which I believe have their counterpart in fact. I will take the case of five men who, for argument's sake, we will say leave Christchurch to obtain employment a hundred miles southward. We will say that it cost them, taking into account the value of their time, £10 to reach their destination—that is to say, if they have to walk. At the same time here is a railway—and, recollect, these men are shareholders in the line—here is a railway running almost parallel with the road, on which carriages are run, perhaps empty, or nearly empty, and it might not take, as an actual matter of fact, sixpenceworth of steam, perhaps not a shilling's worth of steam, to draw those five men the hundred miles, while if they were given the ride for nothing they would be, so to speak, £8 richer. We may take this as an argument in favour of what was advanced by the honourable member for Waikato, that the second-rate fares should be materially reduced. I will take another case in regard to goods: the last applied to passengers. We will suppose, for the sake of argument, that in a county in this colony there is such a state of things that there are no metalled roads in existence. And we will further allow that the inhabitants of this county borrow money to make metalled roads, the traffic in the first place being done by means of pack-horses over muddy tracks. Now, when the metalled roads are made, what would be the wisdom, or, rather, the unwisdom, of the local authorities—that is to say, the parliament of the county—if they placed such tolls on these roads as to necessitate the shareholders, the inhabitants of the county, who originally borrowed the money to make the metalled roads, reverting to the original practice of carrying their products on the backs of horses, over tracks parallel to the roads! That is practically what is taking place to-day in respect to a number of our railway lines, and therefore I say that, presumably, they are not managed in the interests of the shareholders, the public. I will take another case which actually occurred. In the Manawatu District there is a very enterprising firm of saw-millers, who, had they been able to obtain a small concession in the way of rates, would have been able to contract for the supply of a million feet of white-pine timber for the Melbourne Exhibition, but, owing to their inability to get the concession,

they were unable to contract for the supply of the timber. Now, I put it to the House, would it not, in this case, have paid the colony, I will not say merely to have run it at cost price, but to have run it, perhaps, at a trifling loss? I say, most certainly it would. That is another instance which I have adduced of the present vicious system of the management of our railways, which were put up, in the first place, for the convenience of the public. Of course this line of argument of mine leads in the direction of throwing the railways open to the public absolutely; and I believe that is theoretically the solution of the problem. There is no doubt about it that the day will come—it may not be in our time, but the day will come—when the railways of this colony will be thrown open to the public just as the metalled roads are. There is this distinction which honourable members must bear in mind between our railways and those of either Great Britain or America: that here our railways should be run in the interests of the public, who are the shareholders; in the other case they are run in the interests of the few. Now, I may remark that there was a very suggestive return laid on the table of the House the other day, showing the results of a low-tariff period and of a high-tariff period on the railway line between Lyttelton and Christchurch. It is shown in that return that during the low-tariff period a very large number of passengers, greater than that of the high-tariff period, were carried—I think a hundred thousand at least, if I recollect rightly—and at the same time the revenue obtained was greater. I say that is a very suggestive return. It has been advanced by a number of people in this colony that we should either sell or lease the railways. I am very strongly opposed to either proposal. In the first place let me ask this question: Who could determine, even approximately, the value of the railways? To enable us to estimate the value of the railways I may say we should require to know who would occupy those Government benches for the next twenty years,—whether they would be Governments which would give confidence and draw the right class of immigrants to the country, and advance settlement along these lines. We should also require to know the values of produce for that period, which would be a determining factor in the settlement of the country along these lines. Some honourable gentlemen, in the manner that the honourable member for Mount Ida has, I think, rightly put as jumping to a conclusion, have estimated the value of the railways at fifteen millions. I think that must be only jumping to a conclusion; but if they are good for that for a company they are equally good for us, and, I might say, a great deal more so. I am very strongly opposed to selling what have in reality a very great prospective value, and because also, as I have already said, I believe the time will come when the unborn millions will ride triumphantly on these railways; and I believe that when that time does come it will add in an incalculable degree to the comfort and prosperity, and, I would even add, to the happiness of the people of this colony. I know ideas of this kind are looked upon as revolutionary, but perhaps I, like the honourable member for Mount Ida, live fifty years in advance of my time in that respect. I suppose honourable members will recognise that in my remarks to-night I have not dealt with the scheme before us, and I have not done so because I find that my ideas have been given utterance to already. Nearly all the remarks I have made have gone rather in the direction of a diagnosis of the disease than in the direction of pointing out a remedy. Now, I may say in regard to the Bill itself that there is one very great omission from it, in my opinion, and that is that no guidance or direction is given to these Commissioners as to what principles they are to work the lines upon. In that matter, I say that the Government have not risen to the occasion, because this is the most difficult portion of the problem. I am not going to enter into an analysis of the question, but I believe, in the first place, that we should endeavour to run the railways on commercial principles, giving the Commissioners direction—if such a thing is possible—to keep in view the encouragement of our industries, in which, of course, settlement is included. There is one clause, and one clause only, that I thought of criticizing, but I have heard another honourable member allude to it, and any amendments I shall propose I shall propose in Committee, if this Bill arrive at that stage, as I suppose it will. I may say that I have very great pleasure in supporting it—although it is an experiment—because I think that a great deal of the dissatisfaction that has been expressed has arisen on account of bad management of our railways. And I think, looking to the way in which the Bill is drafted—provision being made for every contingency—that it reflects very great credit on the Minister for Public Works, and I shall support it with my whole heart.

Mr. FERGUS.—Mr. Speaker, I have been somewhat amused at the very authoritative manner in which some honourable members who have preceded me have spoken in antagonism to this measure, and especially was I amused with the amount of assurance that characterized the utterance of the honourable member for Mount Ida. Sir, he spoke in a somewhat similar strain to that of the honourable member for Ponsonby when he said that we required proof that the Victorian Bill had been a success, as that had not been clearly demonstrated to the House.

Mr. M. J. S. MACKENZIE.—Hear, hear.

Mr. FERGUS.—The honourable member for Mount Ida says, "Hear, hear." I hold in my hand the last report of the Victorian Commissioners, and it gives a tabulated statement of the cost and the receipts per train-mile for the last sixteen years. I shall quote the whole table, to show more clearly what the earnings of the Victorian railways have been since 1871-72 to 1885-86:—

‡ The Hobson's

You will thus see that, while the earnings per train-mile have fallen very considerably, the percentage on capital employed has gone up wonderfully, and this, too, in the teeth of cheaper rates charged by the Railway Board. Any one acquainted with the Colony of Victoria, with the public men of Victoria, with the working of the Victorian railways, as I happen to be, and very familiarly too, must know that there is but one opinion in the whole colony in favour of the system as it at present exists, and the working of the Railway Board as at present constituted. And so patent has that been to the rest of the colonies that the Government of New South Wales framed a measure almost entirely on the Victorian lines for the working of their railways. The South Australian Government framed a measure likewise on those lines. And it is an undoubted fact that the people of the several Australian Colonies recognise that the Victorian system is worked now to a very considerable extent, but not entirely, as I should like to see it, free from political control, and that it has been a very great improvement on the condition of things which formerly obtained in that colony. If the honourable member for Mount Ida had been present when the late Minister for Public Works was addressing this House, he would have found that that honourable gentleman admitted exactly the contention I hold. He was of opinion that the reason why the administration of the Victorian railways had deteriorated, and why the appointment of a non-political Board was absolutely necessary, was on account of the fact that political corruption existed to so large an extent as to render it altogether impossible to administer the railways economically. Year by year the pressure from the various constituencies was getting greater and greater,—just the same as it is in this House at the present time. What has occurred here since we have been in session? Three hundred and fifty-five questions have been asked in this House; and, out of these, no fewer than sixty of them appertained to railway matters, from the employment of a boy at 4s. 6d. a day on the Waimea Plains Railway to the entire revision of the railway tariff.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Why should it not be?

Mr. FERGUS.—There is every reason why it should not be so. It is impossible for the Government or the managers of the railways in this colony to discharge a drunken or incapable workman without his finding some honourable member in this House to assert his claim, move the adjournment of the House, and bring the matter up as one of colonial importance. It is degrading to this House that it should be occupied with such matters. There ought to be some other tribunal to which they could appeal. I always acknowledge the right of the meanest citizen to have recourse to the highest tribunal in the land—that is, the Parliament of New Zealand; but I say it is not right that every petty little detail, such as is too often dragged up here by some honourable members in order to please some of their constituents, should be brought continually before the members of this House. I say that during the six or seven years I have been in the House this thing is growing, and has grown now almost past endurance; and, if it is to continue, instead of being in session two or three months we shall be sitting here for the whole of the year discussing petty details which, if we were in command of extensive businesses, we should leave to the control of our foremen or managers. It is beneath the dignity of the House to do such a thing, and leads to political corruption, and is not in the best interests of the men themselves; and I speak from extensive knowledge of the workmen employed on the railways. I think I have disposed of the argument of the honourable member for Ponsonby. The honourable member for Christchurch North said we were putting the construction and reconstruction of these lines into the hands of this Board. Yes, Sir, we are doing so, and justly and wisely too, and not before it is time. What has obtained in the past? What has been the condition of things? We have got two departments doing virtually one and the same work. The Public Works Department is the one which this House authorises to construct the lines, to get out the details and specifications; and contracts are let by the Minister for Public Works. The contractor fulfils his part of the work by completing his contract; but how often does it occur that when the lines are completed they are found to be utterly insufficient, or not according to the wishes of the Working Department, and that a great deal of the work has to be reconstructed! We have two separate and distinct engineering staffs in the employment of the country. Is this as it ought to be? If we do amalgamate the two staffs, and have one staff of engineers who would lay down railways, make such curves and gradients as they think best, provide such platforms as they consider necessary, and afford such accommodation as the public require, there will be no necessity for another department to go in and re-do that which has been done in the first place, as under our present system. I could give the House some personal experience in this matter. I say that if you had one instead of two departments you would considerably reduce the cost that exists at the present time. I do not wish to say anything in disparagement of the men who are in charge of our railways; and the honourable member for Kaiapoi paid a just and well-merited tribute, I think, to the integrity, honesty, and capacity of the men who have been working our railways in the past. He said that, if they could be only more untrammelled than they are now, and less under political control, they would be able to work the railways to very much greater advantage: and so they would. This measure is to free the men from many of their trammels. At present they have ninety-five masters in this House, and, if we could give them three masters instead of the great number they now have, there is not an intelligent workman who is worth his salt who would not hail with joy the appointment of such a Board, as it would be to his best interests and to the ultimate gain of the colony. We cannot get away from the fact, try to blind ourselves to it as we may, that there is a very large measure of dissatisfaction in the colony as to the way in which our railways are worked, and very justly so; and I tell this House that that dissatisfaction is not on account of the management, but is owing to the many barriers which this House places in the way of the efficient management of the railways. What are we to say of the Minister for Public Works at the present time! He is now in office, but his term of office will expire sooner or later, and he must give way to some other man, who is selected not on account of his capacity, or his knowledge of the working of railways or their construction, but on account of the exigencies of the political situation; and then this man will come in with new ideas, and may overturn and render nugatory any reforms which a just and wise Minister may wish to effect. I say it is utterly impossible for any body constituted as we are to manage our railways to the benefit of the country, efficiently and well; and we must entirely sever them from political control, and give men a certain term of office to effect the necessary reforms. To do that, our railways must be removed entirely from the political demagogues who are continually interfering with the details of their management. The honourable member for Rangitikei has asked, What should our railways do? There are two classes in this House, one of which thinks that the railways ought to be made to pay interest on the cost of their construction, and the other party thinks they should be run for the benefit of the settlers, without regard to their paying. I hold that it is the duty of the State to try to attain both of these things. In the first place we should endeavour to work the railways in such a manner that they shall return as much as possible in the way of interest; and in the second place we should afford facilities to settlers in far-outlying districts to get their produce to market so cheaply that they will be able to live on their farm sections: and I believe that by putting the railways under the management of such a Board as we here propose you will get the maximum amount of profit to the colony and the minimum of cost. I never saw, nor is it recorded in history, that in any country politically-managed railways are a success. I do not wish to say for a single moment that the measure introduced by the Government is absolutely perfect, and we are willing to amend it in such a way that it shall be of the greatest benefit to the country. I am pleased, indeed, to hear the remarks of such men as the late Minister for Public Works. I have not yet heard a single argument against making it law. We know the colony is looking for it, and I know that it has been a success in other colonies, and that the management can be much more efficient than it is under the present system if you take away political control, and enable men to work in the best interest of the railways of the State and of the employes on the various lines. I trust, indeed, I have no doubt, the House will agree to the second reading of this measure.

Mr. LEVESTAM.—Sir, although I disagree with much that is in this Bill, I shall vote for the second reading. It is not my intention to go through the Bill or offer any lengthened remarks, because all that can be said has already been said by one speaker or another. My object in rising is to express surprise at some of the remarks made by the honourable member for Te Aro with regard to the locomotives which are being manufactured in the colony. He made some statements which were so gross as almost to amount to libel. He said they cost 40 per cent. more than they could be imported for from Home. The fact is that, when they were contracted for, the price in excess of what they could be imported for was 27 per cent. Since then the price of material has fallen very much.

Mr. STUART-MENTEATH.—The late Minister for Public Works said they cost 27 per cent. more than they could be imported for from Victoria or New South Wales, not from America or Great Britain.

Mr. LEVESTAM.—If the honourable gentleman will look at the report of the answer which the late Minister for Public Works gave to a question put to him in this House, he will see that that honourable gentleman stated most distinctly that they cost 27 per cent. more than they could be landed for from England. I have asked the late Minister for Public Works since the honourable member for Te Aro made the statement, and he corroborates what I say. Then he went on to say that the workmanship of those locomotives was so bad that it was dangerous for people to sit behind them, and their lives were risked; but I should like to tell the honourable member that Mr. Robert Wilson, who is the engineer in England to inspect the material sent out to the Government here, chancing to be in New Zealand through his connection with the Midland Railway, said that the work done here is quite as good as, if not better than, that done in England. As for the danger of sitting behind them, I may tell the honourable gentleman that none of these engines have been placed on the line yet, and no engine is to be taken over by the Government until it has run 1,000 miles; so that the statement of the honourable gentleman is incorrect in every part.

Mr. STUART-MENTEATH.—They were tried, and broke down.

Mr. LEVESTAM.—They have never been out of the shops yet, because they have not been finished. There is no doubt that the work is being excellently done. In what the honourable gentleman said with regard to the timber used, owing to political pressure, in the construction of some bridges, I presume he was referring to bridges between Wanganui and New Plymouth. But that occurred many years ago: the bridges have been rebuilt and are as good as ever; so that argument falls to the ground. I should also like to reply to the remarks of the honourable member for Auckland North with regard to Mr. Vaile's system of railway management, and his hope that a clause would be inserted in the Bill compelling the Commissioners to give that scheme a trial. I have taken the trouble to read the whole of the evidence taken by the Select Committee which sat in 1886; and to any one who has read that evidence it must be quite plain that the scheme is futile. Mr. Vaile had no evidence to offer, and merely stated that he believed such-and-such would be the case; while it is shown conclusively by the evidence of experts that the scheme is a very bad one. The honourable gentleman tells us that petitions signed by twenty thousand people have been forwarded to Parliament in favour of this scheme. To any one who has been a member of Parliament for some years, it must be patent that in Auckland they are very good at getting up petitions. The Auckland people actually got up a petition to save the murderer Caffrey from the gallows. Surely, if people can do that, they can get up a petition on almost any subject. We are also told that at the late election Mr. Vaile's scheme received a great deal of support. I say the people of Auckland are very easily led. A number of people who know nothing whatever about a matter are always ready to take up almost everything they are told. We have had cases where a man was elected simply because he had a grievance, and he happened to be in gaol at the time. A great deal has been said, notably by the Minister of Justice, as to why we want this Board, and one reason was that if any one has a grievance he goes to his member, who brings up the question in the House, and that thus a great deal of time is wasted. I admit that that is the case; but that is chiefly because our whole system is bad, and not because the management is bad. If we had Boards to investigate grievances there would be an end of it. There are no such Boards, and inquiries conducted by the department have often been of such a character that it was quite right the cases should be brought before this House. A few years ago I had a petition myself which I brought before the House, and I may say I was very successful with it. This was a case where an employé at Taranaki had been disrated, and the authorities had refused to give him a character, and treated him very badly indeed. It was admitted by the General Manager, Mr. Maxwell, that the man was entitled to a good character, and that he had been dealt with very badly. Some of the officers of the department investigated his case at New Plymouth. The man was not asked to be present, nor was he given an opportunity of bringing forward any evidence: in fact, he was condemned unheard. Surely we do not want a Board of that kind to deal with cases in that way. I shall not oppose the second reading of the Bill, because there appears a general desire throughout the country that there should be some change. When the Bill goes into Committee, there are several clauses which I shall try to get amended.

Mr. KERR.—I feel that this Bill is a big leap in the dark. I shall vote for it because I think any system would be better than the one we have got, for it is made of red-tape. I feel satisfied the present system lies with the Minister for Public Works. If we gave our present Railway Managers a little more latitude than they have got they would make the railways pay very well. Their hands are tied down now in such a manner that they can do nothing to help the railway at all. A tariff is sent to them and they must adhere to it. If a man comes to them with a hundred tons of stuff and offers to send it at £1 a ton, and the tariff says it must be £1 0s. 1d., the Manager is bound to refuse the stuff. Although I shall vote for the second reading of the Bill, I am satisfied it would be much better if the Minister for Public Works would give the Railway Managers a little latitude. If this were done the Managers would make money with the railways. If the Minister said to them, "We want you to make the railways pay 2 or 2½ per cent.," I am sure we have the men in New Zealand who are capable of doing that. It seems to me that it is the opinion of this House that there are no men in New Zealand capable of doing anything, and that we must import men. If you import men at big salaries you will find they are unused to the kind of work they will have to do here. The managers of the railways at Home have not got to consider the red-tape system at all. They have to run against other companies, and, in order to be successful men, they have to run out the other companies, whether they make money or not. Here there is no opposition; we have the railways in our own hands. As it is the wish of the House that the proposed system should be tried, I am willing to support the Bill, but I am satisfied that it is a mistake.

Mr. TAYLOR.—I do not intend to oppose the second reading of the Bill, because I think we can put it in a better shape in Committee. The Minister of Justice referred to the necessity for these Boards in consequence of the political influence of members of this House who represent constituencies in which there are a few railway employes. I contend that, if the railway employes had a Board to which they could apply and get their grievances rectified, there would be no complaints. I hope a clause will be inserted in Committee, making provision for that. I have personal knowledge as to men who have been very unfairly treated. Numbers of men have spoken to me about their grievances when they have been discharged, and I have simply told them that I could do nothing in the matter. I said, "I cannot use my influence, because if I do, and you are taken into the service again, it will not be long before they will find fault with you again, and you will have to go." The General Manager, where he found that these men had been wronged, has had them taken back again. I give him credit for that. I say that every man, however humble his position, has a right to have his grievance ventilated. I am sure the Minister for Public Works will admit that there is no method by which these men can get their grievances honestly considered. If they are discharged, and the matter is referred back to the men who discharged them, the report received is not of a favourable character—it is generally of a prejudicial character—and it is only when these men get to the head of the department, to an officer like Mr. Maxwell, that they can get fair-play. I want to see something in this Bill to meet that phase of the question.

Mr. DUNCAN.—I think the line taken up by the honourable member for Mount Ida is not very far from the mark. If you intend the railways to pay, there is no need to appoint a Board to raise the rates and to work them on a different style from the present. What you want to do is to settle the land through which the railways already run. On one line running through the best land in the colony you will sometimes go ten or twelve miles and see nothing but sheep. There ought to be a large population settled there. The best-paying line in the colony was the Duntroon line before it was interfered with. It was a light line, built by the Provincial Government, and would have paid well for many years to come if it had been left as it was. I suppose the intention was to make it uniform with other lines. The railways we have already would pay if we had a population there. The population being such as I speak of, that would mean bringing the land into cultivation; it would increase the traffic, and it would mean work for the unemployed. The express-train from Dunedin to Christchurch is run simply to please a few merchants and their travellers. If you sit in that train, as I do sometimes, you will hear people grumbling at the train stopping so often. You will find that these men have season-tickets, and they would like to run through in half an hour. It would be necessary to get some system of balloon-travelling to please these people. If the expense is not too large, I should like to see a return showing how this express between Invercargill and Christchurch pays. In my opinion it does not pay at all. If it pays, certainly the slower trains must be paying handsomely. I do not think there is an average of more than five through passengers by this train. I see by the nod of the Minister for Public Works that he agrees with me. If it is our intention to make the railways pay, then we should devise some means of settling the land. If the land is settled, then not only will the railways pay, but the Customs revenue will be raised at the same time, and things will become prosperous. It would also do away with the "unemployed" cry. Raising the fares will not make the railways pay. Even relaxing the rules to enable concessions to be made in favour of large consignments will make very little difference. Even the last portion of the line completed in my district will not pay, in my opinion, unless something is done in the way of settling people on the land there. A few bales of wool or a few truck-loads of wool in a year will not make a line pay. If the Government are to make the railways pay, it will have to be done in the way I have indicated. I do not believe in this Bill, and I may as well say so. I believe the Government can conduct the railways as well as any Board, and perhaps better. I may just say a word or two on the direction in which I think the railways could be worked to pay. No discretion is now left with the local Station-master at all. He cannot put on an extra train on any special occasion, for fear that it may not pay. Though the circumstances are such that he knows it is pretty sure to pay very well, he must not risk it, because he knows that, if it happened to bring a few shillings less than what will pay, the department would not like it, and consequently would grumble. On the other hand, if a train has been advertised to run specially it is run even if there is no traffic for it. If the local Stationmaster were given a little latitude, and allowed to use his own judgment and local knowledge, he would make his part of the line pay a great deal better than it does now, and the total number of such cases would make a very great difference in the total result. I know very well that in my district there might often be a special train run from Oamaru to various places, and it would pay handsomely; but, for fear of getting into disfavour if one time the train happened to not return quite its cost, the Stationmaster will not risk it. His instructions are to get a guarantee if he can, and unless he can get that he will not take the risk. I have known, myself, cases in which very large extra returns might have been earned if the Stationmasters were allowed a little discretion; but they are not allowed to take any risk in case the return should be a shilling or two below the cost, though the average would a good deal more than make up for it. I have had talks with Stationmasters, and I have asked them their opinions, and they are all of opinion that the General Manager should allow just a little reasonable latitude, and then they could work the lines a great deal better than they do now. Another thing that should be done is this: Those working the railways should be like other carriers: instead of waiting to have everything brought to them to be carried, they should, like other carriers, look up work. Now, there is one line in my district that would pay well during the summer months if it were properly worked. There is a gravel-pit where the line runs, with about 45ft. in the face; and a demand could be got for that gravel for forty miles along the line—because this is a sort of gravel that is suitable for walks, as it is fine, clean, and white—if it could be carried cheaply and conveniently. The way would be to make arrangements to take so many trucks at a time; but on this line trucks can often be seen lying for two or three weeks doing nothing. At the slack time of the year they might just as well be running if any traffic could be found for them, and I am sure it could be in the way I say. The men should be got to look after the traffic, and in this way, I believe, the lines would be made to pay handsomely—at any rate, I think they would pay 1 per cent. more than they are paying now; and I think they would be paying exceedingly well if they did that. If our railways returned 3 or 3½ per cent., surely we could consider them to be paying handsomely; for, if we take into consideration the cost that would be entailed in making and maintaining roads if all the traffic were done by road, we shall find that what is saved there far more than makes up any small difference between the net returns of the railways and the interest on the cost of construction. Now, I think, instead of trying to shift the responsibility for the management of the railways on to a Board, the Government should themselves try, as an experiment for a short time, a better way of working in the directions I and other honourable members have suggested. Instead of sitting in his office here writing and receiving letters, the Minister should leave that to the General Manager, and should go about and see for himself how the lines are worked, and talk with the Stationmasters; and I am sure he would, if he went into the thing thoroughly, see that the best policy would be to give them a little latitude, and expect them to use their own judgment and discretion a good deal more than they do now. He might give them twelve months to work in that way, and let them understand that if the results were not satisfactory they might look for their dismissal at the end of that time. Let them be told plainly what was expected of them, and see that they do it. If you get a Board you will not find that questions of railway management will cease to come up and give work and trouble to this House. There will be complaints against the Board, and pressure will be brought on the House to abolish it before it has got a fair start. Let the Board do what it will, the chances are that it would make some mistakes before it got a fair start; and these very mistakes would get up a cry against it, and a demand to do away with the Board. I am convinced there would be the same results as with the Government Insurance Board, and I know I should not like to be one of those having seats at the Board, even if it were for five years. Now, I am sure the railways could be managed under the Government so as to pay much better than they do now. I do not know if it is known to the Minister that a rule is in force forbidding the employes on the railway, if they have anything to complain of, from bringing it before a member of this House. I do not think it is creditable to whoever issued that rule, because if the member for the district is a reasonable man—and if he is not he has no business to be here—he would be the most suitable man to hear any complaints there might be, and the one best fitted in helping to put things right. I certainly think that rule ought to be done away with. I do not believe in the Bill, because I think we could do better without it. I have nothing to say against the Bill as a Bill of its kind; but it is my opinion that the Government could manage the lines better than the proposed Board could manage them, and therefore I must oppose the Bill.

Mr. JONES. — Generally in the speeches which have been made in this debate honourable members have shown that they knew very well what they were speaking about; but I wish to call attention to one statement made by the honourable member for Te Aro, in which the honourable gentleman certainly was not accurate: indeed, he was so inaccurate that I feel bound to call attention to it. He said that the colonial-made locomotives are so badly constructed that they endanger the lives of those riding behind them. Now, the fact is that not a single colonial-made locomotive has yet been run on a line. I happen to know the contractors for the colonial-made locomotives, and I know that up to now not one single locomotive has been taken over from the contractors and taken charge of by the Railway Department. Therefore the honourable gentleman's statement was an extraordinary one to make, and I trust he will see his way to apologize for having made it, as I think that is only due to the contractors, whom his statement is calculated to injure, and who are a well-known and honourable business firm. I trust that he will see his way to acknowledge his mistake. In reference to the Bill itself, I shall vote for the second reading; but it is a Bill of such magnitude that, I confess, I have not been able, up to the present time, to consider all the various points in it with the attention they deserve; and I am of opinion that it would be better, after the second reading has been carried, and after honourable members have had an opportunity of expressing their views, that the measure should not be forced through this session, so that the country may also have an opportunity to consider the measure and pronounce an opinion upon it.

Mr. MARCHANT.—The honourable member for Motueka professes himself a sceptic in regard to the Bill; but I think he used one of the strongest arguments in support of it when he said if more discretion were left to the local managers the lines could be made to pay. They could be made to pay, no doubt, if those in charge of them were allowed more discretion, and could make different charges on different sections, and if each case of reduction were strictly local; but the honourable gentleman must know full well what the result would be if the manager on one section lowered the rates on some particular article of produce in order to foster the carriage of it on his line. Instantly the settlers along other sections of railway would demand similar concessions. The managers would refuse, knowing that making the concessions there could not affect the amount of traffic; on which an agitation would be immediately raised against them, and the Minister would have to interfere to protect his servants, and then the whole power of Parliament would be brought to bear to force the Minister to give way and make the concession. It is only possible for a Board such as proposed, beyond political control, to make the differential rates necessary to make the different sections pay. The honourable member for Waitaki referred to the question of settlement: I think the Ministry we have now is one that is determined to foster settlement, if any Ministry could be so determined, and to give the people along the lines of railway the best facilities for using them. The honourable member also stated that the railway employes are forbidden to bring their grievances before members of Parliament: and that statement has been made more than once in this House. I do not think it is a fair statement to make, because only a short time ago the order under which this was said to be done was laid on the table of the House, having been previously moved for. It is dated the 15th February, 1883, and reads thus:—

"The communication of official information to members of the Press or other persons relating to the public service or the official position of any employé is forbidden, except so far as it may be strictly within the official duties of employes to supply it. Breach of this rule will render employes liable to dismissal.—J. P. MAXWELL."

Now, I defy any one to say that this order—

Mr. DUNCAN.—That is not the order at all.

Mr. MARCHANT.—We are bound to assume it is.

Mr. DUNCAN.—Well, you can have your own way.

Mr. MARCHANT.—If the honourable gentleman is not satisfied, he ought to move for a further return; but, in the meantime, we are bound to assume that this is the only order issued.

Mr. DUNCAN.—I can find another.

Mr. MARCHANT.—The honourable gentleman ought to find it, then, and lay it on the table. But this order cannot be twisted into saying that it forbids railway employes bringing any complaints they may have under the notice of Parliament. As for the Bill, I intend to support it, as I believe it to be a good one, and, at all events, things cannot be worked under it worse than they are under the present system.

Mr. KELLY.—It is my intention to support the second reading of this Bill; but, at the same time, I think it is not right that the management of the railways should wholly leave the control of the Minister for Public Works. I think that when the Board is appointed there will be practically little or nothing for the Minister of Public Works to do, because he tells us, when we apply for funds to construct roads or repair them, that there is no money for that purpose; and so it appears to me that, if the Minister has nothing to do in the way of constructing new works for want of money, and if the management of the works already constructed is taken from him, there will be nothing left for him to do. His office will have to be shut up. The Government ought to consider well before they appoint this Board; but, if a Board is to be appointed, I think the Minister for Public Works should be a member of it. It has been said during this debate, with regard to the money spent in different districts in the different workshops, that the money should be distributed over the colony. Now, I find, by a return laid on the table, showing the work done at the different workshops for other places, that at Addington last year the work done was of the value of £44,823; at Hillside, £4,950; at Newmarket, Auckland, £1,553; and at Pitone, £432. There are large and expensive buildings at each of these places; a great deal of money is spent there; but I think that the money should be better distributed, for it is evident by this return that most of the money is spent at Addington. The buildings at Pitone are large and extensive, and yet the sum spent there on works was only £432. I think that the members representing Wellington should see that they get a better share of the large sums of money spent than what they have got. I think that the members representing Auckland should also see that they get a fair share of the money voted for carrying on these works. But the case of Pitone is worse, for such large and extensive buildings should never have been erected if only £432 is to be spent there, against £44,823 at Addington. All over the colony, in my opinion, buildings have been erected that are not required, and in that way the present crisis has been brought on. We were told to-day that locomotives manufactured in this country cost 40 per cent. more than they would have cost if imported. I think that 40 per cent. should have been saved, or that these buildings should never have been erected. Although it is my intention to support local industries, and encourage the manufacture of our locomotives, at the same time I think that the money should be fairly distributed all over the country, and that such large sums should not be spent in one place, to the great disadvantage of others. With regard to the railways, it has been said here to-night that they were not made to pay. Now, we have 1,700 miles of railways; and I contend that, wherever these railways are, the people that have the advantage of them should be made to pay a certain amount to the taxation of the country. When the proposal to make railways was first brought before the House it was proposed that the lands through which they were to run should be rated to pay something towards the interest on cost of construction—that an area extending five or ten miles on each side of the lines should be rated on account of its enhanced value. I do not see why this should not have been done. The land has been enhanced in value by the construction of these railways, and I do not see why it should not pay something. The district I represent is a large one. We have neither railways nor proper roads, and in the winter it is impossible to travel over the roads even on horseback; and yet we are told that we cannot get a sum of £100 or £200 to construct or repair the road that was destroyed by the late Tarawera eruption. The position is, in my opinion, a melancholy one, because I contend that those who use the railways, or who have railways running through their property or through their district, should support them, and not allow the country to suffer any loss from them. At any rate those persons should assist, to a certain extent, other districts to get roads and bridges for the convenience of the people. There are many districts where there are neither roads nor bridges, not to speak of railways. There is no doubt that railways are a great benefit to the people when they run through their districts; and I think that something should be done to provide that those who ride in the railways and have the advantage of them should pay something extra towards the taxation of the country. The honourable member for Wallace spoke in a very gloomy tone of the position of the country. He said that we were practically bankrupt. I do not like to hear honourable members run down the country in this House to that extent. My own opinion is that if there were a policy in this country, a scheme of public works, a scheme of immigration, and the settlement of the waste lands of the Crown, and the encouragement of local industries, the country would soon be out of its present difficulty. The country is not bankrupt; it is not in such a bad state as that. No country can be bankrupt which has twenty millions' worth of railways, twenty million acres of land, besides other property worth at least another twenty millions. If we had a Ministry who would grapple with the question of our difficulties and bring forward a true policy that would protect local industries, in a short time the country would be relieved from its present financial condition, and I hope that when we meet next session some measures may be brought before the House in that direction. I hope that we shall have this great scheme which the honourable member for Christchurch North talks about. I hope that he will come down and give us a scheme which will push the country ahead and secure progress and prosperity in the future. Until we have a Government which will do something in that direction we shall not get out of our difficulties. I intend to support the second reading of the Bill, but I am not very favourably inclined towards the Board. A number of honourable gentlemen have intimated that they will move amendments in Committee, and I, too, have certain amendments which I shall endeavour to get carried, and if I cannot get them carried I shall hold myself free to oppose the Bill at its third reading.

Mr. HOBBS.—In supporting the second reading of this Bill I do so with great misgivings. I regret to say that I have noticed an utter absence, during this debate, of sympathy with the settlement of the people on the lands of the colony. I notice that one or two speakers have not lost sight of this matter, but a majority of the speakers have advocated making the railways pay by managing them on purely commercial principles. Sir, if it is the intention that this country shall prosper, you may depend upon it that prosperity can only be secured by going on with roads and bridges and railways; and, if members representing cities intend to so thoroughly ignore the question of the settlement of the people—I mean as they seem to be doing during this debate—then, I say, the country will never prosper. It is all very well to have eloquent speeches, but we want something more than that. I do not, like the honourable member for Rangitikei, look forward to a time when we shall be able to ride on the railways free of cost, just as we do over our roads and bridges. He may live to see that, but I do not expect to see it. But I do feel that there is a great principle underlying all this talk about making the railways pay; and I fear that, in talking of this as we are doing to-night, we are losing sight of what is more necessary for the permanent prosperity of the colony—the settlement of the people upon the land, and facilities for their getting their produce to market. I was glad to hear the honourable member for Waitaki speak as he did upon that point, though I was sorry he again adopted a line of argument which he often adopts in this House. He talks of there being sheep upon the land—nothing but sheep! There may be a good deal in that; but, as one who is not at all interested in sheep, I should like to ask the honourable gentleman, where should we be to-day if we had not sheep upon the land? How should we fill the steamers which come to our ports for mutton and wool, and how should we get on in these times, if it were not for the sheep industry? I feel that it is a fatal mistake this continually harping upon the subject of sheep upon the land. I think we may be thankful to God that we have sheep, the wool alone from which so largely augments our exports, and I say that we must turn our land to account if we want to revive our prosperity. That is why I am anxious about the settlement of the land, and we cannot expect the people to go upon the land unless we have railways or roads and bridges. Do not let us ignore these matters. Let us look at the whole question fairly. If you hand over these railways to a Board whose only duty it will be to make the railways pay, I am afraid the best and most permanent interests of the country will suffer.

Mr. R. H. J. REEVES.—I just wish to say that I hope the honourable gentleman in charge of this Bill will be satisfied with taking the second reading, and then letting the matter stand over so as to give honourable members an opportunity of considering the matter a little more closely, of looking at the pros and cons, the advantages and disadvantages which may be expected to arise from the passing of such a measure as this. I hope the honourable gentleman will study the full working of the system of a Board in Victoria. He must remember that Victoria is the only colony which has adopted this system. The Minister of Justice spoke of "other colonies;" but only one has so far adopted it, and I do not know that it is entirely satisfactory there. If we are to believe the public Press the Chief Commissioner there is already rather anxious to throw up his billet, for he seems disgusted, finding that it is impossible for him to resist the political pressure that is brought to bear upon him. I think, myself, that the honourable gentleman in charge of the Public Works Department here is a sufficiently clear-headed man, a man of sufficiently strong mind, to see that things are properly carried out in his department, and I do not see the necessity for a Commission to take the matter out of his hands. You may depend upon it that, if power is taken out of the hands of the Government, there will still be political pressure brought to bear, just as there has been in the past. A large number of members would like to make the railways simply a commercial concern, but I think we should look beyond the mere question of the direct advantages of the railways. We should look at the collateral advantages arising from them. If they do not pay in one direction they pay in another. I will not say more at this late hour; but I hope that the honourable gentleman will be content with taking the second reading of this Bill for this session, and defer further consideration until next year.

Sir G. GREY.—I do not wish to detain the House many minutes, but I think it right to make a few remarks on the subject of this Bill. Firstly, I would say, in regard to the past management of the railways, I believe that the past management of the railways has been good. Accidents have been surprisingly few. I believe that the comfort of the railways is very great, and I am perfectly certain that the attention of the public servants employed on the railways is very remarkable indeed. I am acquainted with railways in many parts of the world. I have seen no railways which have a more respectable class of officers than the railways of New Zealand can boast of at the present time. Therefore, so far as the management of the railways goes, I myself desire no reform. Then comes the question of price, and we can rely that these gentlemen whom it is proposed to appoint would insist on that being maintained. I should be anxious to know where the persons appointed to this Board are to be taken from. I contend that in New Zealand we have men perfectly capable of filling every position required to be filled in this colony; and it is an entire mistake and a most unfair proceeding to ignore our own population in new appointments of this kind. If I am told that the railways do not sufficiently pay, my answer is this: The real question is, in what manner can the railways be made really most serviceable in promoting the prosperity of the country? I think it is an entire mistake to say we must look only to profits from the railways. Our real duty is to render them serviceable to the whole community. I am quite satisfied that, if we ceased to hold the railways ourselves, in any manner whatever, we should lose that control over them which is requisite to secure the prosperity of the entire community. That is, if we were to lose the control of our railways, we should injure the whole population of New Zealand. If we were to sell them, and put them into the hands of other persons, we should deal as great a blow at the future prosperity of New Zealand as it would be possible for our greatest enemies to achieve; and I think that by taking them out of the hands of this Parliament we should achieve exactly the same object. If they were leased, we should do an injury to the people of New Zealand. The whole of the arguments that have been used upon that subject, to my mind, amounted to this: They said that the railways must be managed by a non-political Board;—and I believe that almost everything done in New Zealand ought to be managed by a non-political Board, and it is that aspect of the subject that induces me to say this: that the only manner in which we can attain that end is by constituting a Ministry which shall be in office for a certain number of years, and cannot be turned out. In that case you will have a non-political Ministry—a Ministry not dependent on the votes of Parliament, but on the will of the people of the country. If a Government knew they were only in for four years, and that the only way in which they could be turned out would be by a vote of the whole people of New Zealand, they would necessarily have carefully to study the good of the country, and the position in which they stand in the estimation of the people of New Zealand: if they carefully attended to this they would have a prospect of another tenure of office for an equal period of time. That is the way to attain the object which the present Ministry have in view. The railways and all other things would then be under a non-political Board. But I contend that to place the railways under a non-political Board would only attain the object in part, not wholly. A Board would look, I believe, solely to the sums of money which they could show they had obtained for the country. Honourable gentlemen have pointed out what is the real fact of the case, that the railways belong to the whole of the people of New Zealand. We form one great company for that purpose. In that company every inhabitant of New Zealand is a shareholder, and he does not look for a dividend, as people do in a company, but looks for certain advantages from the railways. And what I long to see, though, of course, I shall not live to see it, is the time when the railways of New Zealand will be worked at almost no charge whatever to the country for either passenger traffic or produce being dragged along the line. It is incalculable how this would add to the wealth of New Zealand. The present Ministers, if they had the will in themselves to do it, might enrich the greater portion, if not the whole, of the inhabitants of New Zealand to an extent which is almost inconceivable. For instance, take the case of any railway you please. Supposing that in a distance of two hundred miles from Wellington it cost no more to reach that point than it did a distance of ten miles, or to take your produce that distance, it would give to that distant place almost the same value for its lands which lands in the neighbourhood of Wellington have at the present time. How that would add to the welfare of a large number of persons! And yet I am certain that at no very distant date that really will prevail in New Zealand. If you once let your railroads pass out of your hands you lose all possibility of attaining such an end. Then, I ask honourable gentlemen to recollect this: that at the present moment in the United States the one great question occupying many minds is the manner in which the United States can purchase the railroads from the present private possessors and make them the property of the nation. They say that the cost will be so great that they hardly know how to venture upon an undertaking of that kind. We have the railways in our possession, and I believe this Bill is the first step to giving up that advantage, which I prize, myself, so highly. Therefore I shall feel it a duty that I owe to the inhabitants of New Zealand to record my vote against the measure. I have heard honourable members saying that they are opposed to the Bill, but, nevertheless, will vote for its second reading, and try to make alterations in it in Committee. Being opposed to the Bill, I feel that I ought to oppose it from the first. Not that I wish to create any embarrassment whatever, but I believe if a majority of the House are opposed to the measure they will less embarrass the Government by at once voting against it than by voting in favour of its second reading and then wasting time in Committee. Therefore, with no intention of causing unnecessary embarrassment, but from a conviction that the measure itself is opposed to the interests of the inhabitants of New Zealand, I shall feel it my duty to give my vote against the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. MITCHELSON.—I think the House is to be congratulated upon the manner in which this proposal has been received. I am quite satisfied from the expressions that have fallen from honourable members during this debate that it will be made a workable measure in Committee. In regard to the remarks of the honourable member for Auckland Central as to a non-political Ministry, I hope to see the day when such a thing will be the case. If such a Ministry were to be appointed for a fixed term of years there would be no necessity for this Bill; but, seeing that under our present Constitution the Ministry of the day are subject to the will of the House, the only course we can in the meantime adopt is to appoint a non-political Railway Board—which will, I believe, give a great deal of satisfaction to the country as a whole, and also to the members of this House. I quite agree with the honourable gentleman also that the railways are the property of the people, and should be worked for the advantage of the people, the opening-up of the country, and the prosperous settlement of our lands. He must know, however, that a great deal of pressure has been brought upon Ministries in past years, which has acted detrimentally to the best interests of the country. Without doubt a large expenditure has been incurred in the construction of what is known as political railways which ought never to have been incurred, and the lands which it was supposed they would open up for settlement have remained unsettled to this day. That is a question which ought to be very carefully considered by the Board, for without prosperous settlement there is not much hope for our railways. With reference to the remarks of the honourable member for Waitaki, I have myself visited some of the lands which he alluded to, and can to a certain extent bear out the statements that he made. I do not wish to detain the House at this late hour, as my honourable colleague the Minister of Mines has an important Bill relating to the mining industry which he is anxious to have read a second time before half-past twelve, in order that it may be sent to the Committee. I beg to move the second reading of the Bill.

MINING BILL (No. 2).

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said that, looking to the fact that this Bill had, after its second reading, to go to the Mines Committee, he would not speak at any length upon it, but would shortly recapitulate its principal features. The first important provision was to allow the Government to take land under the Public Works Act for tailings and sludge-channels. The second was to prevent the parting with riparian rights in disposing of lands in mining districts in the future. The next important provision in the Bill, which principally affected the Thames and Coromandel, was to give the right to mine under the foreshore and under the sea. Legislative provision was made to allow mining in State forests; and it was proposed under the Bill to legalise the position of the Thames Drainage Board. That Board at present was acting without power to enforce its regulations. "The Drainage of Mines Act, 1884," which had been repealed by the Mining Act of 1886, had rendered the regulations of the Thames Drainage Board inoperative, and the provision in clause 8 of the Bill introduced a remedy for that defect. The rest of the Bill consisted of clauses providing for the remedy of technical defects in the existing Mines Act. He might say that the Bill had been introduced by the Government at the suggestion of those concerned in the important industry of mining, and he hoped the House would allow it to be read a second time and referred to the Goldfields and Mines Committee.

Mr. SEDDON intended to support the Bill, but thought that, where retrospective legislation was intended, it was only fair to take the House into confidence, or otherwise, when a sum of money was required, it might be afterwards said that the goldfields members had permitted the principle of the Bill to be agreed to without pointing out to the House what the effect of the legislation would be. It was proposed in the Bill to take land for the deposit of tailings under the Public Works Act. That was a new thing altogether, and it was a thing also that was contrary to the law at the present time. Land purchased before 1873 could not be resumed or taken back for the purpose of depositing tailings, &c., upon it. Therefore to that extent this Bill was a reversal of the existing law, and he thought it only right and fair to the House to say that this Bill was going behind the existing law; and no doubt those who purchased land before 1873 would think they were now being unfairly treated. The second part of the Bill was in itself of sufficient importance to justify the House in passing the measure. It provided what obtained on the goldfields in the other colonies—that, where land was sold in close proximity to gold-workings, the owner of that land should have no right to recover damages against miners who polluted streams. It did away with riparian rights. In mining districts, but for the goldfields a man's land would be of little value to him for settlement; but under the existing law he had power to recover damages for the pollution of a stream, notwithstanding that the working of the mines gave all the value to his land. It was found on the West Coast that settlers who received great benefit from the working of the goldfields sued in the Supreme Court for damages in this respect, and unless something was done to deprive them of this right the result would be to stop gold-mining altogether. The Legislature had no right to deprive any person of his property without paying fair compensation; but for the future, in the interest of mining, it was necessary that this Bill should pass, more especially as the House was now giving away large tracts of country for the construction of public works. The provisions for mining on the foreshore applied more particularly to the North Island; but these would be inoperative if the Bill were passed in its present shape. In the first place, £20 was demanded for survey, and one could not mine at a depth of less than 150ft. from the surface. Why should it be 150ft. below the surface? There was no necessity for stipulating that great depth. If gold was to be got at a depth of 20ft. from the surface, why should miners not be permitted to work at that depth?

An Hon. MEMBER.—The sea might come in upon them.

Mr. SEDDON said the miners would take all precautions against the sea coming in. There was a very large power in this Bill which the Minister had not mentioned—that, where the Natives had ceded land for mining purposes, and had made a contract and conditions as to the ceding of that land, the Governor was to have the power to alter and vary that contract without the consent of the Natives. That was taking advantage of those who had given the Government power to take their land for mining purposes, and he would be no party to the passing of such a law. There ought to be consent, and a mutual give-and-take between the two parties. It was in the interest of mining that there should be an alteration of the existing contracts; but, at the same time, where a contract was made between two parties both should be consenting parties to the varying of that contract. There was another question raised, which was of importance to the South Island, that persons holding residence sites had to pay licenses. Now, he did not think that would be agreed to. The goldfields members had always insisted that residence area was a man's tenure, and he paid £1 a year for it; and he (Mr. Seddon) failed to see why a man should pay £3 a year because he carried on business on that particular site. The total area he could hold was one acre, and the payment of £1 for it was quite enough, without being called on to pay £3 a year for a business license. Then, there was in this Bill another point. A man who worked for a miner would be called upon to hold a miner's right; and this meant that a double tax would be paid. One man, the employer, paid for holding the land; and why, therefore, should the man who was working for him on wages be called upon to pay a license-fee for working for another man on the goldfield? There was no reason why this man, any more than a man working for a road contractor, should be made to pay for a miner's right. He did not think the thing was at all right in principle, and consequently to that part of the Bill he took exception. It was considered by the late Parliament, when the present Mining Act was before the House, and it was unanimously agreed that the principle of charging wages-men for miners' rights was unnecessary. With the exceptions he had mentioned, he thought the Bill before the House one that should be passed. It would have his support, and in Committee he would endeavour to make the measure as workable as possible.

Mr. CADMAN said, the amendments of the law proposed by this Bill being mainly of a technical nature, there was little to be discussed, more especially as the Bill had to go to the Goldfields and Mines Committee. But he had hoped that the Minister would have taken some notice of the complaints that had arisen in connection with the new goldfield at Maritoto. In the working of a new Act there was certain to be a little friction, and he would have been glad to see some provision made for rubbing off this little soreness. The objections raised on the northern goldfields were of a threefold character—first in respect to manning the ground, another in respect to the area to be taken up, and the third as to the time allowed for the completion of surveys. Under the regulations provision was made that one man should be allowed to man or work two acres. This was not independent of the tributers, and the provision should be made to apply independent of tributers. He knew of one licensed holding which had been working for some years by tributers only, and paying the holders dividends. This simply meant that a few speculators extorted a high percentage from the tributers, when the unfortunate men ought to be getting all the fruits of their own toil. Some amendments ought to be made with respect to the area. Now, it was proved that a man could take up thirty acres, and that in the North Island was regarded as a sheep-run; and, except under exceptional circumstances, this was too large for quartz-reefing. He thought that from five to ten acres was ample for any man, and gave a chance of opening up the country in a far better way. Then, in respect of the surveys, the Bill allowed a man three months to complete his survey, and the miners complained of such a provision, being of opinion that one month was ample. There was another matter smouldering now, but on which public opinion was going to burst out into a very strong flame unless something were done: that was in respect to mining managers' certificates. The Bill provided that mining managers should undergo a certain amount of examination before they were granted certificates. Now, it so happened that some men had received certificates whilst others as competent as they were refused certificates; and this had caused considerable soreness, and ought to be inquired into. He advised the Minister not to wrap himself up entirely in his Land Bills. A large section of the people of this colony had their welfare depending on the mining industry, and little matters, though appearing trifling to others, were of great importance to these people. He would therefore recommend the honourable gentleman to try and rectify little grievances that existed on the goldfields in the North Island while this Bill was in hand.

Mr. ALLEN said the honourable member who had just spoken had told the House that in this Bill there were only technical points raised.

Mr. CADMAN.—I said "mainly."

Mr. ALLEN maintained that one of the largest principles that could possibly be raised in regard to mining was contained in the 3rd clause, and he could not understand what had been going through the brain of the Minister who held the double portfolio of Land and Mines. In this 3rd clause, if he read it aright, "land," so far as the Minister of Lands was concerned, was entirely thrown in the background, and the mining interest received paramount importance. He was not going to grumble; he must confess that, so far as he himself was concerned, mining interests were of very great importance in his mind; but when an honourable gentleman said that no great principle was involved in this Bill, he (Mr. Allen) felt bound to rise and say that there was such a principle contained here. If any one read clause 3 he would see that a very large question was brought before the House. The question was, whether or not streams, and so on, even to drinking-water going to people's houses, and the water for their cattle, were to be polluted by the débris from mines being thrown into them, thus practically destroying the use of the river or stream so far as the watering of cattle was concerned, — whether all that should be destroyed or not. Now, that was a very large question. He knew it referred only to the mining districts; and if the House determined that mining, and mining alone, should in these districts be paramount, then they would be perfectly justified in passing this clause. But they had to consider this question: whether, in view of the preservation of agricultural and pastoral pursuits, so far as they could be carried out in mining districts, these were more to the benefit of the colony in the future, or whether the mining industry, which, after all—and he told the mining members this, and they knew it—was only a passing thing, here to-day and gone to-morrow, was in the future to be of more benefit to the colony. The mining interest in this and other countries would not last for ever, and the honourable member for Kumara knew it.

Mr. SEDDON.—You cannot point out a country where mining, once commenced, ever stopped.

Mr. ALLEN said the alluvial mines in Victoria were now comparatively few in number, and the honourable member knew it. And he knew also that the drifts in this country were day by day getting less, and that the reefs here and in Victoria were getting less. The time would come when there would be no drifts left here; and they could not continue mining for ever. He was not quite sure of the full bearing of clause 14. The whole Bill referred to silver- and gold-mines, and he did not know whether this clause referred to them only, or whether it referred to coal-mining as well.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON.—Yes.

Mr. ALLEN.—It was quite right that coal-mining or any mining should be allowed to go on underneath the sea; but he did not know that sufficient provision was made by the Bill for accurate surveys of the sea-coast under which this mining took place. In the interest of the miners themselves that should be fully provided for, as mining under the sea was very dangerous; and it appeared to him that £20 was too small a sum to lodge on account of these surveys. It might be sufficient in some cases; but in large extended areas where coal-mining was carried on such a deposit meant nothing in comparison with the cost of the survey. That clause would have to be very carefully considered in Committee. He would not oppose the second reading, because, as he had said, his feelings were in the direction of assisting the mining interests as much as possible; but he had thought it only right to say what he had said on behalf of other interests.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON said the objections raised to the Bill were almost wholly Committee objections. He was aware of the matter to which the honourable member for Coromandel had referred, and the important principle he touched upon of not granting riparian rights on further sale of land in mining districts. That principle was not introduced into the Bill without serious consideration; but it was perfectly clear that, where there were two conflicting interests in the same district, one must be given a paramount importance, or there would necessarily be trouble. It was therefore considered that, where persons went to strictly mining districts for agricultural purposes, they should know that in those districts the mining interest must be paramount. With regard to the objections of the honourable member for Dunedin East as to the pollution of streams used for drinking purposes, and that mining must, in the course of time, come to an end, it was quite clear that, if such were the case, there was no impropriety in introducing the principle contained in the Bill, for if mining ceased the streams would become clear. He would make no further remark.

Bill read a second time.

THIRD READING.

Proclamation Validation Bill.

SCRIPTURE-LESSON BOOKS.

The Hon. Mr. HART.—It is not my intention to occupy the time of the Council at any length in reference to the motion standing in my name; but the number of petitions, the increasing number of petitions which have been presented to this Council in relation to the subject of the Education Act in force in this colony attests the existence of a growing dissatisfaction with some of its provisions—dissatisfaction which, in the nature of things, will grow and extend, and may lead to what I think will be an ill-advised proceeding—namely, the reading of the Bible in schools without limit or without selection. There can be no doubt that a system of education established by the State which occupies the whole of the time of a young person at school, and requires him to give his mind to the study of lessons in his evening hours, and at the same time ignores the cultivation of his moral faculties and, except incidentally, the cultivation of his physical faculties, is not a complete system of education. In fact, we have only to refer to a very old passage in one of those lessons which I hope will be established in the State schools—namely, "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it"—and compare it with the education of a boy who has arrived at the Sixth Standard and, if his parents can afford to give it to him, the higher class of education—we have only to look at what is contained in the one and compare it with what is contained in the other, and we shall see that in the one there is a depth and breadth of meaning which is not in the other. It is evident that there is an impression in the minds of many that the existence of Bible-reading in schools will meet a considerable part of the difficulty. I think that is rather a lazy way of looking at the matter. The Bible is not one book; it is many books translated and bound up in one; and, because it has much that is excellent in it, and appropriate to all periods of life, we make almost a fetish of the book, and treat every part of it alike, when, in fact, we ought to discriminate and use those parts which are applicable to the different periods of life for their proper and practical purposes. There are some of those books which are not only not needful but are not befitting to be read in school to children at an early age, and therefore it is necessary there should be a selection made. Efforts have been made at different times to make such a selection. Two highly-respected Archbishops in Ireland, one of the Roman Catholic Church and the other of the Anglican Church, gave their attention to the subject, and compiled school-books which were for years used with much success in Irish schools, until a change took place in the headship of the Roman Catholic Church. The Education Boards in England have seen the necessity of making selections of that kind and having them introduced in schools. They intrusted the duty to laymen to make such selections, and whose instructions were to omit from the lessons they compiled all texts which had any bearing on sectarian or denominational differences. The result was a compilation or a selection of Biblical lessons which has been used in the Board schools of England and Wales. In an address to the London School Board some years ago Mr. Mundella spoke of the results of that system, and he said he spoke with knowledge, because he had been appointed the head of the Sunday-School Union of England and Wales. He said that the attendance of the Sunday-schools of England and Wales, which had been, before the institution of these Biblical lessons in the Board schools, three millions, was, evidently consequent on the selections used in the Board schools, increased to five millions. So that the existence of those lessons in the Board schools of England and Wales gave a very great impetus to religious teaching in England and Wales in the Sunday-schools—a result which, I think, must be accepted with congratulation by all who desire the cultivation of the whole human being, and not merely of the intellect alone. It is to these Biblical lessons for school use that my resolution refers. While on this subject—and I may not, probably, be likely to deal with it again—I think it is desirable to point out that in a book in which I have found much that is eminently practical, and a book which should be in every library subsidised by the Government, appears the following. That book is "The Health of Nations," by B. W. Richardson. It is a book which ought to be studied by every man who calls himself a statesman, and who wishes to direct and influence the well-being of the people. I will read one passage on "Outcomes of Highest-class Schools." He says,—

"Frequent accounts are received of the inaptitudes engendered or left by the teaching in superior schools, from the heads of manufactures who require science and art in their processes, and so also from the heads of large commercial establishments. Both complain that from the great classical schools, which have their annual recitals and displays of eminent scholarship, the scholars come to the counting-house with arithmetic that is worthless; that they must re-teach themselves if they would get on; that, although they may have been taught modern languages, they have been so ill-taught that they cannot write correctly a foreign letter; and that, though they may know good Latin, there are few of them who write good English. Hence they are frequently beaten by the boy whose education has been in an infant or in a large national primary school. This unfairness as towards the middle classes will be only prevented, at all events as to the greater proportion of them, by a common start, in large primary and secondary schools, kept in close relation with the demands of art and science, the manufactory, or the counting-house, by constant communication with them from the school."

Then, in the same chapter, he refers to another question, which, as time goes on, in this colony will probably be well worth considering by those who have to do with the State schools. He places earning and learning hand in hand. He says,—

"Having regard to the hard necessities of common life, and the economical condition and welfare of the many, one great object for saving school-time as early as practicable is to let earning and learning go on, as much as possible, together. The great practical object of school-teaching is not to make superior scholars, but superior artisans; not to impart to the middle classes the accomplishments of the leisure classes, but applied science and productive art for actual service. It is desirable, for the progress of arts, manufactures, and commerce, to make the school itself primarily a manufactory and a labour mart for available service."

"Brain-work and Hand-work: The half school-time principle, and all reductions of school-time, is conducive to this end. It is now proved that the capacity of the beneficial attention and mental labour of children is exhausted in the good primary schools in less than three hours of good sustained teaching, and that all labour beyond that is detrimental and pernicious. The combination of book-instruction with physical exercise, or with actual productive avocations, is proved to be advantageous to both; and this is true of middle-class, or superior, as well as inferior teaching."

What has appeared to me, on the whole, with regard to the subject of my motion is this: that there will be a greater readiness on the part of the people of the colony to have Biblical lessons selected by laymen than to permit the Bible at large to be used. Under these circumstances it is that I have called attention to the subject, because I feel it to be the consideration of a matter of great importance. I move the motion standing in my name.

Motion made, and question proposed, "That, in the opinion of this Council, it is desirable that the Government should obtain copies of the Scripture lesson-books in use in the Education Board schools of England and Wales, with the view that, if, upon examination, those lesson-books be found suitable, their use may be adopted in the State schools of this colony."—(Hon. Mr. Hart.)

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS.—I was not aware, when I saw the motion of the honourable gentleman, that he intended to make of this an opportunity to attack one leading principle of our education system, although it must be admitted that the words of the resolution amply admit of such belief. My honourable friend's remarks make it quite clear that he does intend to attack the secular principle of the Education Act of 1877; and I venture to say—if he will excuse me for saying so—that I think he might have selected a very much more convenient method of doing that. I think it would have been better altogether, and would have led to more practical results, if he had proposed the repeal of a very few words of the Act of 1877, section 84—that part which lays it down in a complete manner that the time spent in the public schools in public education shall be entirely occupied by teaching of a secular character. That would have raised the whole question in the most convenient form, and in the very widest possible manner in which it could be discussed. But, since we have it in its present form, I may just venture to make one or two remarks upon the proposition. It is very likely, if we did repeal that provision of the Education Act, the book particularly specified by my honourable friend might be found to be as good a book for the purpose of imparting Scripture teaching as any other; but it is equally probable that, if the country decided upon accepting that immense change which he proposes, it would wish to take into consideration the most satisfactory method by which that education could be imparted, and would make a very careful selection from all books and from other means of imparting that teaching. This subject must always be one involving the greatest possible difference of opinion. The country has now worked under the system in operation, and it has been accepted, I suppose we may assume, by a considerable majority of the people, because otherwise they would by this time have succeeded, considering its importance, in making the change which my honourable friend aims at. So far as my own opinion is concerned, it would be better to leave things as they are; but, as I have said before, it will be a matter of difference of opinion probably for all time. I do not propose to make any lengthened remarks on the subject. I merely thought it advisable to point out, what perhaps did not require much pointing out, the immense scope of my honourable friend's motion. I may say, once more, that it is a subject which requires to be dealt with from the point of view of perhaps as great a change in the Education Act as it is possible to make; and I merely say that, as far as my own vote is concerned in this matter, I shall certainly consider it my duty to oppose it.

The Hon. Mr. SCOTLAND.—I think there can be no doubt as to the motive of the honourable gentleman in bringing forward this motion. I think the Hon. Mr. Stevens has hit the right nail on the head. I am really astonished that the Hon. Mr. Hart cannot see that it would be impossible that any set of Scripture-lessons, however well drawn up, could be introduced into the schools. We have adopted a contrary principle. How are we going to put New Testament lessons, for instance, before the children of Jewish parents? How are we going to put any Scripture-lessons according to our version of the Bible before the children of Roman Catholic parents, seeing that the Roman Catholics have got their own translation of the Bible, which differs very materially from ours in many points? I deny altogether that the children of this colony who attend the Government schools are a bit worse than the children in England, where these Scripture-lessons are read in the schools. Let us have statistics to show that they are not so good as children brought up in schools where the Bible is said to be read. The truth is that at the bottom of all these petitions in favour of Bible-reading in schools we can see the hand of the clergy. They see that the young people are slipping away from them in this colony; and no wonder! The fact is—I am sorry to say it, but it is perfectly true—that religion has become such a worldly-minded thing in New Zealand that the rising generation have lost all confidence in those who are called its teachers. Look at the ministers in the colony, what they submit to! They preach Christ, it is true. "They preach Him," as has been said by an author, "and there they leave Him." There is too much conformity to the world, the flesh, and the devil. They have suffered religion to become—I dare say it is much against their wish that it should be so, but there is no doubt that it is so—a mere affair of the senses. What with bazaars, fancy fairs, organ recitals, and services of song, it is all nervous excitement and sensationalism; and the services are even duly advertised, like theatrical representations. Is there any vital Christianity in any Church in New Zealand? I deny it. I am sorry for the clergy. I do not say it is their fault. They are the victims of circumstances. They are obliged too much to enter into competition with the Press. It is the pulpit against the Press, and the Press against the pulpit. I am sorry also to have to say that in my opinion the Press of this colony is an infidel Press. I think we must leave this system of education alone. In my opinion, it is a very wise thing to place religion outside of the school altogether. Give it such a place of honour that it shall not be degraded by being introduced into the schools. I had hoped that we had seen the last of these motions and petitions. If you want to do away with the secular system of education, do away with it in an open manner, and do not attack it in this way—by side-winds, trying to shake its foundation in order to destroy it altogether. Go to work in an honest manner, discuss the thing on its merits, and perhaps the country may see the error of its way and give it up; but, in my opinion, if the country is wise it will adhere to the present system. I am not at all afraid that Christianity will not be able to hold its own against the powers of darkness; and if this secular system is of the devil it will come to naught.

The Hon. Mr. MILLER.—I may say I have listened in vain for any arguments which can be called effectual against the motion which has been brought forward by my honourable friend. It seems to me that the Hon. Mr. Hart has done a great public service in bringing this question before the country, and I only wish it could be discussed properly, impartially, and thoroughly from one end of New Zealand to the other. I believe, myself, that it is the one sole means of getting rid of the conflict which we must all know is impending between what is called the denominational system and the present system. It is all very well to talk about the clergy, and about what is the object of education, and about the habits and the tone of mind which prevail amongst the rising generation of New Zealand. I say, with regard to the clergy—I do not wish to speak disrespectfully of that very important class of the community, but I say that, if the whole truth is told about this great question, it is the clergy themselves who have rendered religious education impossible. If the clergy would only agree upon what ought to be taught to the children the thing would be done at once; but directly the point is raised we are met with this difficulty: "Oh, if I do not teach it, then the teaching will be wrong." I rose to support the honourable gentleman on the present occasion because I find that this resolution exactly embodies the views which I held in 1883. Honourable members will remember that there was a Joint Committee of the two Houses upon this very question; and I shall take the liberty of reading a question which I put at that time to Bishop Hadfield. Honourable members will recollect that Committee well. A great deal of evidence was taken on that occasion, and there were examined at that Committee Bishops Hadfield, Redwood, Moran,

and Luck, and many other clergymen. We went into the thing pretty exhaustively; but the result, of course, was that the thing came to nothing; the Committee reported nothing. Here are a few questions I then asked:—

"Hon. Mr. Miller.—Do you say you would not consider mere reading of the Scriptures of any value in the schools, supposing all parties could agree to read selected portions at certain times without explanation? Would that be of no value in the event of the system you propose being impossible?"

"Bishop Hadfield.—I should object to that, because I do not believe any person could be appointed to select passages that would satisfy all denominations. Who would you have? Should it be the Minister of Education?"

"Hon. Mr. Miller.—You think it is not possible to agree upon passages?"

"Bishop Hadfield.—I think not. It would exclude the Roman Catholics."

"Hon. Mr. Miller.—Are there not passages of Scripture to be met that all might agree upon?"

"Bishop Hadfield.—There are, but, I think, not to satisfy everybody—certainly not us, and, I think, not the Roman Catholics."

"Hon. Mr. Miller.—If passages could be agreed upon, do you not think that would be better than nothing?"

"Bishop Hadfield.—I do not think it would, because, in my opinion, it would be a sham. It would not satisfy the people more than the present system."

"Hon. Mr. Miller.—Surely the children would go away with the texts imprinted upon their memory, and they would recur to them in after-life?"

"Bishop Hadfield.—I do not think it would be of any real benefit. It would, moreover, be in the power of the master to use Scripture in an improper and irreverent way."

"Hon. Mr. Miller.—Then, in the event of the State refusing this denominational system, there would be no alternative."

"Bishop Hadfield.—I do not know of any."

"Hon. Mr. Miller.—Except, of course, the various denominations having their own schools?"

"Bishop Hadfield.—Yes."

To tell me that such a passage as "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom" cannot be agreed to by all sects is nonsense. There are hundreds of passages which any member of this Council could select that all classes, however sectarian, could agree to; to say that such is not the case is nonsense.

An Hon. MEMBER.—It is dangerous.

The Hon. Mr. MILLER.—These are the questions I asked, and these are the answers given then. I have listened to a great many debates in this Council and elsewhere, and I have heard all sorts of things about this religious education, and I believe that I have thought about it as much as anybody could think about it; and I have never been able to understand what possible objection there could be to such a course as this. I could understand a person full of prejudice and bias, who would listen to nothing; but for men who desire the good of the children to say that they cannot agree upon certain texts of the Bible to be learnt by children, so that they may be imprinted on their memories, and live with them for the rest of their lives, to stand by them perhaps in the hour of temptation and trial, when probably nothing else would save them—that seems to me the most extraordinary idea that ever any sensible man took up. What is the object of education? The honourable gentleman has read us an extract in which he stated that the object of education was to make good artisans. Well, of course it is a part of the object of education to make good artisans. We in this colony feel—and we very properly feel—that if we do not keep pace with the rest of the nations in the progress made in all the arts and sciences we shall lag behind. We are quite right in fostering education to the very utmost of our power; and there is no doubt it is a race between the nations. We see enormous strides being made in almost every department of science, and, as a matter of fact, if we want to hold our position we cannot afford to lag behind, but must keep up to the mark. Great as these results are, I say that is not the great end of education. I say that the real and true end of education is to nurture a citizen who shall be thoroughly conscientious in all his doings, one who in all his doings throughout his life shall refer his actions to some tribunal beyond the influences of this mortal life, one who shall look to a judgment that will come not from man, but from a Power above. I say that is the true end of education, and until education results in the training-up of men of this kind you will not have a nation that will fly its flag in your naval battles as Nelson did, with the words, “England expects every man this day to do his duty.” What do we see in the case of nations which have not recognised religion? The very reverse. I say their generals, their statesmen, are actuated, very frequently, by no conscientious motives; and the consequence is that there is not that stern regard for duty which has made our own country so famous. Although I do not wish to place myself in opposition to this movement for Bible-reading in schools, dictated as it is, I believe, by very proper motives, still I do feel, and have always felt, very great doubts as to whether the mere reading of the Bible can make children religious in the proper sense of the word, though perhaps I do not understand religion in the same sense as other people. I do not want to make out that our children are worse than others, but it cannot be denied that there is in the rising generation not only of this colony, but, I believe, throughout the world—at any rate in all parts of the civilised world—an absolute want of reverence which can only be explained by this absence of religious education. You want to find more reverence. Honourable members will remember the character of Hannibal: the very worst charge which could be brought against him ‘by the Roman author was that of “nulla religio.” That will be the charge that will be brought against us: there is no religion. The children need to be taught some reverence, and it is the duty of every one to cast aside all sectarian views, to ignore every consideration but that one; and it appears to me you cannot possibly get a better means of teaching the great principles of religion in the public schools than by a process such as the honourable gentleman recommends. We have always to remember in this colony that we have to choose between the secular and denominational systems of education. One of these two systems must prevail. Looking at the strong agitation against purely secular education, together with the overwhelming expenditure which is being incurred, I think it would be scarcely rash to say that a day may come when we shall see the whole fabric tumble down. I shall support the motion of the honourable gentleman.

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN.—The honourable gentleman who last spoke began by telling us that he had heard no argument that in the least induced him to disapprove of the motion now before the Council; but I cannot agree with the honourable gentleman in that statement, because I think the arguments used by the Hon. Mr. Stevens were very much to the purpose. They were simply to the effect that any interference with the existing system of education would involve us in great difficulties; and he took the business line of preferring to see such large questions discussed with a full knowledge of all its bearings than to see it meddled with by what I think he called a sidewind. Yet supposing that argument was not sufficient to convince us that the present resolution would interfere with the system, the honourable gentleman has himself adduced a sufficient number of arguments to prove that we should not be wise to support the resolution. The contention of the honourable gentleman was that there was a certain division of opinion amongst the clergy and the people of this country, and that it was only by obtaining a complete rationality amongst the people—a wonderful amount of intelligence and fairness, such as it is very difficult to find—that the system which he proposes could be adopted with any chance of success. If he can tell us how we can implant that fairness, that intelligence, as well as the existing religiosity, if I may use the expression, it is possible that such proposals to change the existing system might be carried into effect. But he has been far from showing this; he has shown the very contrary. He has in all his arguments shown that not only is there a great division of opinion among the clergy themselves in matters of religion, but that this is really a conflict between the secular system and the denominational system. That question has been well fought out in the country. It was talked about the other night when the Bible in Schools Bill was considered, and defeated by a very large majority; and, looking at it in this way, it would be exceedingly unwise to introduce an element of discord in reference to the education system at the present moment, without a full knowledge of all that may result from what is proposed in this resolution. Sir, I will not go into the question that has been very ably raised by the honourable gentleman, who spoke with the greatest possible enthusiasm as to the benefits of religion, and of the ancient feeling that "nulla religio" was an expression used to designate an exceedingly bad man. I will not go into that further than to say that the meaning of religion was very different then from its meaning now. Philologically it was that set of ideas which bound men together; it was all those sentiments of patriotism and virtue, and all those beliefs, which bound men together for the common good. I think it would be quite easy to see that we may have all these admirable qualities perfectly free from anything in the nature of the supernatural, although the honourable gentleman says there is nothing to restrain men but a reference to the supernatural, the judgment to come, and so forth. It is quite certain that in this colony, at least, there are an enormous number of persons who would oppose any attempt to base our educational and social system upon any approach to the supernatural. I shall oppose the motion of the honourable gentleman.

The Hon. Mr. OLIVER.—There can be no doubt that the motion, if adopted by the Council, would involve the expression on our part of the opinion that the Bible should be read in schools. It affects only to express an opinion that certain Scripture-lesson books should be obtained and examined, and that if the lessons are found suitable they should be adopted for the use of State schools in this colony. This, of course, raises the whole religious question as against the so-called "godless system" which prevails amongst us at present. For my own part, my mind is very much unsettled on this subject of late. I have hitherto supported the secular system, and I am not yet prepared to abandon this system; because, in thinking of the problem, it is found by me to be an extremely difficult thing to propound any scheme which should properly, in the circumstances in which we are placed, replace that system. I think it must be admitted that the reverential feeling which is the very essence of religion is somewhat absent in this colony; and if we could devise any system by which this defect would be remedied I am sure every good citizen would rejoice at it. I have always maintained that, although, primarily, the duty of imparting religious instruction to the children devolves on the parent, it also devolves on the clergy. They are peculiarly set apart for the purpose of imparting religious instruction, and we find they confine their labours to the adult portion of their congregations. The impressionable time is in the child's early days. I think it is a mistake to designate the present system as entirely "godless." I have taken some trouble quite recently to acquaint myself with the character of the school-books in use in the State schools. I obtained from the Secretary to the Education Board in Dunedin a complete set of the schoolbooks used in that district. I examined every one of them from beginning to end, with the view of ascertaining whether they are open to the accusation of being godless; and I find that that is an entirely false accusation, for they are full of references to God, to heaven, and to religious feeling. However, I do not go so far as to say that the teacher could not so use the books as to ignore the Bible or religion. It seems to me that any system which ignores religion and the Bible is a most defective one. References to the Bible—its phrases, and the sentiments contained in the Bible—are so strewn through the whole of our literature that any boy who is brought up without a tolerable knowledge of the Bible, in my opinion must be considered, in an English community, an uneducated person. Even for that reason, and if there were no question of religious teaching, I think that the Bible ought not to be excluded from the schools. I am not prepared with any scheme; but possibly, the public mind being exercised upon this subject as it is from day to day, something may be evolved that will be satisfactory. I am not quite sure that I ought to vote for this motion, because it appears to me that, if we were resolved to adopt the teaching of religion in the State schools, we ought to say so in a manner altogether different from this motion.

The Hon. Colonel BRETT.—I rise to say that, if I stand alone, I shall vote against this motion. It is a motion which is quite extraordinary to me. I know not its reasons. It appears to be a very mysterious motion. Is the honourable gentleman going to convert the Roman Catholics to Protestantism? Does he want to convert the Wesleyans to his own religion, the Presbyterian? I object very much to interfering with the religious education of the country. If I had my option I would burn every commentary upon the Bible. The Bible stands alone. It is a sacred book. Go from Wesleyans to Presbyterians and Plymouth Brethren, and so on, and they pervert that Godly-written Word. I shall oppose this motion with indignation.

The Hon. Mr. ACLAND.—I am rather astonished at the burst of indignation that has just been displayed by my honourable friend; but, while it is perfectly true that this aims now at Bible-reading in schools, I certainly think that, as there has been a book which has been agreed upon to be used in the English schools, we ought to take some steps to get it out here, to see if any possible agreement can be arrived at about it. Considering how the Bible is woven up in all literary work, it is a very sad thing that it should be so absolutely excluded from our schools as it is. Of course we know very well that we accept the idea that our children learn religion at their mother's knee. But mothers are sometimes very hard-worked, and many children have not got mothers; and, I think it is very desirable we should have an opportunity of seeing this book, and seeing whether it cannot be used here.

The Hon. Mr. BONAR.—The remarks of the last speaker very greatly represent the ideas that have been passing through my own mind. As has been said by the Hon. Mr. Miller, a great deal of the difficulty of introducing the system of reading the Bible in schools is due to the inability of the clergy to agree among themselves on the selections to be used. But here we have an opportunity of showing those gentlemen what, in our opinion, can be safely adopted, and ask them to consent to the adoption of a book such as I believe the one referred to in the honourable gentleman's motion to be. I think we shall make a great mistake if we refuse to accept this motion. By accepting it we do not commit ourselves to the matter, as the motion is carefully worded—I do not think it could be more carefully worded; and I do not think we should refuse to inquire upon such a very important subject—a subject which we know, from the petitions laid before this Parliament, has been agitating a very large and important section of the community; and we should not refuse to accept the opportunity of getting a book which may be perhaps the very means of removing a difficulty which exists in so many of our schools. In my wish to see the introduction of Bible-reading in schools, I also wish to see the present system of education retained. I believe it is a great boon to the people of the colony. But I feel it is a monstrous shame to exclude the Book which of all books is the foundation of our moral code, to which we go for our legislation, and for a knowledge, besides, of all that is right and wrong: to exclude that from our schools is simply monstrous. Do we do it here? I say No. Do we not commence our proceedings by prayer in this very Council? And why do we refuse to allow the Bible to be recognised in the schools where our children are educated? There is not one of us who, from our experience of the world, does not know the value of those passages of Scripture that are instilled into our youthful minds, whether they are grasped or not at the time, when, in times of temptation and trial, such passages of Scripture learned in our youth perhaps come to our mind and save us from destruction. We have repeated instances of this even among very hardened criminals who have been taught religion in their early days. Are we to deprive our children of this? I think not. The only question is, How are we to get over the sectarian differences? It seems to me that this book is what has solved the question at Home. Why not get it out here? and let us see whether, after examination, it may not be introduced with advantage to ourselves and our children.

The Hon. Mr. MENZIES.—I am rather surprised at this motion, seeing that my honourable friend has invariably, in bygone sessions, opposed the idea of Bible-reading in schools. He has done so systematically, and I should hardly have expected the proposal to introduce into our schools selections from that book would come from him. As to the resolution itself, it would appear to harmonize with views I have expressed on former occasions here; but the remarks of the honourable gentleman in moving the resolution do not harmonize with mine. The honourable gentleman dwelt upon the propriety of making selections from that book, and also upon the fact that the volume consisted of many books, and that some of those books contained very objectionable records. My honourable friend will not deny that the book is the Word of God, and yet, instead of desiring to see placed in the hands of school-children that Word which God himself gave to man, the honourable gentleman objects to its being so placed in the hands of any classes of the community, or of a special class of the community. He says man must make selections; man knows better than God what selections to place in the hands of children. That Word abounds in promises which are real and full, especially to that class to whom many desire to give the Bible to read. And shall any of us dare to say that we can make selections better than the mind of the Almighty as to what should be given to the children? I regret that, on a resolution of this character, I cannot so far agree with it that I should desire not to see it turned aside. I do not think it is desirable that the resolution should be passed in its present shape. It seeks to intercept what the members of this Council know very well is the desire of a large portion of the community. The honourable member has referred to the petitions which have been presented to this Council. They have come from different quarters, and from men holding different opinions; but in no case have they emanated from those who desire to see only parts of the Scriptures placed in the hands of children. Where the petitions come from other quarters the people desire to see that the teaching of the Bible shall be under the direction of their own clergy: that is the only difference. But the bulk of the petitioners do desire to have the Bible alone read in schools. We have heard in the course of this discussion—which has extended further than I anticipated—opinions expressed from opposite points of view,—from those who, like the Hon. Mr. Miller, have full confidence in Bible-teaching, and from other honourable members who distrust altogether its value and validity, who distrust its supernatural revelation, and therefore consider it a delusion. I do not think it is desirable to agree to this resolution in its present shape, seeing that it will suit no part of the community which desires to see a change, and it will frustrate the desire of those who have been the most numerous class of petitioners. I believe the community as a whole would be better satisfied if we refrained from giving any decision upon this particular resolution; and, holding that view, I shall conclude my remarks by moving “the previous question.”

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS BILL.

The Hon. Mr. STEVENS, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said that the Municipal Conference which recently sat in Wellington resolved that it was desirable that in future the Mayors of towns and boroughs should be elected by the members of the Councils from amongst their own number. The earlier clauses of this Bill were to give effect to that recommendation. A number of other clauses which followed immediately upon that were, for the most part, mere machinery clauses. In some cases they provided for a better audit and control of the expenditure of the boroughs. He did not propose to take up any time in discussing these audit-clauses, because they were mostly of a technical character, and he had no doubt honourable members would like to read them very carefully with the view of dealing with them in Committee if the clauses should require any amendment. There were certain provisions with regard to the width of streets, which, he thought, generally carried out the recommendations of the Conference. There was a special provision with regard to a part of the Borough of Napier, which he would give an explanation of in Committee. He thought the most important point, next to that of the election of Mayors, was the question of electric lighting. It had been considered that it was not desirable that there should be any difficulty in the way of Municipal Corporations in future establishing, if they thought fit, a system of electric lighting for streets and for buildings in the municipality, if they considered it was to the interest of the ratepayers to do so. This clause would give effect to that view. There were full powers given by this Bill to supply a system of electric lighting exactly in the same way as gas might be supplied by Corporations to ratepayers. Everything necessary as a matter of law for the establishment of a system of electric lighting was supplied, subject, of course, to the Electric Lines Act, which, as honourable members probably were aware, made provision for the proper control of electric wires and the system generally, and the establishment of electric lighting either by public bodies or private individuals. He did not think there were any other points of great importance to mention.

The Hon. Mr. SHRIMSKI said, although he would support the second reading of the Bill, he might just as well indicate several clauses in it to which he took strong objection. The Hon. Mr. Stevens had stated that this Bill was introduced in consequence of a conference of Mayors from different parts of the colony which had lately been held in Wellington. Because a few gentlemen who had been appointed to the office of Mayor for the time being took upon themselves to make a recommendation, it was now proposed that Parliament should revolutionise the system which had hitherto existed. He thought the colony ought to be made aware of the proposed sudden change of the election of the Mayor by the Councillors instead of by the citizens. That was his first objection. There was a very important point in the Bill to which the honourable gentleman did not refer. One section of the Bill was rather dangerous. He referred to that clause which provided that officers in the employ of a Corporation should, at the desire and will of three-fourths of the members of the Corporation, be entitled to retiring-allowances. That was a serious question, and he thought that, before the ratepayers were placed in such a position, they should be made aware of this proposed legislation. He thought the Bill ought to be read a second time, and then withdrawn, so as to let the public have an opportunity of judging on this and other important parts of the measure. Was it simply because officers had been a number of years in the service and had had very good pay that the taxpayers should be taxed further in order to make provision for them thereafter? There were many municipalities at the present day which had quite enough struggling to meet their liabilities, without having to make provision for the retiring-allowances of their officers. The Bill also contained a provision to the effect that the Councillors might, by resolution, incur the expense of coming to Wellington to interview Ministers or to attend Parliament, or something of that kind. If that were allowed they would have these municipal representatives frequently in Wellington—in fact, much oftener than Ministers would wish to see them. All that he asked of the honourable gentleman was that, as this measure proposed great changes in the constitution of municipal bodies, it should be read a second time and then dropped, so that the public might have an opportunity of saying whether they would accept it. Because a few Mayors came to Wellington and made certain recommendations, that did not prove that those recommendations were desired by the people. He thought that no tyranny should be exercised over the people because of the meeting of a few gentlemen in Wellington. If the Bill went into Committee he would oppose the section he had just referred to, but he trusted that the Bill would be withdrawn after the second reading.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS hoped this Bill would be read a second time and would be committed. He quite agreed with the Hon. Mr. Shrimski that certain clauses were very objectionable. For example, there had been no call, as far as he was aware, by the general public, or by any one except a small number of municipal representatives who had met in Wellington lately, for an alteration to be made in the mode of election of Mayors. He felt perfectly satisfied, from inquiries he had been making from representatives from different parts of the colony, that it was not a general desire that such an alteration should be made. The rate-payers wished to retain in their own hands the power of electing their Mayors; they were not willing that the election should be confined to the members of the Council, but they preferred to select the best man they could possibly get to occupy the position, whether a member of the Council or not. It was not long since Parliament passed an Act doing away with pensions to members of the Civil Service; yet by section 4 of this Bill it was provided that Corporations might grant compensation to their officers on retiring from their service. His impression was that this clause might have been inserted to meet a case in which a corporate body had made an allowance to one of its retiring officers and now found it was illegal. He might say that the Press of the locality had complained bitterly of the action of the Corporation, and the citizens held meetings on the subject. The Hon. Mr. Shrimski would know to what Corporation he referred. Then, as had been stated by the Hon. Mr. Shrimski, section 3 of the Bill provided for the payment of travelling and hotel expenses of the Mayor or any Councillors who might be deputed by the Council to attend at the seat of Government to wait on any Ministers of the Crown, or on Parliament, on any business affecting the borough. He would guarantee that, if this clause were passed, Wellington would have the benefit of frequent visits from Mayors and representatives of municipal bodies, especially when Parliament was in session. With reference to section 4, subsection (2), he thought that if an officer of any Corporation met with an accident in the actual discharge of his duty the Corporation should have the power to grant him an allowance; but, otherwise, he thought that the whole of this section could very well be done without. Section 10, he thought, would require some alteration; it was arbitrary. In the event of one powerful or wealthy body wishing to have gas passing along a road possibly dividing the district under its administration from another small borough which had enough to do to pay its way, this smaller borough would be compelled to contribute to the lighting of the roads adjoining. The objectionable clauses in the Bill might be struck out or otherwise dealt with in Committee. There were some things in the Bill which he thought were absolutely necessary, especially in these days, when there was such a desire to utilise the electric light instead of gas. Under the present law boroughs would not have the power to secure electric-lighting plant.

The Hon. Mr. SCOTLAND thought the 2nd clause was highly objectionable. The great body of the ratepayers desired to have the best men in the place for Mayor; and it was proposed in this Bill that the power of electing a Mayor should be taken out of their hands and put in those of the Council. When these municipal bodies were sitting it was almost impossible to take up the newspapers without reading an account of most disgraceful scenes and most abominable language being used. Many members of these bodies were utterly unfit to occupy the positions which they held. He would not trust the selection of a scavenger or a lamplighter to many of these men; yet the important power was to be given into their hands of choosing the Mayor, and the selection limited to their own body!

The Hon. Mr. PHARAZYN thought the objections to the Bill stated by the Hon. Mr. Scotland were really reasons why the proposed change in the election of Mayors should be made. It would be an inducement to persons of a superior class and character to become members of municipal bodies. Before the Mayors were elected by the popular vote it was always a consideration, on entering a Council, that a member might be elected Mayor. There was always an opportunity given to the man who, in the opinion of the Council, was the best man for the office of being elected Mayor by the Council, instead of that civic officer being elected by the rate-payers generally. He thought if honourable members would look back to that time they would see that members of Corporations generally were better than they were at present, and there was certainly less conflict between the Mayors and Corporations then than was often the case now. They frequently found that, in consequence of the Mayor being elected by the whole body of the people, he assumed to himself a sort of power of representing the whole community, and thought therefore that his opinion ought to be deferred to much more than would be the case if he were merely elected by the municipal body itself. They had the experience of England to guide them. The Mayors there were elected by members of the Council, and he did not see why a change had been made here. He thought it was a misfortune for the people themselves, and that public opinion was very much in favour of returning to the old system of election.

The Hon. Mr. HART thought it was unfair that notice of the proposed change in the mode of election had not been forwarded to the rate-payers of the different Corporations throughout the colony, as he believed they were ignorant of the intention to bring in a Bill of this important character. So far as he was aware, they had not had any opportunity of knowing what was to be introduced; otherwise they might have petitioned against it.

The Hon. Mr. BUCKLEY said that notice of this Bill had been given some time ago, but he was under the belief that the Bill itself only came before them on the previous day. He thought it would best suit the convenience of the Council to adjourn its consideration till the next sitting-day, so that in the meantime the Council and the public would have an opportunity of becoming acquainted with the nature of its provisions. He moved the adjournment of the debate.

The Hon. Mr. REYNOLDS did not think any object was to be gained by the adjournment of the debate. This might very well suit the convenience of the people of Wellington, but it would be of no convenience to people at a distance. It would be far better to read the Bill a second time that day.

NGATIKUIA AND RANGITANE NATIVES.

On the motion of Mr. PARATA, it was ordered, That there be laid before this House a copy of Mr. Alexander Mackay's report on the claims of the Ngatikua and Rangitane Natives to land in the Marlborough District.

NEW HEBRIDES.

Major STEWARD asked the Premier,—(1.) What steps, if any, have been taken to give effect to the recommendation of the Pacific Islands Committee in respect to the Island of Rapa and the islands of the Cook Group, as contained in the report presented on the 4th September, 1885 (see Paper I.-8, Vol. III., Appendices, House of Representatives, 1885)? (2.) In view of the settlement of the New Hebrides question which has been arrived at between the Governments of England and France, does not the Government consider that a favourable opportunity is presented for further efforts with a view to giving effect to the above-noted recommendation? (3.) If so, will the Government take steps in that direction? During the session of 1885, it would be remembered, a Committee was appointed, of which the Premier was a member, to "consider the petition from settlers and colonists of Fiji, and the general position of the Western Pacific Islands in their relation to New Zealand." That Committee brought up a report; and, after making a recommendation as to the Fijian and Samoan groups, it went on to make the following recommendation:—

"That, in view of the probable early completion of the Panama Canal, it is of the utmost importance that the Island of Rapa (Opara), which lies in the direct route of steamers between Panama and New Zealand, and also the islands of the Cook group, should be brought under British control; and that urgent representations to that effect should be made to the Imperial Government."

The matter was one of considerable importance, and he hoped that every effort had been made, and would be made, to secure this very desirable result, more especially as the difficulty with reference to the New Hebrides appeared to be removed out of the way.

Major ATKINSON replied by reading the following memorandum:—

"This matter has been continually urged on the attention of the Colonial Office, as will be seen by the correspondence laid before Parliament, A.-3 and A.-5, 1886. On the 23rd November, 1885, the Secretary of State for the Colonies informed the Governor that Her Majesty's Government had given the fullest consideration to the question of the annexation of Rapa; but it did not seem possible to acquire the island unless Her Majesty's Government should be in a position to assent to France obtaining some valuable equivalent (meaning the New Hebrides). The Secretary of State at the same time observed that the Cook group possessed, apparently, no safe harbour; but he had communicated with the Foreign Office and the Admiralty to be supplied with more detailed information. Since this nothing has been heard on the subject. In February, 1886, came the French offer to cease transportation altogether in the Pacific if allowed to have the New Hebrides, when it was suggested by the Secretary of State that the proposal might be more acceptable if Rapa were given up to England. This fell through, through the opposition of the Australian Colonies. There does not seem any likelihood of the French giving up Rapa, and it is not known whether any opposition would be given to England annexing the Cook or Hervey group, or, indeed, whether England would annex, although it has been represented to the Colonial Office that the natives are willing."

SPECIAL SETTLEMENTS.

Mr. WILSON asked the Minister of Lands, if he will make the same concession to all special settlements as was made to the Wellington and Birmingham Associations—namely, to allow married women to take up sections?

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON must answer the question in a decided negative. The concession had been made previously, but it was entirely a mistake, and contrary to the Land Act. No further similar concession would be made.

Mr. WILSON would ask the Minister if he would object to state the reasons. Was it because the Government could not do it under the Land Act?

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON said the concession that was made should never have been made. There was no right to make it.

Mr. WILSON would move the adjournment of the House. The land taken up in some cases was very rough, and the settlers found that they required more than a hundred acres. In order to extend their holdings, married women had been allowed to take up land under the special-settlement regulations, and in that way the settlers' areas had been increased. He hoped the Minister would further consider the matter. The Land Bill said that an area of a hundred acres was too small; and, if it was too small under the Land Bill, it was reasonable to assume that it was too small in these special settlements.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON said that if the question had been put in a different form he might have answered it differently. He would consider the question regarding area, and en-

TARAMARAMU SURVEY DISTRICT.

Mr. GRAHAM asked the Native Minister, Under what circumstances and by what authority 100 acres of Crown land, being portion of Section No. 111 in the Taramaramu Survey District, Wairoa County, were lately withdrawn from sale, and handed over to certain Natives in that district?

Mr. MITCHELSON, in reply, said that on the 9th October, 1875, the late Sir Donald McLean, as Native Minister, promised that Maraki Koha and Rewai Rangimataeo should have 100 acres of the Taramaramu Block. In November, 1886, it was represented to the Native Office that the Auckland Land Board had made a promise that this land should be offered for sale; and it was decided to allow the promise to be carried out, and provide the Natives with other land. It was, however, brought under the notice of the Native Department that the piece promised to the Natives was specially valued by them, as it had been the site of an old settlement and fishing-ground. It was, moreover, pointed out that the portion intended to be selected for the Natives was of inferior quality, and that no old associations were attached to it which would make it valuable to the Native mind. Under the circumstances of the case, the Native Minister—the Hon. Mr. Ballance—authorised the selection for the Natives of 100 acres of Section 111, Taramaramu. Legislation would be required before the land could be granted.

RAILWAY WORKSHOPS.

Mr. FISH asked the Minister for Public Works,—(1.) If he has perused the return laid before this House showing the value of work performed in the Government railway workshops for the two years ending the 31st March, 1887, for districts other than those in which such workshops are situate, and which return shows the value of work so performed as follows—namely, Hillside (Dunedin), £4,950; Addington (Christchurch), £44,823; Pitone (Wellington), £432 15s. 2d.; Newmarket (Auckland), £1,534 17s. 11d.? (2.) If he will explain the reason for such apparent unfairness in the distribution of works in the various districts, and if he approves of same? (3.) Will he undertake that, in the future, there shall be a fairer distribution of such works to the various districts? He had been induced to put this question on the Order Paper by having perused a return furnished on the motion of the honourable member for Auckland West, in which it was shown that the expenditure was as stated in the question. He recollected perfectly well that the Atkinson Government, when in power, made a distinct promise, and he believed it had been rigidly adhered to, that works required in various districts should be done in the workshops of those districts. But he found now, by this return, that in two years no less a sum than £45,000 had been expended in the Addington workshop in respect of work required for other districts. He had been informed that in order to do this work men had been sent from Dunedin and from Auckland, and that the work had been then sent back to the places from which the men had been taken. This state of things was most discreditable to the Government of the day.

Mr. SPEAKER said that was a matter of argument, and the introduction of argument was not allowed when members were asking questions.

Mr. FISH would then merely ask the question.

Mr. MITCHELSON said he had perused the return, and, upon inquiry, found that the reason given for such a large expenditure at Addington was that the machinery and appliances were much superior there than at other places, consequently the railway stock could be manufactured more cheaply there than elsewhere, the principal stock that was manufactured being carriages and wagons. No doubt there had been a very large sum of money expended in the erection of workshops and machinery in various parts of the colony sufficient to manufacture stock enough to supply three countries as large as this; but, seeing that the shops had been established in various towns in the colony, it was only right that all stock that was required in each district where shops had been established should be there manufactured, if the appliances would admit of it. This question should, no doubt, have been carefully considered by the Government before consenting to such a large outlay. He would carry out the promise made in replying to the question upon the same subject some days ago by the honourable member for Auckland West—namely, to give instructions that all stock should be made in the districts where required, provided that it could be done without having to provide extra machinery. By giving effect to that promise it would most probably mean that a large quantity of machinery would remain idle in some of the shops.

MASTERTON-EKETAHUNA TELEPHONE.

Mr. SMITH asked the Postmaster-General, If he will have the telephonic communication between Masterton and Eketahuna via Mangamahoe completed at an early date? He would point out that the railway-line to Eketahuna would be finished within a reasonable time. It was necessary that this wire should be stretched, and, if it were done at once, he believed it would pay interest upon the cost.

Major ATKINSON said the matter should be inquired into and, if possible, done; but he could not give any positive pledge until he knew what the railway authorities were doing in the matter.

KAIAPOI CADET CORPS.

Mr. E. RICHARDSON asked the Minister of Defence, Whether the department will be prepared to supply the Kaiapoi Rifle Cadet Corps with suitable carbines? He had been requested to ask this question. He believed the oldest cadet corps was at Kaiapoi, and the members felt aggrieved that they had not been supplied with carbines in the same proportion as some of the younger corps.

Mr. FERGUS regretted that there were no carbines available at present. He was informed, however, that some Enfields were being converted into carbines, and when this was done he would take care that the Kaiapoi corps was supplied.

NORTH OF AUCKLAND ROADS.

Mr. R. THOMPSON asked the Minister for Public Works, If it is his intention to make provision for roadworks north of Auckland, in districts where there are no railways?

Mr. MITCHELSON replied that the Government did not intend to place any sum upon the estimates this year for roads north of Auckland.

PAEROA REGISTRAR OF BIRTHS.

Mr. CADMAN asked the Colonial Secretary, If, in view of the growing requirements of the Ohinemuri district, he will make arrangements to appoint a Registrar of Births, Deaths, and Marriages at Paeroa? He knew that the department, as a rule, objected to these appointments; but he thought the Minister would recognise that the growth of the Ohinemuri district had been such as to make this necessary, and that the distance to the nearest Registrar's Office was too great. He trusted the request would be granted, more especially as he was informed that the County Clerk was willing to perform the duty.

Mr. HISLOP replied that arrangements would be made if the fees were sufficient for the purpose.

MIDDLE ISLAND HALF-CASTE CLAIMS.

Major STEWARD asked the Native Minister, When he proposes to introduce a Bill to provide for the settlement of the land claims of Middle Island half-castes? The Minister, in answer to a question early in the session, had intimated that it was his intention to bring in a Bill. The session was drawing near its close, and no Bill had yet made its appearance on the Order Paper. He should like to hear from the Minister whether it would be proceeded with this year.

Mr. MITCHELSON said it was true he promised to introduce a Bill this session; but since then he found that claims were continually coming in, and Mr. Commissioner Mackay thought it would be advisable to hold the question over until next session; otherwise there would be a necessity for bringing in a second Bill. If there was any finality about the matter, a Bill might be brought in before the close of the session.

Major STEWARD.—It may be depended upon that a Bill will be brought in next session?

Mr. MITCHELSON.—Yes.

"UNEMPLOYED."

Mr. GOLDIE asked the Minister for Public Works, Whether there are any "unemployed" at present engaged on relief-works; if there are, how many, and in what districts are such persons employed?

Mr. MITCHELSON said that, unfortunately, there was a large number of men out of employment in the country, and it was necessary that work to a certain extent should be provided for them. He had a list in his hand showing the number of men employed, and specifying the locality and class of work that they were engaged upon, which he would, for the information of honourable members, lay upon the table. Those words marked with an asterisk were those which were considered purely relief-works:—

"The following is a list of the works on which 'unemployed' are engaged, and the number of men in each case who were at work last Monday:—

SOUTH ISLAND NATIVE RESERVES.

Mr. PARATA asked the Government, When the new Bill relating to South Island Native reserves, which appears on the Order Paper, will be placed in the hands of members? He wished to make an explanation. His reason for asking the question was this: The notice of this Bill had appeared on the Order Paper for a considerable time, and he was anxious the Bill should be circulated, in order to be translated, so that the Natives affected by it should have an opportunity of studying it. Now, the time remaining this session was so short that the Natives had no opportunity of becoming acquainted with the Bill. Therefore it ought to be postponed until next session. This was a very important matter. It affected the Natives in that district very deeply, and it seemed to him to be wrong that an important measure like this should be hurried through the House without giving the people affected by it an opportunity of becoming cognisant of its provisions. This Bill was different in some respects from the Bill brought before the House last session. He hoped the honourable gentleman in charge of the measure would not be offended at the suggestion he was making.

Major ATKINSON said the Bill was distributed yesterday. It was, he believed, translated, and ought to be in the hands of the honourable member. He quite agreed with the honourable member that an important Bill should not be hurried through the House; but this Bill was the same as that brought in last session, with the exception that, instead of four or five valuers, it was proposed to appoint only two. Under the Bill of last session the expense of valuation to the Natives was very great, and the alteration was made in the interests of the parties concerned, inasmuch as it would reduce the expense. In all other respects the Bill was the same, and it would be necessary to pass it this session, as great injustice was being done both to the Natives and to Europeans.

MAORI HILL POSTAL DELIVERY.

Mr. ROSS asked the Postmaster-General, If he will take steps to expedite the delivery of letters in the Borough of Maori Hill; and if he will afford greater facilities for posting letters and newspapers in that borough? The residents of Maori Hill, which was a very populous suburb, complained that there was only one postal delivery in the day, that frequently taking place not before one o'clock in the afternoon, and sometimes not until two, and often not till three and four o'clock. Letters arriving in Dunedin by steamer early on any morning were not delivered at Maori Hill until the afternoon of the following day. There was a further complaint that there was no post-office or pillar-box in the district, and that in order to post their letters people had to go either to Roslyn or to Dunedin. This might be remedied at little or no expense by having a receiving-box attached to some convenient place; and the postman, while delivering letters, might clear this box without any additional expense to the department. He hoped the Minister would give a favourable reply to his question.

Major ATKINSON said inquiries would be made, and if it were found that what the honourable gentleman wanted could be done it would be done. He should feel obliged if the honourable gentleman would supply the department with the information at his disposal on the subject.

WIREMU TE AHO AND OTHERS.

Mr. TAIPUA asked the Government, What steps they intend to take in the matter of the petition of Wiremu te Aho and others, which was reported upon by the Native Affairs Committee during the session of 1886? In asking this question it would be necessary for him to make an explanation. His question referred to some land that was set apart for the Ngatitipa Tribe. It was set apart by the Government for the loyal Ngatitipa Natives on account of their taking part in the war. When the Crown grant for this land was issued the lands were Crown-granted to Waata Kukutai and Nini. Now, the people for whom the land was set apart were left out of the grant, and a great injustice had therefore been done them. They asked Mr. Fenton to give some explanation of the matter. Mr. Fenton, who was a Judge of the Native Land Court at the time the land was Crown-granted, wrote to these people a letter, stating that the land was set apart for the whole tribe. Last year, when the Native Affairs Committee inquired into this matter, Mr. Fenton's letter was produced before the Committee. The present position was this: Many of these people were living on the land and occupying it, but had no right there unless they were put in the Crown grant. He hoped the Government would be able to give him a favourable answer. He thought it would be admitted that a wrong had been done these people.

Mr. MITCHELSON said the circumstances in connection with this case had been forwarded to the Government Agent, at Waikato, and he had not yet supplied a report. As soon as his report was received the Government would consider it very carefully. They had received a communication from the agent stating that he would at once make inquiries and report, and in that letter he stated that, up to the time of writing, he had not met with Hori Kukutai, one of the Natives whose names were in the Crown grant. He would let the honourable gentleman know the decision of the Government in the matter as soon as the Government were placed in possession of the report and had time to consider it.

Mr. HAMLIN said if the Minister wrote to Mr. C. Marshall, at Port Waikato, they would get all the information they wanted on the subject. That gentleman was directly on the spot and knew the whole circumstances of the case. He believed, too, that the letters written by Mr. Dickie and Mr. Fenton were in Wellington and could be seen. It was fully shown to the Native Affairs Committee that this land was intended for sixty Natives who had served the colony as Volunteers, and the land was granted to them as a reward for their faithful services.

Mr. MITCHELSON said the information supplied to him was to the effect that there was not sufficient information in Wellington to enable a decision to be arrived at.

ENGINEERS ON FOREIGN STEAMERS.

Mr. SEDDON asked the Minister of Marine, —(1.) Is he aware that foreign-owned steamers have for some time been plying to and from New Zealand ports solely without having on board the number of certificated engineers as required by law? (2.) If, on inquiry, it is found that unqualified persons are engaged and acting in the capacity of engineers on board the said vessels, will the Minister take the necessary steps to have the law complied with, and penalties imposed for the infringement thereof? His attention had been called to the fact that on one or two steamers engaged in the West Coast coal trade, which were foreign-owned vessels under charter, there were uncertificated engineers. Seeing that these vessels carried passengers, and in the interest of the trade to which he belonged, and seeing the law was infringed, it was only right that the Government should make inquiries and insist on compliance with the law. He did not see why an exception should be made in the case of foreigners, especially as machinery was provided by which these engineers could easily obtain certificates.

Mr. FISHER said the law only required that the chief engineer should pass an examination under the regulations, and, of course, that was insisted on. Information had been sought as to what was the custom in regard to examinations in Germany and other places, and the German Vice-Consul had stated that in Germany engineers of any nationality were allowed to be examined in their own language; and it would be rather hard to make a foreign engineer pass an examination in English in New Zealand. There was only one vessel to which the honourable gentleman's question could apply. Our regulations rendered it necessary that the examination should be in English, and the chief engineer of the steamer referred to could not speak a word of English. There was a conflict between the Customs Regulations of New Zealand and Germany in this respect, and this officer had not yet been examined. As soon as further information, which the department was seeking, had been obtained it would be decided what to do in this case.

TEREMAKAU RAILWAY BRIDGE.

Mr. SEDDON asked the Minister for Public Works, —(1.) What progress is being made with the erection of the bridge across the Teremakau River on the Grey-Hokitika Railway? (2.) What is the date fixed for the completion of such bridge, and is fair progress consonant with such period for completion being made? (3.) What are the penalties provided in case of non-completion of contract within contract time? It was some months since the contract had been let, but when he left the district for Wellington nothing had been done in connection with the work on the proposed site. It was only fair to the district and to the public generally that contractors should be kept to the specified time, and he therefore asked for this information.

Mr. MITCHELSON said, beyond ordering the materials from England, and other preliminary work, nothing had yet been done to the bridge. The date for the arrival of the ironwork in the colony, as fixed by the contract, was the 18th December. The date for the completion of the bridge was the 18th March, 1889, and, as above shown, the progress made was in accordance with the contract. The penalty was £15 per week.

Mr. TAYLOR asked if the ironwork could not have been got in the colony. Was that the cause of the delay?

Mr. MITCHELSON said he had not looked at the specifications; so he could not say. The contract was let before he took office. His predecessor (Mr. E. Richardson) would perhaps be able to reply to the question.

Mr. Taiapu

Mr. E. RICHARDSON said the contract provided that all the ironwork should be manufactured in the colony, only the raw material being imported.

ARAHURA RAILWAY BRIDGE.

Mr. SEDDON asked the Minister for Public Works, Whether he will, in accordance with the wishes of the Westland County Council, have the railway bridge across the Arahura River altered, so as to make it available for dray-traffic, provided the Westland County Council defray the expense of such alteration? The bridge was so made that it could be easily planked so as to allow of dray and foot-passenger traffic as well as the railway. The present traffic bridge lower down the river was made sixteen or seventeen years ago, and was now very shaky. To renew it would cost about £20,000, which the local body had not at its command. The river was changing, and the old bridge was so decayed that it would soon be unsafe. The late Government had stated that they could not allow the new railway bridge to be used for dray-traffic on account of the expense; but that difficulty might be got over by the County Council defraying the additional cost, for which, however, a slight alteration of the law was necessary, as it could not now legally be done. As the railway traffic would not be large, there could be no danger to life or property by allowing the bridge to be used for dray-traffic as well.

Mr. MITCHELSON said the Government did not see their way to incur the expense of making this bridge a combined one, as the cost would, he understood, be about £2,000. Seeing that the bridge was so conveniently situated for ordinary traffic, the Government offered no objection to the county doing the work at its own cost; but he understood that the county had no legal power that would permit it to undertake the work.

Mr. SEDDON asked, as it would be impossible for a private member to get a Bill passed this session for the necessary alteration of the law, would the Government bring in a Bill for the purpose?

Mr. MITCHELSON said he would consider the matter.

AUCKLAND MINING COMPANIES.

Mr. SEDDON asked the Minister of Mines,—(1.) Why the law as to furnishing and publishing the half-yearly statements by mining companies in the Auckland Mining District has not been complied with, and more particularly the Union Company, Waihi? (2.) Will the Minister take steps to compel defaulting companies to conform with the law, or otherwise inflict the penalties provided? He had received a letter from a party interested in some mines, and who resided in Wellington, and represented a number of Wellington shareholders, saying that there had been a clear evasion of the law in the non-publication of these statements. In the interest of the mining industry and of mining investors it was absolutely necessary that the law in this respect should be complied with.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON said many of the mining companies in the Auckland District had complied with the provisions of the Mining Act in this respect, but the Union Company, Waihi, had neglected to do so. The Inspector at Te Aroha had been instructed to take the proper steps to enforce compliance with the law.

CHINESE.

Mr. SEDDON asked the Government, Whether they will cause inquiries to be made as to the truth or otherwise of the rumour that a large number of young girls are in the habit of frequenting, for immoral purposes, the Chinese quarters in Wellington and other large cities in the colony? (2.) Will the Government cause strict inquiry to be made into the sanitary condition of the Chinese quarters in Wellington and the other large cities in the colony? (3.) Will the Government take precautionary measures to have strict supervision kept of all vessels arriving at the various ports in the colony which have on board Chinese sailors or passengers, with a view of preventing evasion of "The Chinese Immigrants Act, 1881"? He had information from a reliable source that what was stated in the first part of the question was correct, and the Minister could easily verify it by a question to the detective department. As to the second part of the question, it was of course to the interest of the colony to see that proper sanitary conditions were maintained among the Chinese here. As to the third part of the question, he was informed, and he also could state it from his own knowledge, that when vessels with Chinese sailors arrived the crew were allowed to mix freely with the Chinese on shore, no supervision apparently being exercised, and the consequence was a great risk of the law being evaded, which provided that a poll-tax of £10 should be paid by every Chinaman remaining in the country.

Mr. FERGUS said his attention had been directed to the subject of the first part of the question some time ago by a letter written by the honourable member for Thorndon, but, from information at his disposal, he found that the number of girls was not nearly so large as the wording of the question might suggest. The police had no power to interfere unless a complaint was lodged by the parents or guardians of the girls. As to the sanitary condition of the Chinese quarters, that was a matter which pertained more especially to the municipal authorities; but he would issue instructions to the police to see whether those quarters were in a sanitary condition. As to the third part of the question, he was informed by the Minister of Marine that the supervision was sufficient to prevent the landing of Chinese sailors in the colony without paying the poll-tax; but inquiries should be made, and, if necessary, instructions should be issued that a still stricter supervision should be exercised, if that were possible.

LEGISLATIVE EXPENDITURE.

Mr. O'CONOR asked the Premier, Whether, in connection with the proposed readjustment of the Civil Service, the Government will adopt clause 9 of the recommendations made by the Legislative Expenditure Committee of 1886, to wit, "That Government should be directly responsible for all parliamentary expenditure, and that all officers should be under the direct control of Government"? The Committee had made several proposals which had been very well entertained by the House, and the proposals of the Government showed that effect would more or less be given to them. But there was one very important clause in the Committee's report as to which they had received no intimation from the Government, and it was to this that his question was directed. He hoped the honourable gentleman would be able to give a satisfactory answer, as the Committee had been unanimous in this recommendation, and were very desirous that it should be given effect to.

Major ATKINSON said he was not able to give the honourable gentleman a positive answer that day, but when the estimates came on he would explain the position the Government proposed to take up in the matter.

AUDITING LOCAL BODIES' ACCOUNTS.

Mr. O'CONOR asked the Premier, Whether the Government will, during the recess, inquire into the efficiency of the audit system as now established in regard to the accounts of the local governing bodies, with a view to making the audit more efficient in preventing illegal expenditure? It had come to his knowledge on several occasions that the system of audit of local bodies' accounts was not such as would check illegal expenditure. The Audit officers were generally satisfied if they found a voucher corresponding with the payment, and some authority under which the payment was made. His opinion was that the Audit officer should go much further, and ascertain whether the payments were legal or not. He knew of several instances where the funds of public bodies had been expended improperly, and yet they had passed the audit, though the payments were in defiance of the law. He thought the audit system should absolutely prevent illegal expenditure, or it was simply a farce.

Major ATKINSON said the honourable gentleman was quite right—the audit of local bodies' accounts was far from satisfactory in many cases. He had prepared a Bill on the question, but he was afraid it would be impossible to get it passed this session. He had some hope yet that it might be, and the Audit Office was anxious that it should be passed; but he was afraid that the time at their disposal would not allow of it.

MIDLAND RAILWAY.

Sir G. GREY.—Before proceeding to the orders of the day I should like to ask the Premier a question. A return was laid on the table the other day, in answer to a motion which I made, which purported to give a return of the lands north of the Rakaiā which it was proposed to give to the Midland Railway Company, and it was only this morning that I ascertained that there is every reason to believe that this is an exceedingly imperfect return—that one great tract of country has been omitted from it. I think that is a most important thing, and, if such is the case, I presume the Government will not go on further with this railway question until we have a complete return. I believe that this land has been omitted, and that that will cause very considerable difficulty.

Major ATKINSON.—The Government do propose to go on with the consideration of the amendments made by the Legislative Council in the contract, and I shall ask the House to agree to them. I am very sorry if this return is incorrect, and will, of course, make full inquiry. It is a return about which there has been some difficulty. It was made out originally by the last Government, and was lost, and no copy was retained of it. I understand that was the cause of the delay in supplying the return. The information was supplied by telegram from the officer in Christchurch, and it was supposed to be correct. The honourable gentleman was a member of the Committee which sat for a very long time over this question, and, if it was necessary to inquire into this particular block, that was the time for him to have brought it up. I cannot see that that would in any way alter the judgment of the House, and therefore I propose to go on with the motion.

Mr. TURNBULL.—This is rather a serious question, because when an honourable member asks for a return it ought to be a faithful one. Unfortunately this is not the only instance, for there was the return with respect to the property-tax, which was laid on the table and had to be taken back because it was incorrect. It is a very serious matter, when a Minister is asked for a return and he lays it on the table with the impress of his name, that it should be unreliable. Perhaps the honourable gentleman could tell us the acreage of this block and the rental, for that is one of the most important matters in connection with this land which is omitted from the return.

Major ATKINSON.—I am not prepared to admit that any land has been omitted from the return; and, in the case of the other return to which the honourable gentleman alluded, it is not admitted by the department that it is wrong. I will, of course, cause search to be made, but honourable members must understand that unless sufficient time is given for making up these returns there is possibility of error. The departments are anxious to supply the information because honourable members desire it, and if the returns have to be made up hastily there is possibility of error. Of course, if ample time is given for making out the returns and a department fails to furnish them correctly, the Government would have to take serious notice of the matter.

Sir G. GREY.—I move the adjournment of the House. I have to say that the answer of the Premier has been evasive and not satisfactory. I believe that a very large quantity of land, I cannot say how much, has been omitted from this return. I believe that the honourable gentleman knows this, and that he could immediately have correct information given to the House. There should be some person here capable of saying what are the causes which led to the omission.

Major ATKINSON.—The honourable member has not proved that there is anything omitted. I do not admit that anything is omitted.

Sir G. GREY.—That, I must say, is not an answer which the Premier should make on a grave question of this kind. It is a question which will affect two and a half million acres of land, and throw an immense debt on the people, on which they will have to pay both principal and interest; and I think we have a right to be told distinctly what is the reason why this return is not correct. Either let it be affirmed that it is correct, or let us be given all the information possible why it is not correct. If it is incorrect, that fact has been kept back from the House.

Major ATKINSON.—Yes, by the honourable gentleman himself, who is the only one who appears to know it.

Sir G. GREY.—That is a remark which the honourable gentleman should not make. I distinctly stated that I knew nothing about it till this morning.

Major ATKINSON.—I knew nothing about it till the honourable gentleman mentioned it just now.

Sir G. GREY.—I say, if the Government know this to be a wrong return, the House should at once be informed of it, and a correct return be laid on the table of the Legislative Council; and they should not have been led to carry on the business connected with so vast a transaction in ignorance of the quantity of land to be given to this company.

Major ATKINSON.—I quite agree with the honourable gentleman.

Sir G. GREY.—I say we should have that before us before we proceed with this particular business; and I ask to have that information given to myself and to the House, and then we shall be able to resolve on the course which it is necessary to pursue. I think the Premier has not met me fairly on the question. He tried to laugh it down, and spoke in a very unpleasant way, and his answer was not suited to the gravity of the occasion.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON.—I think I can explain the matter satisfactorily. I do not think there is anything incorrect in the return laid upon the table. But, apparently, from what the honourable gentleman told me to-day, he expected the return to contain more information than it does contain. The return gives accurately the areas opposite the names of the pastoral tenants and the rents they pay, so far as regards lands held within the area which has been selected by the Midland Railway Company; but, apparently, the honourable member for Auckland Central wished that the pastoral leases in Nelson and Marlborough should also be included. When the return was laid on the table I supposed that it covered all that the honourable gentleman wished to know. There was considerable urgency in getting it laid on the table, and the information that was laid on the table was apparently correct — perfectly correct to the extent I have stated; but, if a further return of the pastoral land held in Nelson and Marlborough is required, I will give instructions to have it added, though I may say that it does not bear on the question of the Midland Railway.

Sir G. GREY.—Will the honourable gentleman state when he knew that the return was not complete?

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON.—It is complete so far as I understood what was asked for. After the return had been laid upon the table it was mentioned to me by one of the officers of the department that it did not include the Nelson runs; but I said that I thought it was all right. It was only to-day that I understood that the honourable gentleman laid stress upon obtaining this additional information. However, the further information shall be obtained at once, and a supplementary return laid on the table.

Mr. SAMUEL.—Do I rightly understand that the present return does not include all the leases within the authorised area as provided for in the contract?

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON.—I am not quite sure upon that point. I think there are runs in the Nelson District not included; but it includes all areas of pastoral land within the land selected.

Sir G. GREY.—The return purports to be a return of all land which it is proposed to hand over to the Midland Railway Company, and not of land selected by the Railway Company. There is a play upon words there that ought not to have been made. This return is not that which was asked for; it is not the return which it declares itself to be.

Mr. SAMUEL.—I think that the honourable member for Auckland Central is perhaps as indefinite in his words as the Minister of Lands. The authorised area, as mentioned in the contract, does not purport to be land which we propose to hand over to the company, but rather land within which they may select.

Major ATKINSON.—I understand now that there is no error in the return. Of course I have had nothing to do with the return, for I have had plenty else to do; but the return, as I understand, includes the whole of the pastoral land included in the 2,804,000 acres selected by the company, but does not include the pastoral land within the authorised area. That is a very reasonable mistake to have occurred, owing to the inaccuracy of the language used by the honourable gentleman himself. There was no desire on the part of the Government to keep back information. If the honourable gentleman had only done his duty, as directed by the House, and served on the Committee, he could have had full information upon this and every other subject. His remark as to my unpleasant voice and disagreeable manner was not called for. The honourable gentleman wanted the House to believe that I had put a cooked return upon the table. The honourable gentleman evidently wished the House to believe that something of the kind has been attempted. I do hope the House will not defer the consideration of this matter for the production of such a return as this, which cannot possibly affect the question.

Mr. GRIMMOND.—If the area marked green on the map is supposed to cover all the runs, I must say it does not do so. There are, to my knowledge, several runs in Westland which are not included.

Sir G. GREY.—I wish to say, in reply, that I think the House cannot require an honourable member to serve on a Committee when he knows he cannot be of any use, and ask him to sit there for several days to no purpose, and to give the authority of his name and presence to resolutions over which he can exercise no influence. That would be unreasonable, and certainly, unless under duress, I shall not attempt to fulfil such a duty. Then, I submit that this is not a correct return; and I believe that the Government must have known for some time that it was not a correct return. I cannot see how it could have escaped their notice that it was not correct. And I say that this House and the Legislative Council and the whole country have a right to be in the possession of the information which the motion for this return called for, as I believe, in my own mind, that a great crime is about to be committed in taking this land away from the people of New Zealand in the manner in which it is proposed to be taken. It is a very serious thing, and I believe that the Home Government would interfere if they knew of the wrong which is being done. I think we ought not to proceed further with this matter until we have this additional information. It ought to be supplied in a short time. It might be in our hands this evening. And I believe that it is indelicate that persons interested in lands which they may possibly purchase from the colony on easy terms should sit, or vote, or take any part in the proceedings in this House in reference to this matter—especially vote. I think we have a right thoroughly to understand our position and to possess that information which I ask for, and which has certainly not been laid on the table of the House, though ordered to be so laid. It is possible that, unless we are very careful, large sums of money may be demanded as compensation in reference to these lands. I therefore ask for that information before we go further. If the Government will not give it I can move for it in the House, and certainly I will raise my voice against going on with this matter until we have this information.

Motion for adjournment negatived.

Major ATKINSON.—I now beg to move, That this House doth concur in the amendment made by the Legislative Council in clause 3 of the proposed contract with the Midland Railway Company. I may say that the addition made to that clause is in the shape of words which will put it beyond all doubt that no claim can be made against the colony by the company outside the power to select land within the authorised area. The words are the same in their nature as those proposed to be added by the honourable member for Dunedin West when this matter was previously before us. This House did not agree with those words, but the Legislative Council has considered it wise to make the matter quite clear, and the Government recommend that the amendment be agreed to.

Sir G. GREY.—I move, That the further consideration of this matter be deferred until a complete return, such as was ordered by the House, is laid upon the table of the House—that is, a return of the runs, the names of the occupiers of such runs, and the rents paid by them within the area within which the company is authorised to select its land—not a return of the land that it has selected, but a return of all the lands to the north of the Rakaiā which it is authorised to select from. I think I am justified in asking for that, because the House has admitted the necessity for it by ordering the return; and I submit that a breach of privilege has been committed by making a wrong return to the House, and by refraining, as soon as the Government knew they had made a wrong return, from acquainting the House with that fact and supplying the additional information. I regard this as one of the most serious questions that have ever arisen in New Zealand, because this great extent of land which is about to be given to the company, two and a half millions of acres, is at the present moment a portion of the security that we have given for payment of our debts. The sum of money to be yielded by the sale of that land, at least £1,250,000, would pay off so much of our debt. Virtually, therefore, it is contracting a new debt of £1,250,000, the payment of which, capital and interest, is to be thrown upon the mass of the people of New Zealand. There can be no doubt that a new debt to the amount of £2 per head is being thrown upon every man, woman, and child in the Colony of New Zealand at the present time. Not only is that done, but this grievance is added, in my mind: that the land is being taken away for ever. And why is it taken away? It is taken away to enable the company to raise money to construct a railway; and when that railway is constructed it is to be the property of the company to which that land has been given. That is a thing that we can do ourselves as a Government as well as this foreign company. I say "foreign," because, although some gentlemen in the colony are interested in it—I believe some men are highly interested in it, even on the chance of getting their runs at a low rate from the company, and expect to make a considerable profit out of it—as I say, all that the company is to do we could have done ourselves; but, more than that, I say the very workmen who are to be put to work upon the railroad to construct it, who are to be put upon their own land, and to be paid for executing a work which shall give a great value to their land, and which is to pass from them when it is completed—I say the very workmen who are to lose for ever the property of themselves and their descendants, and to be subjected to the degradation of selling their birthright for a single job, might have been put in the position of this company, and have been allowed to manage it themselves, and to obtain all the advantages which we are about to give to foreigners. The more I reflect upon this, the more I have felt it is one of the most cruel things I have ever known done. What will be the result of all this? The men who are put to work on this railway are paid for their work on it, and they lose their land for ever; for, having received that payment for their work, they have to pay the new debt—£1,250,000—I have spoken of for which that land is supposed to find the funds. That debt and the payment of the interest on it are thrown upon them and upon their children, and they must hereafter become the tenants of the persons to whom this land goes. That is their probable fate. The House will be told, as we were told before, that these are benevolent gentlemen, and that they will do so-and-so. I say that some of them are not benevolent gentlemen. They have had large tracts of land already for something like thirty years in their possession; and, as far as I know, they have not offered any of their land to any other persons. Well, this country we are giving away is half the size of Wales. It would certainly carry from three hundred to four hundred thousand people, perhaps even many more than that, judging from other countries of a similar character; and these people must for ever, in my belief, be the tenants of the persons to whom this land is to be given. This will completely change the character of the future population of that country. I feel troubled in speaking upon this, because my sentiments upon the subject are so wounded and hurt by what I conceive to be such a grievous transaction that I quite dread to contemplate it. Then, I cannot help feeling in my own mind—I may be wrong, but I do not think it has been fairly done. I am certain that many of us would have had nothing to do with putting that Government upon those benches if we had known this. I could not have believed it. We have the admission made by several honourable members that if this new proposal had not been made the company would have fallen through, which is thought to be a serious disaster by those whose wishes carry them in the direction of wishing this thing to be done, but which to me would appear the greatest blessing to the people of this country. I had hoped in that way that the whole thing was got rid of; but here we have submitted ourselves to a Government who, I think, treat us very badly after the action that we took in reference to themselves. I believe, as I say, that nothing worse than this has ever been done. I declare that if I were a workman with a family and out of work, if I had companions similarly situated, I would join with them in refusing to go to work on that railway, and I should have a certain knowledge that the Government would be compelled to support us from their funds. I would say I would rather starve than injure my fellow-workmen and all the poor of this country by taking these vast tracts of land from them for ever and subjecting them, as I say, to the probable destiny of being rack-rented tenants on the very soil that had been their own. Unhesitatingly I would take that course, and I believe my feelings are so strong upon the subject that I would rather die of want than help to injure my fellow-men in New Zealand. That would be my feeling, and I am certain that at last, if acts of cruelty of this kind do go on—for such I believe them to be—the attention of Great Britain will be drawn to the subject, and that some power will come in to insist upon justice being done. If we are compelled by the Government at Home to live under a Constitution which enables this sort of thing to be done, I ask, ought they not to repeal it? What can our future possibly be? How can men pay debt after debt in this way heaped upon them? We have had thrown upon us the debts of the district railways, and now we are to have this further debt of £1,250,000 thrown upon the people of New Zealand, and further taxation for interest upon it. Why not let us do all the proposed work ourselves? We have still time to drop the measure before us. We have still time to say to the company, "We are bound to you by a certain contract, and that we will faithfully carry out, but further than that we will not travel." What right have the Government, without the country knowing that a thing of this kind was to be done, to force this on? I say that the taking of land from the people in this way is a question which would justify another dissolution. Let the people of the country be appealed to. I am sure that from one end of New Zealand to the other they would return members who would not assent to such a deed as this being performed. I felt confident to-day, when I entered this House, that as soon as I pointed out that the House had been acting upon a wrong return—a return leading us astray—we should have the proper information given to us, and time afforded to all to consider it. I believe that when the Minister of Lands stood up he might have told us the exact number of acres that had been left out of the return, the exact number of persons that had been left out of it, and the exact amount of rental left out of it. I believe he was in possession of the whole of that information; and not a single word has been uttered about it. The Legislative Council have also been allowed to conduct all their proceedings without knowing that the Government had laid a wrong return upon the table, and that this information was withheld from them, as it has been withheld from us. I therefore move, as an amendment, That this House proceed no further with this question until a full and complete return has been laid upon the table.

Major ATKINSON.—As a Bill will have to come before us authorising the Government to sign this contract, the Government will see that the return is on the table some time before that Bill comes on for consideration; and then, Sir, if the House is made to alter its opinion by the return, or by the honourable gentleman's eloquence, of course it will have an opportunity of doing so. In the meantime we may as well get on with the work.

Mr. LEVESTAM. — It appears to me that the argument brought forward by the honourable gentleman does not bear at all on the question, which is simply this: The Legislative Council have introduced an amendment which will make it absolutely certain that the company shall not be entitled to any money-compensation, or to any land outside the prescribed area. It has nothing whatever to do with the question the honourable gentleman has spoken of; and I cannot understand why he should have made the speech he has done, seeing that it has no bearing on the subject. I trust the House will agree to the motion.

Mr. MOSS. — I second the amendment of the honourable member for Auckland Central, because from the first I have held that the House is not in possession of information which it ought to possess to come to a sound determination upon this great question. Sir, I believe it is the haste with which we legislate that has been at the bottom of most of our troubles in New Zealand. We are satisfied with one honourable gentleman getting up and telling us that the land is not worth 6d. an acre, and another telling us that some of it is worth £10 an acre. That is the style of information upon which we have passed a great Bill of this kind; and that was a sufficient reason for voting against it. I am not going into the merits of the question; but I wanted to ask the Premier whether I understood him correctly just now, that there would be nothing binding done under this agreement until the information which it is proposed to lay upon the table is laid upon the table. I understood from the Premier, when he spoke on a recent evening, that what we are doing now is absolutely binding. I understood that the Bill to come before us was merely to ratify what we are now doing, and that in the meantime the Government will act on this resolution, and, if so, we shall be bound in honour to pass such an Act. Of what avail will it be to have the information laid on the table at a future date? I think that an important point; and I think also the Premier will feel that, although we are a small number, he owes us a duty quite as much as he owes a duty to those honourable gentlemen who are at his back. He will feel that he should not in any high-handed manner seek to bear down those honourable members who are aiming only to do what they consider their duty, as much as those honourable members who are at his back consider what they do to be theirs. I know that Premiers in this House have adopted this course in past times, and have thought that no consideration was due to those who opposed them, but only to those who gave them their support. I may hope the present Premier will not pursue that course, but will feel that, however small in numbers we may be, it is our duty to protect the interests of the country in the light in which we regard them. I hope, therefore, that the Premier will state clearly whether the contract we are agreeing to is a matter merely of form, and that we shall be free to accept or refuse the Bill which is to give it legality when that Bill comes before us. I should be very glad to have that important point made quite clear. My impression is that when the Bill comes down the contract will have been signed, and that the House will be bound in honour to pass the Bill.

Mr. FISH. — I am surprised that the objection raised by the honourable member for Auckland Central should be raised on the present occasion. If there could be the slightest good result gained, or any chance of the House going in an opposite direction to what it has done by having the information before the House, there would be some reason for his request; but, as far as I can gather from his remarks and the meaning of the House, the information in the detailed form he requires will make no difference whatever in the decision the House will come to. The honourable member for Parnell must know that the House, having ratified this course, or the amendment which is now sought to be made in the agreement sent here, will naturally be bound in honour to pass the Act to give legal form and effect to this resolution. When honourable members see so large a majority in favour of such a course, what is the use of their trying to force their own individual will against the will of the House? I could understand their fighting for a principle, but, when that principle has been decided, it appears to me to be presumptuous on the part of any honourable member to delay business in attempting to get that which he cannot possibly obtain. The honourable member for Auckland Central deserves every credit as a friend of the democracy, but I can hardly understand him when he says that a question like this should be interfered with by the Imperial Government. The tenor of the honourable gentleman's remarks from time to time has been in the direction of resenting any interference in colonial affairs on the part of the Imperial Government; yet he says on this occasion that he is sorry the Imperial Government cannot interfere with this matter, and he feels sure that if they knew the great wrong that is going to be inflicted upon New Zealand they would do so. Those views are entirely inconsistent with what the honourable gentleman has often before said about any interference by the Imperial Government. In so far as I can see, no wrong is going to be inflicted upon New Zealand at all, particularly in relation to the circumstances of the colony at the present time. I think the scheme now before the House will go a long way in conferring a great good on New Zealand. Whether certain lands within this area are owned by persons interested in this syndicate appears to me to be entirely beside the question. Whether it be so or not appears to me to have no relation whatever to the business we are discussing, and that is whether, as a wise or a politic thing, we should encourage the construction of this railway in the way in which the House has determined by a large majority to do it. The matter was in the House last Parliament. It was carried then in a somewhat different form; and has been carried again this session by a large majority. I would say, with all respect, that it is time the proceedings were allowed to go through without further discussion.

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—There is one aspect of this matter which probably the Premier will inform the House in reference to. It is proposed, I understand, to prepare a new contract and give it legislative force. Supposing the company does not agree to that, what is the position? Is the matter to be tied up until next session? Have we any knowledge that the Act which will receive legislative force will be accepted by the company?—because, if not, it seems to me we are adopting a very one-sided course, and one that will not in any way solve the difficulty that at present exists. No doubt the Premier will be able to inform the House on this question. I was somewhat struck with the tenor of the Premier's remarks with reference to this amendment. He seemed, impliedly, to reflect on the Legislative Council for introducing words which he did not think were necessary. I do not know whether he intended that, but his remarks evidently had that bearing; and I, for one, wish emphatically to state that, in my opinion, it was a most necessary precaution on the part of the Council to insert the words we endeavoured to get inserted here. I never pretended to say that, by strict legal right, the company could come against this colony for compensation in money, or for additional land. But what I did contend, and do still contend, is that, in the absence of these words, it is by no means quite clear that a Court of equity might not have given relief by holding that there was an implied obligation to have land there out of which the necessary land could be selected. And it is perfectly well known to every lawyer in this House that when a contract is ambiguous a Court of equity may give relief where a Court of law would give no redress. It was to obviate that that I conceived it to be necessary to move in the direction I did. There is, in addition, this important question: that in an ambiguous contract, if the company could establish a moral claim founded on deception on our part, then this colony could not take up the position of a private individual by resisting a strong moral claim which a company of this kind might press on the colony, and it is very much more satisfactory to be able to say to them, "There is the contract, and it expressly ignores and repudiates the suggestion which you wish to make that any guarantee was given as to compensation in money or land outside the authorised area." Sir, I think that the amendment, instead of being "pooh-poohed," ought to be hailed with satisfaction by this House, as it apparently has been by the other branch of the Legislature. It is only in consequence of the tenor of the Premier's remarks that I felt induced to say what I have done. I must say that I appreciate the efforts of the honourable member for Auckland Central in endeavouring to get at the bottom of this matter. I think I may safely say that, beyond the general information which every member of this House has, when we are called upon to deal with a very important question, I may say—a question of such magnitude as this—we ought to be able to satisfy our minds that we are adopting a course which is in the interests of the colony. What I was about to say was this: There are three Acts with reference to this matter—the Act of 1881, the Act of 1884, and the further Act of 1886—and now it is proposed to have another Act. What I should like to see would be the whole of these Acts consolidated, and the essence of them, so to speak, put into the Act, and then this contract given legislative force to on terms that have been assented to by the company. I did not go beyond that stage when I opposed this measure, because I realise that the colony has decided to carry it out. But we should make the terms so explicit, so emphatically distinct, that on no future occasion could we be asked for fresh legislation on account of any well-grounded or ill-founded claims put forward by the company. That, I think, should be arranged. I should like to know whether there is any assurance that the terms of this contract, as arrived at by this House and the other branch of the Legislature, have been, or are likely to be, accepted by the company.

Mr. SAMUEL.—The honourable member for Dunedin West is only pleased to find that the amendment, which he proposed when this report was being considered, has been adopted in another place. But I do not think the opinion of this House has changed on account of that being done. I think the same majority as before are still of opinion that it would be just as well had the contract been not altered in the slightest degree. It is well, as a compromise, to assent to it now; but that does not alter the opinion of this House. Although no great harm can be done by the insertion of this amendment I cannot see that there is any necessity for it. To what has fallen from the honourable member for Parnell, and to some of that which has fallen from the honourable member for Auckland Central, I think some attention might be given. The honourable member for Parnell has asked, "What is the intention of the Government in regard to the execution of a contract?" and I should like to know what the Government intend to do in this respect, and whether they really do intend to postpone the execution of the contract until the House has passed an Act such as the Premier has told us of. Turning to the report of the Committee, adopted by this House, we find the recommendation is,—

"That, in the opinion of the Committee, a new contract should be prepared, embodying the several provisions of the Acts of 1884 and 1886, the contract of 1885 legalised by the Act of 1886, and the further contract amending the contract of 1885; and that an Act should be passed empowering the Governor to execute such new contract. Such new contract should, so far as practicable, contain provisions in the same words as are used in the said Acts and contracts, and when any deviation is necessary in order to render the new contract consistent throughout, the alterations required should be to the same purport and effect as the draft contract hereunto annexed."

Now, that seems to me to indicate an entirely new contract; and the question I should like the Premier to answer is, whether it is really intended to prepare an entirely new contract, embodying all the provisions mentioned in this report, before any contract is signed; and whether any such contract, before being signed, will be authorised by an Act of this House. If so, it does seem to me that it will be a work of very great length, and will give ample time to the honourable member for Auckland Central, the honourable member for Parnell, and any other honourable members who so desire, to discourse upon the policy of this contract and the Acts by which it is authorised—plenty of time to further debate this matter to their hearts' content. In asking this I do not wish it at all to be considered that I think the honourable member for Parnell is likely to be bullied by anybody, or that the honourable member for Auckland Central will be prevented from freely discussing this question. Neither of these honourable gentlemen is likely to be bullied. Whether they be bullies or not is another matter. We ought to have it clear whether the contract is to be executed in something like the form we have it, or whether it is to be an entirely new contract, embodied from the contract as now before us and the other Acts which have been passed and the other previous contract which has been signed.

Major ATKINSON.—I shall be happy to reply to the questions that have been asked, as far as I am able, if the House so desires. As to that raised by the honourable member for Parnell, I take the position to be this: that the Council has now authorised the Government to make a contract on the basis of this proposed contract, and the Government will proceed to do that at once if this House agrees to the Council's amendment. Whether we shall be able to get the contract signed before Parliament rises I am not able to say. If it can be done, we should then make it a schedule of the Bill to be brought in. If the new contract has not been signed before Parliament adjourns, the Bill we propose to bring down will authorise the Government to sign a contract on the basis of the present one. With regard to a further contract, it is proposed also to take power in the Bill to sign another contract which shall include all the others; but that will take some months to do, and I understand the object of the House is to get the company to work as soon as possible. Of course the House can, if it chooses, throw out the Bill when it comes down; because, although these resolutions are passed, agreeing to the proposed contract, the contract will not be law at all until a Bill authorising it is passed. But, although honourable members will be free to decide as they choose when the Bill comes down, and no doubt those whose consciences have impelled them to oppose the present proposals will then be impelled to oppose the Bill, yet I think the great majority of the House will still approve of the proposals of the Government and pass the Bill. With regard to what was said by the honourable member for Dunedin West, I would point out that I have not the slightest intention of throwing ridicule on the Upper House. What I did was to say that I still believe these words are unnecessary. The honourable gentleman thinks differently, and, of course, he is entitled to so think. But, having been put in, let us keep them in and satisfy those people who think they are necessary. Sir, I do not think any other point was raised on which I need touch.

Mr. G. F. RICHARDSON.—Sir, I beg to lay the altered return on the table. Directly the honourable member for Auckland Central mentioned the matter I asked that a supplementary return should be prepared as soon as possible. The order of reference for the return is thus worded:—

"That a return be laid upon the table showing the names of the tenants of the Crown, and the extent of each of their holdings, who hold land in any portion of the lands north of the Rakaia which it is proposed to give up to the Midland Railway Company."

I read that to mean what had been selected by the company; but this return gives the balance of all within the authorised area.

Amendment negatived, and motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS BILL.

Mr. O'CONOR.—Sir, I ask to be allowed to make a personal explanation. I had occasion to leave the House yesterday before the division on the Government Railways Bill, and I exchanged pairs with the honourable member for the Dunstan, who, at the time, was paired with the honourable member for the Thames. On getting that protection I left the precincts of the House. I find, since, that I have been recorded as having paired with the honourable member for the Thames, and therefore my vote counts in the way I did not intend it to go. I desire to make that explanation to show what really took place on the occasion.

GOVERNOR'S SALARY AND ALLOWANCES BILL.

On the motion, That the House go into Committee on this Bill,

Sir J. VOGEL said,—May I ask the Premier if he will agree to the suggestion I made that the salary should be reduced by £1,000, and a travelling-allowance of £1,000 be made?

Major ATKINSON.—The Government are unable to agree to that suggestion. We think the provision will be just as effective in the way we propose. The Government at first were disposed to put it as the honourable gentleman proposed; but, after fuller consideration, it was determined to propose it in the form in which it now stands. There is a precedent for it: as far as I can understand, it has been done in this way in other colonies.

Sir J. VOGEL.—The Bill is so drawn that it is almost impossible for me in Committee to move an amendment to do what I suggest, and therefore I shall leave the responsibility of the matter on the Government. I undertake to say that passing the Bill as it stands will be no measure of retrenchment at all. It will come to this: that a Governor will be appointed to New Zealand at a salary of £5,000, out of which he has to pay his staff, while he will ask the Government to pay such travelling-expenses as he may incur. It would be utterly unreasonable to ask that a Governor should make it his business to visit Dunedin, Christchurch, Auckland, or the West Coast at his own expense. Whenever he is asked to go about the colony there will inevitably be in future years what we had in a former period, and which rendered necessary the passing of the present Act in 1872. A vote used to be proposed in the House which always caused disagreeable discussions, and we shall have those discussions again when similar votes are proposed in the future. We may be quite sure that when Governors come to New Zealand, especially while they are new Governors, the country will not be contented unless they visit the different districts; and it would be quite unreasonable to ask them to make those visits at their own cost—the colony would have to bear the expense. I asked the Premier to accede to my proposal; but he declines to do so, and prefers to pass the Bill as it stands. If that be done I am sure it will not be a measure that will effect any retrenchment whatever. Before the present Act was passed in 1872, the expenditure under various heads connected with the Governor amounted in one year to over £2,500, and in another year to nearly as much; and it was to stop the unpleasant discussions that these votes occasioned that a Bill was brought in. Instead of this Bill being a measure in the direction of retrenchment, I am afraid it will prove one in the contrary direction, although, of course, I do not mean to say that it is brought in by the Government with any such intention. The experience I had before the present Premier joined the Government in 1874 was as I have stated, and my statement can be confirmed by others, members of the Government at that time—the honourable member for Selwyn knows the great pressure that was brought on the Government to find travelling-expenses for the Governor. Now, suppose we make the salary £4,000, we shall not get a Governor working out his pension, but we shall get a younger man with a longer career before him. But if we got a gentleman nominally receiving £5,000 a year, out of which he has to pay his staff, and is supposed to pay his travelling-expenses, it would be called a first-class Governorship; but it would not be a first-class Governorship as compared with some other colonies. The consequence will be that the Governorship here will be used to enable elderly Governors to work out the balance of the time during which they require to serve before they can take their pensions. There are always difficulties in that way; the Colonial Office has to provide posts for gentlemen who have shown that they are getting too old to work, and cannot be sent to some of the higher posts; and the Colonial Department does not want them to lose their first-class pensions, and some place is chosen where they can work out the balance of their time for their right to pension to accrue. If the Bill is passed as it now stands the New Zealand Governorship will be used for that purpose. I would not grudge the full payment for a really first-class Governor. I would much sooner see the salary made smaller, say, £4,000, which would attract plenty of gentlemen of high abilities and ambition, and then a maximum sum for travelling-expenses should be fixed. I shall not move an amendment in Committee, though I strongly advise the Premier to consider the question.

Mr. TAYLOR.—I should like to ask the Premier if he believes that the sum fixed by this Bill will not be exceeded in respect of future Governors.

Major ATKINSON.—Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR.—Then I am satisfied with that. I think too much is being made of New Zealand being made a first-class colony, and this, that, and the other thing, when it cannot afford it. I hope that will be borne in mind when a motion comes on for us to vote £20,000 in that direction. Fancy a young country like this presuming to imitate the Old-world system, in keeping an army of useless members of the community. I trust the present Premier will not countenance anything of the kind. The Premier assures us that the sum stated in this Bill will not be exceeded for the Governor, and I take his word for it, and I know he will endeavour to keep it.

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—This Bill is not to come into operation until the next Governor is appointed; and I want to ask the Premier this: Suppose the present Governor left the colony, and the office were filled by a locum tenens, would the lower scale apply to the latter at once?

Major ATKINSON.—No; I think not. It is a rather nice point, and I cannot say what the Colonial Office might think. I must confess that I am rather astonished at the argument used by the honourable gentleman opposite, because a very short time ago, when a Bill to reduce the Governor's salary was introduced, the honourable gentleman opposed it for fear it would make this a second-class colony. That was the argument then used; but now, when we bring this measure down, it seems it does not matter whether it makes us a first-class colony or not. I agree with that; but I say that if we can obtain the object we are aiming at, and at the same time remain a first-class colony, it will be all the better. He tells us in very strong language that if we pass this Bill it will not effect economy, and tries to make the House believe that a similar Act was in force up to 1873. But that is not the case. At that time the Governor's salary was simply a salary, and it was the custom for the House to vote travelling-allowance; and a great many disputes arose in the House in consequence. At that time travelling was very expensive, and the allowance voted was £1,000 a year. The honourable gentleman is wrong in saying that the Governor does not draw that allowance; for, as I am informed, he does draw, monthly, the commuted allowance for travelling and other expenses.

Sir J. VOGEL.—By the terms of the Act he ought not to draw the allowance. The salary then was £4,500 a year, and it was reduced in 1872.

Major ATKINSON.—Yes; I have the Act before me. The salary was £4,500, and, as I say, it was entirely outside the travelling-allowance which the House regularly provided. Now we propose to make provision that the Governor shall pay his own travelling-expenses. We have no right to assume that a Governor will not do his duty when he comes here, or that the Government of the day will not do their duty. I take it that it is the duty of the Ministry to advise the Governor to travel, and, if he does not travel, the Government know what is the constitutional course to take. The Government have given this matter quite as careful attention as the honourable gentleman, and have as much experience as the honourable gentleman, and have brought this measure down as the best way of meeting the question. However, as I understand, it is in no way a party question, and I shall be happy to give the honourable gentleman every facility in Committee to move any amendment on the point he has raised, so that it may be considered in a friendly way.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, 5th December, 1887.

First Reading—Representation Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at half-past two o'clock.

FIRST READING.

Slaughterhouses Bill.

REPRESENTATION BILL.

Major ATKINSON.—Sir, it is not out of any disrespect to the House, or from any want of appreciation of the importance of the measure, that, in asking the House to read this Bill a second time, I do not propose to make any lengthy remarks on this occasion. My reasons are these: During the last session of Parliament the matter was very fully discussed, and during the late election also, Sir, this question was before the country very prominently, and, in fact, was almost talked threadbare. It seems to me, therefore, looking at these facts and at the period of the session, that it is better that I should move the second reading of this Bill without bringing forward many arguments in its favour, leaving those few honourable members—I believe they are in fact but few—who are opposed to its passage to raise such objections as they may think necessary, and I hope then to be able to answer them when I reply,

I might just point out that the number of population to representatives proposed by this Bill is still very small compared with the numbers of population in various other countries. I have made out a few statistics on this subject, which I will read, with your permission. In the United Kingdom there are 56,280 inhabitants to each member; in France, 76,287; in the United States, 174,724; in Canada, which approaches nearest to our proportion, 20,888 to each member; and, if this Bill is passed, including the Natives there will then be only 10,000 inhabitants in New Zealand to each representative. So that we shall actually be half under Canada, and much below the other countries I have cited. With regard to the population and area, there are in England 290 inhabitants to the square mile; in France, 180; in the United States, 14; in Canada, 1; in New Zealand, 5½. So that, looking at these facts, honourable members will see that most of the arguments which have been adduced against the Bill as to disfranchising the country districts cannot be true, or must have operation in the countries I have referred to. That, to my mind, is a complete answer to the arguments which have been brought forward against this measure. For the reasons I have already given, I do not intend to speak at any length, but shall content myself with moving the second reading.

Mr. TAIWHANGA.—I think it is a great shame to take off one Maori member. The Maori representation is small enough as it is. I should not mind if the House would only pass my Maori Relief Bill. If that were done we might have a chance. If my Bill is taken no notice of by the Government and the House, and they pass this Bill reducing us to three, I think it is a great shame. I think this Bill should be referred to the Native Affairs Committee, so as to give us time to consider the matter.

Sir J. VOGEL.—I wish to say, Sir, that, whilst I recognise that during the election a large number of constituencies expressed themselves in favour of a material reduction in the number of the members of the House, and whilst, therefore, from the result of the elections, the measure may be held to be justified, still, in my opinion, the time will come, and that not very long hence, when a great deal of dissatisfaction will be felt throughout the country—especially in the country districts—at the very large reduction which this measure proposes. The Bill, in my opinion, does not sufficiently provide for anticipating a dissolution of Parliament—that is to say that, unless something is done in this matter, the elections, like those which have taken place, may be attended by a very considerable amount of inconvenience and loss of time. I shall not speak further on the measure.

Mr. CARROLL.—I fail to see the necessity for passing this measure at the present time, because it will not come into force until after the expiration of the present Parliament; and I think a matter of such weighty importance as this should have more time for its consideration. I shall decidedly object to any reduction in the Maori members, on the simple ground that for a long time we have been under-represented upon the basis of population; and now we would be deprived of even some of that representation which we are entitled to if our numbers are reduced to three. If you are going to meddle with the special representation at all, I should be in favour of doing away with it altogether. Let all the Maoris have the same electoral privileges as Europeans,—place them on one roll. Either do that, or do not meddle with the special representation at all. I only rise to make these few remarks now, and at another time shall have more to say on the subject.

Mr. W. D. STEWART.—I was somewhat opposed to the reduction of members; but there is a very strong feeling in the South of this colony in favour of this reduction, and I shall support the Bill as it stands. I quite agree with the honourable member for Christchurch North that the Bill should provide for some immediate adjustment of the electorates, so that, should any emergency arise necessitating a general election, there should not be that delay which took place on the last occasion. However, I shall support the measure in its present form.

Mr. TAIPUA.—I must enter my protest against reducing the number of Maori members. I do not think it is right. At present the districts represented by the Maori members are very large indeed, and we have in each of those districts a population of something like ten thousand Natives to each member. That is above the European proportion. Now, the European members of this House only represent about six thousand persons each, and I think that the present measure is very unjust indeed. In my opinion, instead of reducing the number of Native members it should be added to, and the proportion to those they represent made the same as that of the European members. It ought to be admitted by this House that the Maoris require greater care and greater supervision than the Europeans, and for that reason they should be better represented in this House, for many of the laws passed in the House affect the Natives very injuriously, and that is due to their not being properly represented. Now, when all the troubles have passed away, and there is no longer any danger of Maori war, when we are living, as it were, as one people, I think we should have fair-play; we should work together, and devise laws for our mutual benefit. I am very angry, very wroth, that this special representation was ever provided for the Natives at all. I think it has been a delusion, and it would have been better if it had never been passed. I hope the Government will consider this Bill very seriously, for it is very stringent. Seeing that most of our lands have passed to the Crown, and have been brought under the operation of the Court, we should all be treated alike, the same as Europeans. Most of our lands having passed through the Court, they can be dealt with by the existing laws, and we should all work together with one object. I think this is a pernicious measure, for we are not being treated fairly. Our lands are being taken and administered by the English law, and yet we are being treated exceptionally. If honourable members and the Government object to our having to speak in Maori, then let that be stated—let there be no misunderstanding. I shall deem it my duty to oppose this measure in every way in my power. It would be better for the Native members to leave the House. They would be prepared to do that rather than support such a measure as this. It would be far better, instead of taking away a Maori member this year, and probably one next year, and another the year after, to repeal the special representation the Natives enjoy at once, and have done with it, and put the Native members out of the House.

Mr. SEDDON.—No more important question, I think, could engage the attention of this House than this question of representation, and my heart sank within me when I saw the little notice taken by honourable members when the Premier, in that short and empty speech, introduced the subject. I say in the question of representation the life and well-being of the people are involved. The question of cost is a secondary consideration. In the question of representation everything is involved that concerns the people. In my opinion the people are having their rights invaded by this Bill, and those who represent them in this House are not doing their duty to the people in the slight attention they are paying to this Bill. What will this taking-away of representation mean to the sparsely-settled parts of the colony? Does it not mean that the whole of the representation will be given to the large centres of population; and that in the outlying districts, where the good work of colonisation is going on, the wants of the people will not be attended to? And how inconsistent is the action of the Premier with regard to this question! In 1881, when we had a population of only some 450,000 souls in the colony, he was one of the leading spirits of a Government which introduced a Representation Bill and fixed the number of members at ninety-one, exclusive of Maori members. If then, in his opinion and that of his colleagues, it was necessary for the welfare of the people of New Zealand to have ninety-five representatives in this House, how can he now consistently say that New Zealand, with a population at the present time of six hundred thousand, should have only seventy representatives? The comparison made as regards Great Britain, Canada, and France does not apply in the case of a young country like New Zealand. The Premier must know full well that we are not only a legislative body but an administrative body. He must know also that we have a large public debt, and he must also know that in carrying out the public-works policy it is necessary that each part of the colony should have representation, so as to insure a fair expenditure on works of a profitable nature, and of such a nature that the colony as a whole will benefit from them. It is true that as to the moneys previously borrowed the large centres of population have had the lion's share; and, what is more than that, it must be apparent to all that there can be very little further borrowing—it must be very limited; and, when future borrowing is limited, any surplus money that the colony thinks it necessary to expend in the work of colonisation will be expended in and about the larger centres of population, which will have a dominating political power in this House, and there will be no expenditure at all on public works in those parts of the colony which have not received justice in the past. The people in the outlying districts will not receive anything like the consideration that will be given to those parts of the colony that are more thickly populated. To prevent that occurring it is absolutely necessary that we should continue the representation which at the present time exists. If the Premier had come down with a proposal dealing with the question of local government, and decentralising our governmental system,—if he had proposed that this House should be purely a legislative body, and had taken from it the dealing with roads and bridges and public works,—there would have been a reason for reduction in the number of members. But, without doing that, and leaving the House, as it is, both an administrative and a legislative body, performing the chief functions necessary for the welfare of the colony, to say that the number of members should be so largely reduced, and to see the way the proposal is received by this House, has made me ask the question, “What are honourable members thinking about?” Surely the people know more what is to their interest than to allow the measure to go as this seems to be going. We have just come back from our constituents, and we know what has been the effect of the redistribution of representation under the Act of last session. Have we not honourable members here representing different districts with no community of interest whatever? As regards many of the electoral divisions which have been extended, there can be no doubt that the honourable member representing each of those districts has suddenly found himself having to do with different people, electors holding different views, and having no community of interests whatever with those he has represented hitherto. And this has been a serious difficulty; it has been objectionable both to the electors and to the candidates. It is owing to this that some of our best public men were rejected at the ballot-box, and not through any fault of their own, or because they had not done their duty to those they had represented. Their defeat was simply through that want of community of interest, and owing to local jealousies; and I undertake to say that the effect of this Bill would be the same. I look at it also from another point of view. The larger the number of members we have in this House the less danger there is of what is politically known as “log-rolling,” and of having legislation in the direction of benefiting particular classes. I was a member of this House when the number of members was considerably smaller than now—but, still, more than it is proposed by this measure to reduce them to—and I know what it has cost the country in relation to the formation of parties, and as to the holders of seats on the Treasury benches. While you might save a paltry £10,000 by the proposals of this Bill, I undertake to say that if it came to a question of parties, and as to who should hold seats on the Treasury benches, for every pound saved by this Bill the colony would lose a thousand. I know that in 1879 if it cost the colony a penny it cost it a quarter of a million of money owing to this very cause. The great danger that I see in lessening the representation is that there will be a dominant party such as we have at the present moment on those benches, who are supported by the wealth of the colony, who are supported by the land-rings of the colony, and by absentees.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Oh!

Mr. SEDDON.—The absentees leave a power behind them. It is no laughing matter. Those on the other side of the House may jeer and laugh with the honourable member for Dunedin East, who—I say it without wishing to be at all personal—owes his seat in this House to the influence of wealth and intolerant bigotry. Those laugh who win, and I permit the honourable gentleman to smile. I question very much whether or not those who wish to do their duty to the great mass of the people in this country would care about being returned by such a power as I have described. Is it fair, I ask the House, while you have the property vote, to reduce the representation, and thus give a greater power to property than it has even now? I say that honourable members who vote for this Bill will be voting to give greater power to property. It is in the interests of property that this measure is brought in. This and their measures of the same tendency which have been brought in have been framed in the interests of property. The whole of this legislation we are asked to pass is on a par with this measure. The House has committed itself to a number of these measures, and I say that the people are blind to their own interests if it is permitted to go any further. I say it is panic legislation. Retrenchment has been thrown as dust in the eyes of the people, and the Premier and those who now dominate with him are, under that pressure, introducing measure after measure against the interests of the people. As one of the Liberals who have been in this House for the last ten years fighting for the rights of the people, I must raise my voice against those rights being swept away in one fell swoop. Is the work of ten years fighting for the rights of the people, I must raise my voice against those rights being swept away in one fell swoop. Is the work of ten years fighting for the rights of the people, I must raise my voice against those rights being swept away in one fell swoop. We find that it is being done, and yet scarcely a word is being said about it. Sir, this is the most Conservative House that has been sitting here since 1879; and I appeal to my honourable friend the member for Auckland Central to assist—honourable members may laugh again, but I ask him once more to come to the front and endeavour to stop, as he can by his powerful oratory and great knowledge, the torrent that is sweeping away to destruction the people and their interests in this country. This is no laughing matter with me. It is a question of taking away the representation of the people; and I am not speaking personally on the point, for I do think that my services will be recognised in the part of the country from which I come, and that if there were a reduction in the number of members I should still be one representing that part of the country. When the provinces were swept away there was no proper system of local government given to the country. In fact, no attempt was made to give us a proper system; and if this Bill is passed we shall find that young politicians, having no means of making themselves known to the people, will have very great difficulty in finding their way into this Chamber. The choice of the people will be very considerably restricted. It will be only well-known public men, and those who have held positions in the past, who will come back. Young men will have no opportunity under the proposed widened representation. And what is the reason for this Bill? The only reason that has been given, the only reason that can be given, is that of saving a few pounds. But I undertake to say that for every pound saved by this Bill the colony will lose a thousand. We shall have class legislation; we shall have the few and the select legislated for; but the masses will not be legislated for. I undertake to say that this is purely a party "move," made in the interests of the particular party which dominates at the present time; and I say it is unfair for the Premier to ask this House now to pass a measure which will only come into force three years hence. What is the reason of this? Why are not honourable members to be allowed time for reflection? Why are the electors not to have time to think over what is being done? It is true that at the hustings the party which now dominates declared in favour of this Bill. I know it was one of the planks in their platform. And it is also true that the Press—nineteenths of which are under the influence of that party—advocated a reduction in the number of members. The Premier may think it his duty to his party to bring this measure in; but I say that before long the electors will awaken to the fact that their rights are being taken from them, and that a serious injury is now being done to them. Why should they not have time to think over this measure? Why should they not have time to think over it before it will come into operation? It is not to have effect until three years. The object, of course, is, in passing this Bill, to prevent electors and members from reconsidering the question. If at any time they attempt to review their decision they will be met by this statement: that when they came up to the House they voted for this measure; and the party now in power will decline to have the question reopened. There will be no chance during the next two sessions to go back. And what I say is that time should be given for reflection. If that time is given I undertake to say that this measure will never be passed by this House. Let the honourable member for Caversham insist upon his Limitation of Votes Bill being passed, and so put a restriction upon the property vote; let us insist upon having a proper system of local government, with a fair distribution of moneys: and then perhaps we may consider the question of reducing the number of members. What did the honourable member for Christchurch North say when he introduced the Bill by which he abolished the provinces—and the Premier was then a member of his Cabinet: he pledged himself that a substitute should be found for the local government which was then being taken away—a substitute which would be beneficial to the interests of the people. The rights of the people were taken away from them. They were given increased representation in 1881, because the present Premier and his party did not see their way clear to find a substitute for the local government which had been taken away; and now, when we have one hundred and fifty thousand more people than we had in 1881, the representation of the people is to be so reduced that they will have fewer members in this House than they had at the time when the provincial system was swept away. I hope, in the interests of the people, that this Bill will not be passed. As regards the Maori representation, I have said that some party feeling was shown in this Bill. I think the Premier will admit with me that in sweeping away a portion of the Native representation, as it is proposed to do, a wrong is being done to the Natives of the South Island, which part of the colony is no longer, under this measure, to have a representative. It is bad enough, in all truth, to have taken away from them the whole of their land, to have given them a mere pittance for it, to have made only a few paltry reserves; but it is far worse, having done that, to now take away from them their right of representation in this House, which they have enjoyed for years. It is an act of the grossest hardship, the grossest injustice. Why is it done? Is it because the present representative for the Southern Maori Electoral District, acting from an instinct and a desire to do what is right to the people, has thought it best to sit on this side of the House? Is it as a punishment for that that the Native people in the South Island are to be deprived of their representation? Could a greater wrong be done than is proposed to be done under this Bill? If I am a judge of Native character, if I am a judge of the honourable gentleman who here represents the Natives of the South Island, he will send in his resignation and leave the House, because, knowing that he cannot be in accord with the present Government or their legislation, he may hope by so doing to save the representation of the Natives of the South Island. I am sure he would rather do that than consent to become subject to the "hob-nailed-boot" process which honourable gentlemen have had time after time in this House to put up with unless they would change their side. I say that the honourable gentleman does not merit the punishment that is proposed to be meted out to him by this Bill. He has done his duty to those who have sent him here; he is well liked by honourable members on both sides of the House; his vote has been given conscientiously; and, taking into consideration the small amount that will be saved by doing away with that representation, and knowing the soreness that would exist in the minds of the Natives who are to be deprived of their representation, I say it will be better for the colony that such a proposal should not be given effect to. The Maoris are a noble race. They are fast dying out. Let them not, in passing away, think that we are taking their land from them—putting them into a subservient position, and then taking away from them their rights of representation. I will put this to the Premier and to the Government: Have they not other measures of far greater importance that are necessary to be pushed on instead of this? We shall have Christmas here in about three weeks, we have only fourteen or fifteen more sitting-days, and yet he has never attempted to touch the question of finance. Why should this question of finance be lost sight of? Why should we be asked to pass measures that are not to come into force for three years, and, in the meantime, to pass over matters which are of the greatest importance at the present time? Here we have New Zealand bonds down to £94, and in two or three days perhaps we shall have them down to £90. Such being the financial position of the country, why should we be asked to devote our time to questions of this sort? I think that the Premier is playing with the House; he is playing with us as if we were a lot of schoolboys, not as men sent here to represent the people. It is the honourable gentleman's first duty to put the finances of the country on a sound footing.

Major ATKINSON.—Hear, hear.

Mr. SEDDON.—Then why does the honourable gentleman not do it? Why are we not allowed to express our opinions upon the financial proposals of the Government? Why is the honourable gentleman not in Committee on the estimates, showing us how he can carry out retrenchment in a fair and reasonable manner? Why is he not doing that, instead of dealing with questions which cannot affect the country for three years to come? If honourable gentlemen were of the same way of thinking as I am we should stop any further legislation, any further Bills, dealing with questions of this sort, or progressing one single step, until this question of finance was distinctly and decidedly dealt with. I cannot help wondering how it is that the honourable gentlemen behind him are allowing the Premier to run riot in the way that he is doing. There is nothing, to my mind, so important as the finance of the colony, nothing so necessary as placing it on a sound footing at once; and if the honourable gentleman would withdraw this Bill and allow us to deal with the question of finance he would be doing justice to himself and justice to the colony. I admit that he is pledged to pass this measure; that his party—that a majority of the House—is pledged to a reduction of the number of members; that that was the pledge they gave on the hustings: but it was not at that time thought for a moment that we should get within ten or twelve days of the prorogation without the financial question having been touched. The honourable gentleman at the head of the Government has told this House and the country that retrenchment is the first question to be dealt with. What reason is there, then, why the honourable gentleman should not at once go into the estimates, and, taking each class, tell us exactly where he proposes to make reductions? Only this: that this Bill and others are to be kept before honourable members, our time is to be taken up in discussing these matters, until the last moment, and then the honourable gentleman's usual tactics will obtain, and we shall be kept the whole night, perhaps the next day, and then have to pass the estimates in globo, not having time to reason out the financial proposals of the Government, but being bound to pass them just as the honourable gentleman wishes. If other honourable members consider that that is the right way to treat the representatives of the people, or that it is treating the people of New Zealand as they deserve to be treated, I, for one, must demur to it. I protest against the Bill going further, and, if in order, I would move, That the further consideration of this Bill be postponed until the financial proposals of the Government have been dealt with as a whole. I have proposed that on another Bill, and I am consistent in proposing it now. The Government cannot take it as a no-confidence question, because they have not done so on another Bill. I do so simply as a protest. I do not think I shall be able to carry the amendment.

An Hon. MEMBER.—Why not?

Mr. SEDDON.—Because there is a subservient majority following the honourable gentleman at the head of the Government rightly or wrongly; and, it matters not what the question may be, the honourable gentleman will tell them that if they carry an amendment it will mean that he will have to retire; and, under that threat held over them night after night and day after day, we find honourable members going into the lobby and passing measures against which they have conscientious convictions. I undertake to say that the majority of this House, if they vote for this Bill and leave over the question of finance, will not be voting in accordance with their election-pledges or according to their conscientious convictions. Sir, I move, as an amendment, That the further consideration of this Bill be postponed until the financial proposals of the Government are dealt with as a whole.

Mr. FISH.—I rise to a point of order. Is it right that members of this House should be going round to other honourable members and asking them how they are going to vote on this measure?

Mr. SEDDON.—I was going to say that it is an unusual thing to see one member of a party asking how other honourable gentlemen are going to vote; and I, for one, object to private pledges being given when the debate is proceeding.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I do not think there is any objection to one honourable member conversing with another on the subject of debate.

Sir J. VOGEL.—The amendment of the honourable member for Kumara raises a widely-different question from that which relates to the measure itself. I have already stated that I shall not oppose this Bill, although I am afraid its consequences will be very much lamented by the colony in the course of time. But, as to the question raised by the honourable member for Kumara, as to the session being so near its end without our having considered the financial provisions, I cannot help thinking there is a great deal of force in what the honourable gentleman said. Since I stated to the House last week that I would help the Government to push on this session to its termination, I have strictly kept to that determination. I have spoken very little myself, and I have preferred rather to see Bills go through with a hasty discussion than to raise a question as to whether it would be better to put off Bills until next session. But I cannot help thinking the honourable gentleman at the head of the Government must recognise the fairness of what I am about to say. If it be the case that the session is to end in about fourteen or fifteen days, the time has come when he should put the House in possession, as far as he is able to do so, of the intentions of the Government with regard to business during the remainder of the session; and I think the honourable member for Kumara should be contented—at any rate, I should be contented—if, say, to-morrow, or next day at the latest, he would give the House an idea of what is the course of business he proposes, so that honourable members may be able to give their attention to that part of the business which is considered to be of the most importance. I think the honourable gentleman might be able to give us an idea of when the Public Works Statement will be down, and when the discussion relating to the provisions for the year and the policy in relation to loans will be taken; and, further, if he will give us an idea of the measures he thinks he will be able to carry this session and what he will be content to leave for next session. I must express the hope that the honourable gentleman will understand that I am not speaking in a hostile manner; but I hope he will be able to give us some information on the points I have mentioned; and, if he will do that, I, for one, will not support the amendment now before the House.

Major ATKINSON.—The Government thought that after the second reading of this Bill we should be in a position to tell the House definitely when the Public Works Statement would be down, and what the general course of business would be. The request of the honourable gentleman is very reasonable. We have, though not from the honourable gentleman, met with a great deal of obstruction from some honourable members, and we have been delayed many days in consequence; but I say that, if this Bill is read a second time to-day,—as I have no doubt it will be,—I shall be prepared to-morrow to state the course of business which the Government propose to follow.

Mr. SAMUEL.—I have very great pleasure in seconding this amendment. I am very sorry to find that the Government think it necessary to bring in this Bill at the present time. There is plenty of time to meet the present demand for retrenchment, and to remove to a certain extent the depression, and then we can see whether or not it is necessary to reduce the number of members of this House. I am one of those who hold that it will be a great injury to the country to reduce the number of members. Without prating about Liberalism or Conservatism, without using the word "liberal" in a way which has brought it to be a byword, I say that, for the good of the inhabitants of the colony, they should be amply represented in Parliament, and that the management of affairs should not fall into the hands of a few, and these to a great extent the moneyed class. It should be the object of every man who comes up here to represent his fellow-creatures to do his best for those who are weakest, and to try to do most for those who can do least for themselves; but if we are going to commit the government of the country into the hands of a few persons we shall be doing an enormous injury to the weaker classes in this colony. If the government of this country does fall into the hands of a few, I venture to say that we shall have those who come under the class of professional politicians too fully represented in this House. I am not casting any unworthy aspersion upon that class of politicians, for I believe that a country cannot be well governed without a number of professional politicians. We must have a number of able men to devote themselves to politics, to study politics, to find out how different systems of politics in other parts of the world work, and to devote themselves almost exclusively to the study of politics. I am not one of those who say, "Let us exclude those who look to politics for their reward in life—let us exclude them from the government of the country." On the contrary, I say if we do not have men who will make a study of politics we shall not have the nation well governed; but I also say we should not have that class unduly represented in the House of Representatives or the Legislative Council. We ought to have a class of men who have to work for their bread outside of politics, a class of men who find how these schemes agree or do not agree with the general well-being of the inhabitants of the colony; we ought to have a certain number of taxpayers, and we ought also to have a certain number of property-owners—men who find how the measures which are brought before us operate for the good or ill of different classes of the community. If we have a sufficient number of each of those classes, sufficient to hold the balance between the contending parties of professional politicians and experts, we shall have the country well governed. I am sorry to see so many members on both sides of the House uniting to pass this measure. I am afraid that, in the end, we shall have both parties agreeing to coalitions, and then we shall have what we have seen in the past, one of the worst examples of Government which could possibly be imagined—a Government without principles, a Government guided only by expediency. I agree with a great deal of what has fallen from the honourable member for Kumara. I consider that we ought to have such a financial proposal fully brought before us by the Government before we begin tinkering with such an important measure as we are now discussing. One by one the Bills are being brought before us; yet we have not had the particular Bill now being debated even mentioned in the financial proposals brought down. What are these proposals but cheese-paring? If you are going to put the colony in a sound condition financially, what is the use of reducing the number of members of this House; what is the use of thus curtailing the privileges of the people; what is the use of forcing on the people of the colony, who are now heavily taxed, and who have to be still more heavily taxed in the future—forcing upon them the necessity of being governed not by their own members, but by men who are elected by districts which have hitherto been looked upon as foreign to themselves? How many parts of this colony are there which will be disfranchised by this Bill? I say that from one end of the colony to the other there will be nothing but dissatisfaction—one widespread feeling that the people of the colony are being crushed by taxation, and that they have no control over the moneys they have paid in taxation. I shall vote against this Bill, and I do trust that before it is passed we shall have the financial proposals of the Government fully before us; and that, if we do not see that those proposals are likely to relieve depression without its being necessary to pass such a Bill as this, we shall then choose a better Government than the honourable gentlemen on those benches, and not proceed to the extremity of spoiling the good government of the colony for the sake of keeping those honourable gentlemen in office.

Sir J. VOGEL.—Will the Hon. the Premier also state what course he proposes to take with regard to the unfinished debate on the Financial Statement?

Major ATKINSON.—Yes; I shall state that also.

Mr. FISH.—I beg to move the adjournment of the House, in order to protest against the remarks which have just fallen from the Premier. The honourable gentleman said that, although he had not received any obstruction from the leader of the Opposition, he had received considerable obstruction from other members of this House. I do not think honourable members ought to allow that statement to pass unchallenged. I defy the honourable gentleman to prove that there has in the slightest degree been obstruction in the passage of his measures. The obstruction to business has emanated from the honourable gentleman himself, and I protest most indignantly against honourable gentlemen being charged with obstruction when such has not been offered.

Sir J. VOGEL.—If the honourable gentleman looks at the number of Bills which were passed through all their stages last week he must surely be convinced that there is no honourable member on our side who has purposely delayed business. As to any members who think they have something to say which the House or the country ought to hear, the honourable gentleman's experience ought to have taught him that attacks of the kind would not stop them. That there has been any organized attempt on the part of any two members to delay the business I entirely deny.

Mr. SEDDON.—I think if the Premier were to deal fairly with the House he would admit that he made a mistake in saying that he had met with obstruction. We passed three Bills on Friday—the Governor's Salary and Allowances Bill, the Bill reducing the payment to Ministers, and the Bill relating to the payment of members. I think to have got through those three measures in one week would have been good work, but to have got them through in two nights was an achievement which has never before been witnessed in the history of New Zealand politics. One of those measures was quite sufficient for one night. I ask the Premier to remember that those Bills were allowed to pass through their final stages, when that could have been delayed by objection being raised by one honourable member. Every facility was given to the Premier to advance those Bills to another place. Sir, I say this: that I, for one, am not prepared to give up my right to discuss fairly and freely measures that come before the House, and to have it said that in discussing them that is obstruction. Will the Premier tell the House that in passing the vast number of important Bills which were passed last week honourable members were guilty of obstruction? If there has been any wrong done at all it is that measures which should have been more freely discussed have not met with that discussion which their importance demanded; and it was on account of the want of time that we refrained from discussing these Bills fully. Sometimes this practice may cause a great deal of injury. For myself, I say that I have not offered any obstruction, and that I do not intend to obstruct; but, where the importance of a measure demands a discussion, I will have freedom of speech, and will express my opinions in reference to it.

Dr. FITCHETT.—The honourable gentleman mistakes the point. The Premier did not say that he obstructed, but that the business of the House was obstructed. Every one who remembers that on the Premier's motion the House was shut up for fifteen days will agree that we had there as colossal a piece of obstruction as has ever been known in the history of New Zealand politics.

Sir G. GREY.—I understand that I shall lose my right of speaking on the main question, having seconded this motion?

Mr. SPEAKER.—Yes; the mover and seconder of a motion to adjourn will have forfeited their right to speak on the main question when the motion for adjournment is negatived.

Mr. SEDDON.—Can the honourable member for Auckland Central speak now to the main question?

Mr. SPEAKER.—Yes. As the honourable gentleman did not speak when he seconded the motion for the adjournment of the House he can now speak to that question, which also embraces the original motion and amendment.

Sir G. GREY.—While I had not intended to speak until a later period of the debate, in order that I might advance any arguments that I might have considered of a substantial nature, and which I should have used in the House, I propose to make now a few general remarks on the subject. I simply wish to point this out: that I consider it a most unfair thing to have introduced this measure during the present session. The Premier distinctly told us that nothing was to be considered but financial questions—that the main thing was the reduction of expenditure, and that that was the one thing to be attended to; and yet he has hurried us on in the most extraordinary manner possible in all the business that was before the House. He has prevented any private members from bringing forward their measures or motions by taking all their days from them—not one, but all; and he justified his doing that by the great necessity of settling this one financial question of the reduction of expenditure, which was to occupy all our thoughts: and he has now brought forward a measure of a totally different character. This measure will not save one penny to the country if it is carried in its present form. It might quite as well have been brought forward next session or the succeeding session. The country could then consider the various proposals made for the reduction of the number of members, and this extraordinary advantage would be gained: that he would have an opportunity of bringing forward the measure of local self-government which he intends to propose to us. I ask the honourable gentleman, in all fairness, to consider this question. I fear I have little chance of producing any great impression in the way of votes, because this extraordinary measure has been adopted: The Government have sent round in the House in our very presence to ascertain how every member will vote for them; and it is believed that honourable members will not listen to any argument that may be used. I believe a more insulting thing has never been done to the House than to send round in the open and unblushing way that the Government did. Well, what is the use now of standing up and talking? We all know perfectly well from the Premier's manner that the reports brought to him are good; we know that, had the answers been in a way that showed it would not do to push the Bill on now, his tone of voice would have been altered. I will give one reason to honourable members why they should not assent to this measure. I think they will all say this: that the number of representatives in the General Assembly should bear some proportion to the number of those under the local self-government scheme which he proposes to set up. If a wise power is given to the bodies under this scheme much legislation will not require to be carried out by this House, and the legislation to be done would be in proportion to the powers that the local bodies would possess. I ask the House, what is the rule that the Premier has always followed whenever he has intended to bring in some measure which was to rob the people of New Zealand of a considerable portion of the privileges they enjoyed? Has not this always been done?—They have been told that so soon as an established thing had been got rid of, then something new and admirable would be set up in the place of it; and those promises have been accompanied by absolute bribes—promises, not real bribes, because they have always vanished into air. The people have listened to them, and we all know we were told that if we would give up the form of local institutions that we possessed new bodies should be set up, to which should be given substantial endowments. Every honourable gentleman can recollect that. And what endowment was ever given, what substantial endowments have been afforded, to make reparation for what we have lost? Absolutely none. But I am satisfied that, if this measure is assented to before we get any form of local self-government, we shall never get any self-government. Now in regard to the Natives. I ask, what can be more admirable than what they have said to-night? They spoke with great justice and with great power, and they say the Government do this, and then pretend to make amends to them by giving them representation, and that the representation they give them is a sham. It has gone forth that the Natives sitting in this House exercise the power they ought to exercise in reference to their numbers; and, whilst that is said, every member here knows that in truth the Natives never had their fair share of representation, and never exercised in this House the power they ought to have done. The only thing is that, on some important occasion or other, they have been deluded by promises made for certain purposes, and they have given their votes in one block, that is, altogether, to save some Government from being thrown out of office. That they have done several times; they have been wrongly used; but they never have fairly exercised within the walls of this House the powers that belong to the representatives of the Native race. And they have asked, and I have often recommended them to ask it, that they should be treated exactly as the Europeans are, and possess the same voting-powers exactly in the same manner, and that both races in the representation question should be blended together exactly as if they were one people. That privilege I think they ought to get. Now, the question comes—

Major ATKINSON.—Would the honourable gentleman say whether he means a separate representation?
